Mr. Moynihan: I thank my hon. Friend for his observation. It is as important for these projects to be environmentally acceptable as for them to be economically competitive. With the introduction of the non-fossil fuel obligation we have been able to create a marketplace so that commercially competitive renewable energy projects can come onstream effectively.

Ms. Armstrong: I hope that the Minister is looking at new projects for possible development and that at some stage he will look at one in my constituency, where, as part of an attempt to regenerate Consett, we are considering a wind park on part of the old steel works site. I am not sure that it would exactly replace what was there, but I hope that the Minister will consider these projects carefully, because there are people in my area who still do not have electricity and we hope that these projects will supply electricity to more far flung places.

Mr. Moynihan: The hon. Lady makes a valid point. It is important to identify new wind projects. She will be pleased to learn that the largest tranche of research and development expenditure is on wind energy. I am not aware of the specific project to which she referred, but I know that my officials will be only too happy to look in detail at any proposals. We want to give commercially viable wind energy projects as big a push as we can.

Mr. Simon Coombs: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is no virtue simply in increasing expenditure on research and development on renewable sources of energy for its own sake? Does he further agree that what is needed is the careful examination of each project to see what its potential long-term yield is for the future?

Mr. Moynihan: I hope that my hon. Friend heard my earlier comments and is satisfied that we are aware of the importance of ensuring that proposed projects are commercially viable. Many are not. The great advantage of having the non-fossil fuel obligation is that we not only back the research and development with increasing resources, but provide a marketplace for those projects to play an important role in the diversity of energy supply on competitive terms.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Is not the reality that for the Government renewables are still the poor relation? Less than £25 million per year is spent on research and development into renewables while more than £95 million is spent on research and development in the nuclear industry. The other day the Government closed down the Camborne geothermal facility with a loss of 30 jobs. The evidence is that the cost of producing geothermal electricity is 3·1 per kWh, the cost of producing electricity is about 3·5p per kWh and the cost of producing nuclear power is more than 6p per kWh. On all assessments, nuclear power is a bad bargain and renewables are good, but the Government are blind to any sensible opposition.

Mr. Moynihan: I am sorry to inform the House that the hon. Gentleman has got his facts wrong. The hot dry rocks project in Cornwall was not closed down last week. That important project was given a new direction and a boost of £3·3 million for the period 1991 to 1994 so that we can work on it with our European colleagues and make it as economically viable as possible. I spent a day visiting that project. The cost per kilowatt hour to which the hon. Gentleman referred bears no reality to the sort of cost produced from the research on geothermal hot dry rocks, which can be up to 10 times higher than the figures that the hon. Gentleman quoted. That said, however, it is an important source of potential renewable energy within the European Community and further research is being undertaken to try to make sure that we can make it commercially viable. If we cannot, we cannot put further research and development into that energy source. In answer to the hon. Gentleman's first point, any Government who spend £160 million on renewable research and development are committed to renewable energy projects and any Government who increase next year's provision by 20 per cent. more than that for this year are committed to undertaking research and development for commercially effective renewable energy projects.

Energy Conservation

3. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what recent representations he has received about the adequacy of existing energy conservation schemes.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory): My right hon. Friend and I have received frequent representations about our energy efficiency programmes to which we accord high priority.

Mr. Knox: What is my hon. Friend's estimate of the potential for further energy savings? Is he satisfied that the existing schemes will enable us to achieve those savings?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: It has been estimated that further savings of up to 20 per cent. are possible. I am convinced that we shall be able to approach that target through a mixture of regulations, such as the improved building regulations, labelling, advice, and targeted grants such as the home energy efficiency scheme, which directs grant aid to low-income households.

Mr. Loyden: What encouragement has been given to local government to draught-proof the windows and doors of older houses so that many millions of homes can benefit from the conservation of energy?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I can confirm that the estate action programme is directing substantial sums of money towards upgrading older council estates. In addition to that, the home energy efficiency scheme is targeted precisely at older dwellings, which are often occupied by low-income households who need grant aid to improve the energy efficiency, draught-proofing and insulation standards of their homes.

Coal Mines

4. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many pits he expects will still be operating by 1993.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Decisions on future capacity are a matter for the British Coal Corporation, but it is clear that the future of every pit depends crucially on the degree to which management and men are successful in containing costs and continuing their productivity improvements.

Mr. Mullin: The Minister will be aware that, since the privatisation of electricity, the country has been flooded with cheap coal, which no amount of productivity improvements are capable of competing against. In the unhappy event of the Minister's party winning another general election, not one pit in the north-east will survive. I invite the Minister to deny that.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The future capacity of the north-east coalfield is a matter for the British Coal Corporation. It would not be right artificially to restrict imports of coal and to insulate British industry from overseas competition. The future of that coalfield depends on continuing the productivity improvements of recent years, and I pay tribute to the British Coal Corporation and to those who work for it for the 85 per cent. productivity improvement since the coal strike.

Mr. Hannam: The Government have invested some £7 billion in British Coal since 1979. That is surely proof that the Government see a good future for a competitive coal industry. Does my hon. Friend agree that the 85 per cent. productivity increase since the miners' strike is evidence that the coal industry has an important role to play in the future energy market?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I entirely agree. The Government have put more than £17 billion of grant aid into the coal industry since 1979. That is proof of our financial commitment to the industry. The future prosperity and success of that industry, however, depend on continuing those productivity improvements.

Mr. Hardy: Will the Minister offer the House some estimate of the effect on the balance of payments deficit, which is already enormous, of our increasing reliance on imported coal, which will become more and more expensive, to the ruinous deprivation of the country?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: It would not be to the advantage of the balance of payments or of British industry artificially to restrict imported energy sources. I confirm, however, that until 1993 British Coal has secure contracts with the electricity generators and I anticipate that after 1993 electricity generators will recognise the value of an indigenous source of supply.

Mr. Dickens: Is not it a fact that the future of the British coal industry lies in the hands of the mineworkers themselves? Is not it marvellous that once the power of stupid trade union leaders such as Arthur Scargill is diluted the men at the coal face respond and have increased their productivity by 87 per cent. since the coal strike?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I cannot improve on my hon. Friend's description of the situation.

Mr. Barron: The Minister knows full well that the framework of privatisation of the electricity supply industry has thrown British Coal's marketing into chaos. Does he honestly think that the £17 billion investment of which he boasts is a sound investment, given the ending of current contracts in 1993? When will the Government take action not just in the interests of the miners, who have improved their productivity, but in the national interest, instead of increasing the growing energy deficit of this energy-rich country?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: It is up to the industry to prove the soundness of that investment, but the signs are that management and workers are rising to the challenge and can mine coal competitively.

Offshore Oil and Gas

5. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the level of direct employment in the offshore oil and gas industry in 1990; and what is his estimate of the number of jobs indirectly supported by the industry.

Mr. Moynihan: Direct employment offshore in 1990 was at an all-time record level of 36,500, some 19 per cent. higher than in 1989. The number of those employed indirectly in the oil and gas industry is considerably larger than those working offshore.

Mr. Marshall: As a former Aberdeen councillor, I welcome that answer as good news for Aberdeen, for the north-east of Scotland and for the country. Does my hon. Friend agree that it shows the efficiency of private enterprise in creating jobs?

Mr. Moynihan: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend.

Dr. Godman: The expansion is indeed good news for Scotland—if not for my constituency, where unemployment at 13·8 per cent. is no laughing matter. I remind the Minister that Scott Lithgow on the lower Clyde is the finest shipbuilding and oil rig construction yard in the United Kingdom. Has he any hope to offer to my oil rig workers and dockers, or anything to say about Scott Lithgow?

Mr. Moynihan: There is no doubt that the position for many offshore fabricators is very strong. Their order books are strong. They have opportunities now because levels of investment and activity in the North sea have never been more buoyant. I hope that they will use those opportunities to the full by producing, on time, good-quality products to meet foreign competition.

Nuclear Power

6. Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what proportion of the production of electricity in the United Kingdom is currently supplied by nuclear power.

Mr. Wakeham: In 1990 about 20 per cent. of electricity available in the United Kingdom came from United Kingdom nuclear sources.

Mr. Butler: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that for the foreseeable future nuclear power has an assured role in generating safe, clean and reliable energy?

Mr. Wakeham: Yes, I can confirm that. Nuclear generation is vital to ensure security and diversity of supply and brings with it excellent environmental benefits in that it produces no carbon dioxide, sulphur dioxide or nitrogen doxide.

Dr. Reid: Will the Minister confirm that the largest single industrial user of electricity provided by any source in Scotland is the Ravescraig steel plant? Is he aware of the announcement of a further 1,500 redundancies there? Can he give an assurance that, under a privatised electricity set-up, the costs of the decline of Ravescraig and the demise of the steel industry will not be passed on to the individual electricity consumer in Scotland or in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Wakeham: Questions to do with the steel industry or the Scottish industry are clearly not for me, but under the system that we have introduced industrial consumers generally pay lower prices as a result of the competitive nature of the electricity industry.

Sir Trevor Skeet: Will the Secretary of State bear it in mind that unless more nuclear power stations are built and the review is accelerated, there will be very few new nuclear power stations by the turn of the century? Will not that lead to the disintegration of an industry which it is most important to preserve?

Mr. Wakeham: I know that my hon. Friend knows a great deal about the nuclear industry. As he is aware, a full-scale review of the prospects for nuclear power in the future will be undertaken in 1994, when the Sizewell B project will be nearing completion. That review will have to take all the relevant factors into account.

Mr. Morgan: Will the Secretary of State confirm that —given the progessive unravelling of the beautiful Heath Robinson structure erected by his predecessor, the right hon Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson), the withdrawal from privatisation of the nuclear industry and the fact that 40 per cent. of generators are now not being sold on the market—by the time of the next election less than 50 per cent. of the electricity-generating industry in England and Wales will be in private hands? If that is what the right hon. Gentleman and his honourable lemmings on the Back Benches think that they voted for in 1988, and if that is what they call a success, we should welcome many more such successes.

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman's facts are wrong. Very shortly, the generating industry—National Power and PowerGen, that is—will be in the private sector; indeed, they are at this moment. Nuclear Electric will remain in the public sector for the foreseeable future. I think that the hon. Gentleman is confusing the facts with some view of creative accountancy. The 40 per cent. stake that the Government retain in the privatised companies will be retained for another two years; I have explained what will happen after that.

Offshore Oil and Gas

7. Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of the level of investment on the United Kingdom continental shelf in 1990.

Mr. Moynihan: My estimate of investment in 1990 on the United Kingdom continental shelf is £3·5 billion. That represents a significant increase of around one third on 1989.

Mr. Smith: Is not that a remarkable achievement by Shell, Esso, British Petroleum and the other oil companies that invest in the North sea? Given the substantial fall in the real price of oil in the past decade, is not it also a tribute to the improved technology there, as well as to the fiscal and regulatory regime governing the area? Will my hon. Friend continue to press Treasury Ministers to ensure that our tax regime encourages marginal investment?

Mr. Moynihan: The answer to my hon. Friend's first two questions is yes; as for the third, the Government are fully aware that a stable fiscal regime and regulatory framework have been part and parcel of the success of investment in the North sea over the past decade.

Mr. Skinner: The Minister just said, in a kind of coded language, that the Government would allow the tax regime to be shifted in relation to the smaller underground pools of oil. When miners run into narrow seams of coal, however, the Department decides that they are unprofitable—in its language—and closes them. If it is right to use every possible effort to maximise oil production, the same should apply to getting out the coal, and pits such as Creswell in my constituency should not be shut.

Mr. Moynihan: The hon. Gentleman has obviously misunderstood the code.

Mr. Bill Walker: The Opposition constantly seek to ignore the effects of our indigenous energy, and our investment in oil and gas, on the performance of the United Kingdom economy, while constantly drawing attention to the technology and out-of-date practices in the coal industry. Does not that clearly show that they are people of the past, not of the present—and certainly not of the future?

Mr. Moynihan: I entirely agree. I am glad that my hon. Friend has recognised the continuing outstanding success of our buoyant oil and gas market.

Mr. Doran: The Minister will know that a substantial part of the investment that he rightly praised relates to safety improvements. Is he aware that, according to the trade figures announced this morning, our present deficit includes an oil deficit of £109 million compared with the surpluses that we have enjoyed over most of the past decade? Does he agree that the main reason for that deficit is the need to close down platforms for safety modifications? Had the Government taken their job of ensuring safety more seriously, and had they accepted the Opposition's criticisms, the shutdowns would have been unnecessary, the improvements phased and the present large deficits avoided.

Mr. Moynihan: I disagree with the hon. Gentleman's conclusion. I agree, however, that the reason for our lower net exports is a temporary reduction in North sea oil production. The first priority must always be the safety of the work force in the North sea. If that means reducing output at any time, so be it.

Gas Disconnections

8. Mrs. Roe: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions he has had with the Director General of Ofgas about disconnection for debt.

Mr. Moynihan: I have had no specific discussions with the Director General of Gas Supply on the subject of disconnection for debt. I can confirm that the number of British Gas customers who have been disconnected because of debt is lower than at any time since 1977, when records were first kept.

Mrs. Roe: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's reply, especially as 3 million new customers have been connected. Does he agree that protection for debtors has increased since privatisation, not decreased?

Mr. Moynihan: That is absolutely true. From a peak of almost 62,000 in the year ended March 1988, just over 19,000 people have been disconnected for debt.

Mr. Allen McKay: Is not it also a fact that the drop in disconnections has coincided with an increase in the installation of credit meters, which have an automatic cut-off on what people can pay? As the Government are trying to encourage wage settlements below the rate of inflation, will the Minister tell the electric industry not to increase its prices by more than the rate of inflation?

Mr. Moynihan: On the substantive question, I acknowledge that the offer of a prepayment meter as an alternative to disconnection has played an important role, but the reality is that privatisation and the excellent work of the Office of Gas Supply have been paramount in assisting the gas industry to reduce the number of people who are disconnected for debt.

Unleaded Petrol

9. Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what has been the increase since 1989 in the number of petrol-retailing outlets selling unleaded petrol; and what is the level in other EC countries.

Mr. Moynihan: The United Kingdom Petroleum Industry Association estimates that, at the end of November 1990, 98 per cent. of filling stations in the United Kingdom sold premium unleaded petrol, compared with about 80 per cent. at the end of 1989 and 20 per cent. at the end of 1988.

The latest available comparable figures for 1990 in the European Community were: West Germany, Belgium and Luxembourg 100 per cent.; Denmark and Netherlands 85 per cent.; Italy 64 per cent.; Ireland 50 per cent.; France 40 per cent.; Spain 19 per cent.; Greece 11 per cent.; and Portugal 4 per cent.

Mr. Carrington: Do not those figures, taken in conjunction with those for the sale of unleaded petrol, show the determination of the Government, the industry and the people to reduce the amount of lead in our air? Is it not it possible, perhaps through the European Commission, to encourage our European partners, who are not as environmentally friendly as we are, to improve their actions and environment?

Mr. Moynihan: I agree that it is important for the Government to continue to pursue that objective throughout the Community.

Mr. Tony Banks: It is welcome that so many petrol stations are making unleaded petrol available, but the Minister understands that the real test is the number of cars using it. What discussions are being held within the Department or with Treasury Ministers and officials to encourage the take-up of unleaded petrol by giving further tax incentives or cuts in petrol prices?

Mr. Moynihan: The latter point is for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The 1990 Budget, which increased the duty differential to nearly 14p a gallon, was important. About seven out of 10 cars are capable of using unleaded petrol. The Department of Energy and other Departments have been promoting a publicity and information campaign to encourage those who can convert rapidly to do so.

Clean Coal Technology

10. Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what support his Department is giving to the investigation of the prospects for clean coal technology.

Mr. Wakeham: My Department is currently reviewing coal-related research and development and this summer will publish a document setting out our strategy. Much important work on clean coal technology has already been carried out by British Coal and others.

Mr. Hayes: Does my right hon. Friend agree that environmentalists should be greatly encouraged by the Government's clear commitment to clean coal technology? [Laughter.] Hon. Members may laugh, but my right hon. Friend may like to remind them that the Government are contributing £17 million to 15 separate projects.

Mr. Wakeham: I confirm what my hon. Friend said. The current programme of more than 15 projects which are under way or planned has a contract value of more than £80 million and my Department's contribution is more than £17 million. I am not satisfied that we are doing enough. That is why we have set in hand a study to find out what more can be done.

Mr. Eadie: It is refreshing for the House to hear candour from the right hon. Gentleman about the investment in clean coal technology. Is he aware that the investment, which is running at about 3 per cent., is pathetic? In the quest for clean coal, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will consider Monktonhall colliery which, although it produces more or less sulphur-free coal and has received £14 million of investment, has been mothballed. Will the right hon. Gentleman consider reopening that colliery? It would result in jobs as well as sulphur-free coal.

Mr. Wakeham: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his support of what we are doing about clean coal technology, but Monktonhall colliery is a matter for British Coal's management, not for me.

Dr. Michael Clark: Does my right hon. Friend agree that clean coal burn technology is important for not only the future of the British coal industry but the environment? Does he agree that it is important also in ensuring that we achieve the maximum use of our indigenous industry? Does he recognise that, although we may be in the lead in terms of research and development and investigations into these techniques, we are somewhat behind in building demonstration plants? Will he undertake to find ways to encourage the building of demonstration plants? That work can be done in various ways. It does not always involve Government money.

Mr. Wakeham: Yes, indeed. Recently we announced the provision of an additional £3·7 million towards British Coal's topping cycle project at Grimethorpe. That brings the Government's support for the project this year to £9·2 million and clearly demonstrates our commitment to supporting clean coal technology. We have set up a coal task force, a new advisory body to develop new strategies and project selection methods, and United Kingdom industry is strongly represented on that task force. That shows confidence in the way forward.

Mr. Dobson: Does the Secretary of State agree that the failure to back the demonstration plants which the hon. Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark) endorsed is putting British plant manufacturers at a disadvantage compared with their competitors in Germany, Sweden, Switzerland and France? Would not it be better to put some money into that work? Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that more money was spent tarting up his Department's headquarters than the Government are investing in clean coal technology?

Mr. Wakeham: I have no idea about that last point. I had no responsibility for those matters. I would support any project that was worth while and could be shown to have a commercial future. The first projects that we demonstrate must have the possibility of being economically viable in the long term.

Mr. Hind: Does my right hon. Friend agree that coal will not have a future as an electricity-generating fuel unless the technologies of decarbonisation are improved to a level at which CO_2 emissions are much lower? My right hon. Friend's efforts in that regard are greatly appreciated by people who work in the coal industry, as those developments will give them a future.

Mr. Wakeham: Absolutely. My hon. Friend knows that most of the new power generation projects in the next few years are likely to be gas-fired projects. It is important that research and development should occur so that coal is increasingly thought of as a fuel to be used and is seen to be environmentally safe.

Energy Efficiency

12. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the total spent by his Department in the current financial year on promoting energy efficiency.

Mr. Wakeham: Forecast outturn expenditure by the Energy Efficiency Office in 1990-91 is £23·4 million. That represents a substantial increase on expenditure last year of £15 million.

Mr. Williams: Will the Minister examine the serious decline in the energy efficiency industry? Figures published recently by the Association for the Conservation of Energy show a 20 per cent. fall in the demand for heating control since 1987, a 34 per cent. fall in the demand for double glazing and a 49 per cent. fall in demand for cavity wall insulation. How can the Government claim to be taking energy efficiency seriously when the industry is in such a serious decline?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman quotes some figures which I do not deny, although I have not checked their accuracy. However, those figures relate to the construction industry and are not out of line with the general cuts in that industry. We have increased our expenditure on energy efficiency. We are anxious to improve energy efficiency because we believe that that is far and away the most important way in which to deal with problems of global warming and CO_2. It is important for the hon. Gentleman to remember that the progress of that policy so far has been very encouraging. Over the past 10 years GDP has increased by 25 per cent. while energy consumption is almost unchanged.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

City Fraud

26. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Attorney-General when he last met the director of the Serious Fraud Office to discuss developments in the prosecution of City fraud; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): I met the director of the Serious Fraud Office on 13 February to discuss matters of departmental interest.

Mr. Skinner: When the Attorney-General discussed those matters with the director of the Serious Fraud Office, did he refer to the Harrods swindle and the fact that Graham Jones, the former financial adviser to that company, wrote two letters to the Governor of the Bank of England accusing Harrods of breaking banking regulations, but the Governor refused to reveal anything to a Committee of the House? Why are the Government afraid of taking on Harrods? Why does not the Attorney-General act? Are the Government frightened to death of the real owner of Harrods, the Sultan of Brunei, who bailed out the Government several years ago when the pound was down to near-parity with the dollar?

The Attorney-General: I am sure that the latter part of the question owes much more to ignorance than to malice. The question of Harrods did not feature in my recent discussion with the director. The hon. Gentleman will recall that the director of the Serious Fraud Office and the Director of Public Prosecutions made a joint statement in June or July last year stating that, following detailed examination by the Metropolitan police, the conclusion was that insufficient evidence was admissible for criminal proceedings to warrant a prosecution. Each director is always open to further evidence becoming available, but the Bank of England is its own enforcing authority.

Mr. Hind: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the director of the Serious Fraud Office and his staff have prosecuted a large number of offences of serious white collar fraud and that they have not regarded the importance of the defendant as a criterion in taking that person to court? One example was Guinness. Is not that a clear sign that people who commit serious white collar crime will be treated in exactly the same way as a burglar or a shoplifter?

The Attorney-General: My hon. Friend is absolutely right and I am grateful to him. In the two years that the Serious Fraud Office has operated, it has prosecuted to conviction more than two thirds of the people whom it has charged. The Government have been responsible for not only the introduction of the Serious Fraud Office, but before that—in the days before the Crown prosecution service—the introduction and resourcing of the fraud investigation group in the DPP's headquarters. The Government have also legislated for the confiscation of proceeds of crime. Of course, the prosecuting authorities pay no regard to personalities. That is the answer to those who endlessly snipe from a basis of ignorance at the Government's response to the challenge of fraud.

Statutes

27. Mr. Spearing: To ask the Attorney-General what is the latest date to which statutes in force are up to date.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): The publication of new Acts in statutes in force is up to date as at 11 February 1991, other than part of one 1990 Act. Information on the repeal of whole Acts is up to date as at 1 January 1991. Information on the amendment, or partial repeal, of existing Acts is brought up to date periodically.

Mr. Spearing: Even if they are brought up to date periodically, does the Solicitor-General agree that statutes in force, published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office, can never be up to date because statutes enforceable in the United Kingdom include self-acting regulations of the European Economic Community? Does the Solicitor-General agree that, since agreement on the package for 1992 involving financial and commercial matters, the change in enforceable statutes is now even greater? Should not there be some warning in front of the volumes of statutes in force to put lawyers and others on their guard?

The Solicitor-General: Lawyers who advise on matters relating to the European Community are well aware of the hon. Gentleman's point. The longer-term methods for dealing with statutes in force must be computerisation and projects on that are coming forward for financial approval.

Law Society

28. Mr. Viggers: To ask the Attorney-General when he next expects to meet the president of the Law Society to discuss matters of concern to the legal profession.

The Attorney-General: No meeting is scheduled at present between myself and the president of the Law Society, with whom I enjoy a warm relationship.

Mr. Viggers: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend. He will know of the Law Society's interest in judicial appointments. It is concerned that solicitors should be more readily appointed to the Bench and that the areas from which appointments to the Bench are made should be more broadly based. I understand that meetings are planned shortly with the Lord Chancellor, but has my right hon. and learned Friend any comments to make on the position at present?

The Attorney-General: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The Lord Chancellor will listen with great care to all suggestions made to him with a view to broadening the range from which judicial appointments are made. As for solicitors, although candidates are, naturally, considered on their merits, the Lord Chancellor is anxious to encourage more solicitors to put themselves forward for judicial appointment when they have reached the appropriate age and standing. He consults more widely than ever before on this matter and is evaluating the results of a pilot scheme designed to improve the methods by which solicitors are identified for potential judicial appointments.

Mr. Mullin: Does the Attorney-General detect any concern on the part of the Law Society about the inability of senior members of the judiciary to distinguish between innocence and guilt? Does he have any plans to take action on that? My question is motivated neither by ignorance nor by malice.

The Attorney-General: I do not answer for the Law Society. The hon. Gentleman will know that any judicial system is only as good as the quality of the evidence fed into the trials over which judges preside. The judges hold the ring and enforce the rules. Although every effort must be made—the hon. Gentleman knows that every effort is made—to rectify any miscarriage of justice that may later be found to have occurred, the people of this country acknowledge that our judiciary is of a high standard.

Mr. Bowis: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the public's confidence in members of the Law Society would be greatly enhanced by the setting up of the legal ombudsman? Will he report on how that system is progressing?

The Attorney-General: This is the age of the ombudsman and I am sure that his arrival has been generally welcomed. However, it is too early for us to assess what progress he is making.

Mr. Fraser: When the Attorney-General meets the president of the Law Society, what will he be able to do to assuage what the Lord Chancellor called the perfectly genuine cries of hardship from legal aid practitioners? What will be the percentage increase for legal aid work that should take place after 1 April this year and what proposals does he have for easing the cash flow for legal aid practitioners who are suffering from high interest rates and the fall-off of work that used to be subsidised by the commercial and conveyancing sectors?

The Attorney-General: These are all important matters which the Legal Aid Board keeps under review.

The Gulf

29. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Attorney-General, pursuant to his oral answer to the hon. Member for Linlithgow of 4 February, Official Report, columns 14-15, what representations he has received on the extent to which the principle of international law relating to minimisation of civilian casualties has been adhered to during carpet-bombing in the Gulf conflict, and whether these civilian losses are proportionate to the military advantage expected.

The Attorney-General: I have received two letters from the public about the minimisation of casualties. I should emphasise that allied forces have instructions to attack only military targets or facilities supporting Iraq's occupation of Kuwait.

Mr. Dalyell: Is the Attorney-General aware that on Saturday night I rang the ever-courteous clerk at Downing street to ask whether Her Majesty's Government had been consulted about the use of napalm in the Gulf? She in turn consulted Sir Charles Powell and the answer came back that it was far from clear. As a member of the War Cabinet, will the Attorney-General clarify whether the use of napalm, the horror weapon of the Vietnam war which gave us the image of the burning girl running in sheer horror, is legal in international law?

The Attorney-General: There is no convention or instrument of international law bearing on the use of napalm. However, its use, like that of all weapons, is governed by the principles that I described when I last answered the hon. Gentleman's question regarding the minimisation of casualties three weeks ago. To those on the receiving end of any of the modern weapons of war, each one probably qualifies as a horror weapon.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Southern Africa

32. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the discussions the Minister for Overseas Development had during her recent visit to South Africa.

33. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the outcome of the visit by the Minister for Overseas Development to southern Africa.

34. Mr. Irvine: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent visit by the Minister for Overseas Development to southern Africa.

36. Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions the Minister for Overseas Development had during her recent visit to South Africa.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): My most recent visit included both Mozambique and the Republic of South Africa. I was able to discuss recent developments and future prospects with political leaders in both countries and to see some of the aid projects that we are assisting. During my visit, I announced a further 10,000 tonnes of food aid for Mozambique and a number of new commitments for teacher training, rural and community development projects and student awards for black South Africans.

Mr. Townsend: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the apparent success of her visit. It was billed as an opportunity for her to have discussions on political reform in South Africa. Will she give the House the benefit of her conclusions?

Mrs. Chalker: I can genuinely tell the House that I was most impressed by the speed with which the moves towards political reform are taking place. The week that I was there saw the 12-hour meeting between the African National Congress and the Government—two days later, on 15 February, good progress was announced. It is clear that President de Klerk and his Government are determined to move ahead as quickly as possible to repeal not only the Group Areas Act, but the land acts and the population registration acts. While we were there, during the time of the meeting on 12 February, an order was made to obviate the need for any child to be registered by race. We should encourage good steady progress and the repeal of all apartheid acts by recognising what the South African Government are doing.

Mr. Ian Taylor: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the importance of continuing the exciting developments of political reform in South Africa should be highlighted by increasing the openness of the South African market to international trade? In addition, our aid programme should be geared particularly to assisting community development. It is much more important to develop that aspect of South Africa than simply to worry about the principle of voting.

Mrs. Chalker: I should be wrong not to say that the principle of voting is important. We hope that the all-party congress to discuss the modalities of the new constitution will proceed apace. Of course, it is critical that we lift the bans holding back the progress of black South Africans. South Africa needs investment if it is to provide training and job opportunities to young black South Africans. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor) for welcoming our announcement not only to give more than £500,000 over four years for teacher training, but to support other projects that will lead to training and work for young black South Africans so that they can take their rightful place in the new South Africa.

Mr. Irvine: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the most encouraging features about British Government aid to developing countries in recent years has been the improvement in its quality and effectiveness? During her visit to Mozambique in particular, was she able to see that improvement in effectiveness taking place?

Mrs. Chalker: Indeed, I was. I went up to Magude and then further up the Limpopo railway line where the workers are doing work with our money at the same time and so improving that line. I saw work in the port and work on power stations. It is going well and the quality is high.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Does my right hon. Friend agree that her discussions showed that courage and persistence are needed by Nelson Mandela, Chief Buthelezi and President de Klerk in trying to overcome the prejudices and provocations that are still likely to unsettle the path to one person, one vote and to full economic development?

Mrs. Chalker: Yes. We hope that all parties will get together to join in the process of peaceful change. I stressed that to all whom I met—the Pan Africanist Congress, the ANC, Inkatha and AZAPO—the Azanian People's Organisation. I hope that there will soon be progress.

Sir Russell Johnston: Was one of the views that the Minister reached on her visit that the European Community should increase its regional allocation from the figure agreed under Lomé IV?

Mrs. Chalker: In fact, Lomé IV will not apply to South Africa, but it applies to Mozambique. We shall have a debate tomorrow night on the details of that. I shall be able better to answer the hon. Gentleman's question at that time, because it needs to be answered at length.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Will the Minister confirm that what is needed in South Africa, as well as peace, is food? Is it true that a large part of the allocation of moneys that she announced will be held over until the beginning of the financial year?

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Lady does not understand the progress of giving food aid. When we are asked for help, we ask in what way that help can most aptly be applied. Sometimes it is with transport costs and sometimes it is with transport equipment, but all that we have learnt in recent years is that we must keep the food pipeline full. We are now nearly at the end of February. Food is needed from April onwards. That is when it will get there and that is what has been arranged.

Mr. Tony Banks: Did the Minister have the opportunity to discuss with conservationists in southern Africa the impact of the construction of the northern buffalo fence in the Okavango region of Namibia? Is the Minister aware that that fence has been constructed because of the requirements of the EC to establish a foot and mouth disease-free range, but that its impact on the wild creatures—elephants, giraffes, buffalo and wildebeest—is catastrophic? Will she consult the authorities in Namibia to call a halt to the construction of that fence until a proper environmental investigation of its impact has been made?

Mrs. Chalker: As I understand it, the authorities in Namibia have not been concerned with this matter—it involves the authorities in Botswana. As the hon. Gentleman knows from questions that I have already answered to him, we are looking into this matter most carefully.

Mrs. Clwyd: Although additional assistance for Mozambique is welcome, does not the Minister realise that an emergency appeal made by Mozambique and the United Nations last year for £76 million to help with famine, refugees and the effects of war has still not been met? However, the Minister said—I am very puzzled by this—in an interview in the environment section of The Guardian on Friday:

"If I needed more money, I could go and get it."

Is she telling the House that despite the fact that 27 million people in Africa are starving and crying out for help, she has not even bothered to go to the Treasury to ask for more money to meet their needs? If that is the case, she is failing them and failing in her job.

Mr. Chalker: First, it is 29 million people who may be at risk of starvation in 25 African countries. We are extremely well aware of the problem. Secondly, we have planned our expenditure and we have planned our provision with the non-governmental organisations which I met last week to make sure that we keep the pipelines as full as we can. However, it simply cannot be left to Britain alone. That is why I have written to all other major aid donors to make sure that they make adequate contributions and we shall carry on doing so ourselves.

Sub-Saharan Africa

35. Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the number of children in sub-Saharan Africa who are likely to be orphaned as a result of AIDS; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: In the analysis for UNICEF, covering 10 African countries, the data are all estimated and based on selected assumptions. Therefore, the data must not be used as though they were exact. They can indicate only that during the 1990s between 3 million and 5·5 million of the 50 million children under 15 years of age by 1999 may be without mothers.

Mr. Butler: My right hon. Friend will be aware that according to the ODA's own research, one eighth of all children in the Rakai district of Uganda are orphaned and that that may be connected with the 30 to 40 per cent. HIV positivity rate among young adults there. If that trend continues unabated in sub-Saharan Africa, is not a disaster looming?

Mrs. Chalker: We believe that the situation in Rakai may be far worse than in other areas. As I tried to explain in my letter of 18 February, it is not right to extrapolate from those figures to the rest of Africa. When dealing with this terrible disease, we must beware speculation. We are doing a great deal through the World Health Organisation's global programme on AIDS to help with the AIDS factor and we shall continue to do so.

The Gulf

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Tom King): The final phase for the liberation of Kuwait and the achievement of the United Nations resolutions was launched in the early hours of Sunday 24 February. After more than six months of international endeavour to achieve a peaceful resolution of the crisis, the continuing refusal of Iraq to comply with the UN resolutions, and the rejection of the final deadline from the coalition, left us no alternative but to proceed with the final ground campaign. The need for this was further confirmed by the fact that, at the very time that Tariq Aziz was still purporting to negotiate in Moscow, Saddam Hussein was giving orders for the wholesale destruction of Kuwait and its oil fields, and for further outrages against its citizens.

The land operations involve forces of no fewer than 11 countries: the United States, Saudi Arabia, the United Kingdom, Egypt, France, Syria, the United Arab Emirates, Bahrain, Qatar, Oman and, of course, Kuwait. They have now been under way for 38½ hours. So far, progress has been rapid and relatively little opposition has been encountered.

Excellent planning and preparation and, above all, determination have enabled the coalition forces rapidly to penetrate the extensive obstacle belt that the Iraqis had constructed both along the Saudi-Kuwait border and along a substantial part of the Saudi-Iraq border.

To the east of that front, coalition forces have now advanced well into Kuwait and have taken a significant number of prisoners. Many of the Iraqi units encountered surrendered almost immediately.

To the west, United States, United Kingdom, Saudi and French forces have mounted an operation into Iraq against Iraqi forces supporting the occupation of Kuwait. Some elements are encircling Iraqi units; others are breaking through defensive positions and beginning to engage Iraqi units directly. The 1st British Armoured Division is fully involved in the thrust and is now moving steadily forward.

The Saudis have announced that the number of prisoners of war taken by the coalition has now risen to 20,000. Casualties on the coalition side have been very light. As the House may be aware, two British soldiers lost their lives in the days immediately before the start of the ground offensive, and their families have been told of their deaths. On my latest information, there have been no British casualties in the main advance.

In support of the land advances, allied air forces, including British aircraft, have continued their attacks both on strategic targets in Iraq and on the Iraq ground forces in Kuwait and Iraq. The attacks are continuing in spite of poor weather conditions and without serious interference from the smoke of burning oil wells.

Maritime and amphibious forces in the northern Gulf are playing their part in the coalition attack. In particular, the Royal Navy is playing a crucial role in mine clearance operations. During the operations last night the Iraqis fired a Silkworm missile, which was destroyed by a Sea Dart fired from HMS Gloucester.

It is vital that we give all the support that we can to the coalition forces in their challenging task. One of the key advantages is the lack of knowledge that the Iraqis have about our exact positions and plans. We must preserve that advantage. That is why we have been so concerned to restrict any information about the military operations that could be of help to the enemy at a critical time. I understand the great interest of the whole country in the progress of our forces, and particularly among the families of all those involved, and we shall do all that we can to give accurate information, provided that it can be done safely and without putting lives at risk. In the meantime, we look for the full understanding and co-operation of all those reporting and commenting on the battle.

This further phase of the campaign has started well, and every credit is due to General Schwarzkopf and all the coalition forces. However, they know that the Iraqi forces in the front line are their least capable and likely to be of the lowest morale.

The news so far has been good. There may be days ahead when it is more difficult. But whatever the ups and downs, our forces know that they have the support of all the House and the nation. Our prayers and our best wishes go with them as they complete the task.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Clackmannan): I thank the Secretary of State for his statement. I recognise the need to avoid making helpful information available to the enemy, and realise that that precludes the disclosure of some of the details that the House and the media may wish to hear. On behalf of my right hon. and hon. Friends, I express sympathy with the families who have already lost loved ones in the conflict and relief at the low number of casualties and the high number of prisoners taken. I am sure that that is attributable in no small way to the bravery and professionalism of our troops.

I am sure that the whole House will recognise that responsibility for the intensification of the conflict lies with Saddam Hussein and his unwillingness to allay coalition misgivings about the failure of the laudable Soviet attempt to secure a last-minute peace settlement guaranteeing an immediate ceasefire and withdrawal from Kuwait. Could anyone accept the strength of a Foreign Minister's assurance that he could commit his troops to withdraw from a country while his President and Commander-in-Chief was giving orders to the same troops in the same country to put that country's land to the torch and its people to the sword?

Can the Secretary of State confirm that the incursion into Iraqi territory by coalition forces is designed to cut off the Iraqis retreating northwards out of Kuwait and does not represent an alteration in the war aims? Will the right hon. Gentleman explain the arrangements being made to assist in curbing the oil well fires? Can he tell the House whether napalm was being used by allied forces and, if so, for what purpose?

Can the Secretary of State confirm whether the Prime Minister was in contact with President Gorbachev at some time between his last statement to the House on Friday and Saturday's deadline? Will he tell us the latest and most up-to-date position of British forces?

Opposition Members give their full support to our troops and the coalition forces at this time of peril. We share their determination that Kuwait should be liberated. We do so not in any spirit of complacency, which would be as foolish as it would be dangerous, nor with any sense of euphoria, which would be as insensitive as it would be inappropriate in view of the dangers ahead; we give that support in a spirit of determination that a victorious conclusion for the military forces of the United Nations can be accomplished as speedily and decisively as possible.

Mr. King: I am very grateful for, and I know that the House very much appreciates, both the content of what the hon. Gentleman has said and the manner in which he responded to my statement. It is no secret that it is of the greatest support to our forces to know the strength of the support right across the House of Commons as they undertake this difficult and challenging task. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for speaking on behalf of his right hon. and hon. Friends.

The hon. Gentleman was right to say that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was in touch with President Gorbachev, with whom he had a 45-minute conversation on Saturday morning. That was part of a wide consultation, including with Presidents Bush and Mitterrand, and the other leaders of the coalition. Indeed, a feature of the coalition has been the close contact that has been maintained, to which my right hon. Friend attaches great importance.

The hon. Gentleman asked particularly about napalm. I am pleased to confirm that it was used and that it proved extremely effective in tackling one of the difficulties in the obstacle belt—the oil-filled trenches to which the Iraqis intended to set fire at a time of their convenience. Instead, we arranged to set fire to them with napalm at a time of our convenience so as not to disrupt the attack. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me the chance to confirm that.

I appreciate also the support that the hon. Gentleman has given for the need to show some restraint at present about the flow of information. There is, of course, acute interest among all of us and the entire country about what is happening, but we must respect the fact that this is a challenging campaign. It has begun well, but we are now entering the critical phase of the land battle and it is vital that we give our forces all support at this time.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure that the House will want to bear in mind what the Secretary of State said in his statement. I propose to give precedence today to those hon. Members who were not called following the statement on Friday. I ask for brief and careful questions.

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware that Back Benchers wish to express their support for the coalition forces, and especially for our own forces, in addition to the support for them that has already been expressed by my right hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill)? As this is Kuwait's national day, does my right hon. Friend agree that it would be appropriate for the House to express its admiration for the conduct of those Kuwaitis who have been allowed to remain in Kuwait in the face of the plunder, looting and terror that has been wreaked on the Kuwaiti people by the armed forces and the secret police of Iraq? Does my right hon. Friend agree that that conduct of Saddam Hussein is another reason why it was right not to delay the ground offensive any longer?

Mr. King: I am very grateful to my right hon. Friend for his support. I am sure that he is right to draw attention to the role and position of the Kuwaitis. I suspect that I was not the only hon. Member who heard that moving comment on the radio earlier today when one Kuwaiti officer was asked whether he felt frightened or any fear: "Why should I? I am going home." Recognition of the fact that the home to which the Kuwaiti forces go has been tragically and awfully disfigured should redouble our determination to see that home liberated at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): On behalf of my right hon. and hon. Friends, may I express to General Sir Peter de la Billiere and all those under his command our congratulations and fervent hopes for a speedy outcome to the land battle with the minimum of casualties? From the properly guarded information that the Secretary of State has given the House, it appears that the allies may be set for a successful military outcome. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that a successful political outcome will depend on a proper judgment as to the time when hostilities should cease?

Mr. King: I am sure that the answer to the last part of the hon. Gentleman's question is yes. We have made absolutely clear where we stand. We are determined to see the United Nations resolutions implemented, and peace and stability restored to the area. Those have been our abiding concerns. I am grateful to the hon. and learned Gentleman and to his hon. and right hon. Friends for their support at this testing time for our forces. We can be very proud of the way they have conducted themselves under the leadership of General Sir Peter de la Billiere. I spoke to the general about 30 minutes ago, and he confirmed that, within the last hour, the first armoured division had taken its first 100 Iraqi prisoners. As the division moves forward, it is coming into contact with more capable Iraqi units. I have no doubt at all that our soldiers will give an excellent account of themselves.

Mr. Michael Mates (Hampshire, East): Will my right hon. Friend, in passing on our congratulations and thanks to all our troops in the Gulf, acknowledge the debt that we owe also to all the staffs in this country—from the people at the Ministry of Defence at High Wycombe to those in depots up and down the country—who have striven to make this operation, which has been a logistical nightmare, such a success? Will he acknowledge also that what has happened in the last 24 hours fully justifies the length, severity and determination of the air assault, which has come under so much criticism in some sections of the media?

Mr. King: We hope that this will be a short, sharp campaign with the minimum of casualties. As my hon. Friend has said, the opportunity to make it so owes a tremendous amount to the success, perseverance, courage and determination of all the air crews. Over the past weeks, those crews performed with great skill to ensure that on the battlefield the balance was tilted in favour of the coalition.

I agree with my hon. Friend that the credits do not stop there. In a very real sense, this has been a team effort. I am thinking, for instance, of the armed service units in Germany that surrendered some of their equipment and provided all the support they could, and of many civilians. Let us not forget how many British civilians are serving in what is a war zone to make sure that our forces, as well as Saudi and other forces, get the support that they need. I am very proud to play whatever part I can in what has been a remarkable team effort.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): Is the Secretary of State aware that, on the very day on which British troops were being committed to battle in the Gulf, a vicious attack was launched on troops in the South Armagh region of the United Kingdom, not very far from where the Prime Minister had displayed such courage a few days earlier? Is the Secretary of State aware that this kind of treachery results from the warped thinking of the republican movement, whose attitude is that England's difficulty is Ireland's opportunity? Is he aware that such thinking and such action can be met only with firm resolution and resolve and that they cannot be dealt with by concessions, any more than can the actions of Iraq?

Mr. King: Bearing in mind the personal threats that have been made against its members, the present Government have done as much as have any Government to make it clear that we shall make no concessions to, and that we have no respect for, terrorism from whatever quarter it comes. I know that that attitude is shared by right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House. The right hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to the fact that in the days before hostilities started, Saddam Hussein sought to intimidate and to threaten terrorism. I think that we can fairly claim that that did not alter our judgment and that it did not lessen one iota the determination of anybody in this House.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): While paying tribute to the courage and skill of the allied forces, may I ask my right hon. Friend to comment on what I hope will have been Saddam Hussein's last speech, in which, following the announcement of the final phase in the campaign to free Kuwait, he called once more for a so-called jihad, or holy war, against the infidel? Can my right hon. Friend confirm that nothing could be further from the truth than the claim that this is a holy war? As he has stated, the allied forces include eight contingents from Arab countries. Those contingents come as representatives of the United Nations to help a small Arab country which was seized by a tyrannical Arab neighbour. For Saddam Hussein—a member of the Ba'ath party, and therefore a non-believer—to make such a claim is surely the sickest of sick jokes.

Mr. King: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the significant Arab contingents taking part in the ground campaign and to the determined way in which they are playing their part. None of those countries believed Saddam Hussein, and it is becoming increasingly clear, with the willingness of so many to surrender, that fewer of his countrymen believe him either.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): Should not our thoughts be going out to those who are prisoners of war in Iraq? In particular, will the Minister make it clear that there will be no end to hostilities until we have a categorical assurance about the safe passage and return of prisoners of war?

Mr. King: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising that point. We have never forgotten the position of our prisoners of war. I am sure that the House shares the concern that the last we saw of them was the pictures of two of our pilots on Iraqi television, and that we have had no news of others. The hon. Gentlemen will be aware that, in the earlier requests about the conditions that we would agree for a ceasefire, we made it clear that the safe and immediate return of our prisoners of war was an absolute requirement.

Sir Michael Marshall (Arundel): Can my right hon. Friend say a word about the extent of Saddam Hussein's scorched earth policy in Kuwait? In particular, can he confirm that the Parliament building has been set on fire? Does he agree that those responsible for such actions should be held accountable when the fighting ceases?

Mr. King: Figures have been given of 600 or 700 oil fires burning in Kuwait. There are reports of a programme of destruction of buildings in Kuwait. I have heard it said that the Parliament building and certain main hotels have been destroyed. Information on this has not yet been confirmed, but it appears that instructions have been given for the wholesale destruction of Kuwait, as I said in my statement.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): The Secretary of State will be aware that the House agrees with that part of his statement in which he said that we must not put lives at risk by giving more accurate information, but what about giving accurate information to families? Will he make sure that all families know whom to contact at all hours of the day and night, because they need reassurance? There is nothing like loneliness to intensify fear.

Mr. King: I agree entirely with the right hon. Gentleman. I hope that that is what is happening. If any right hon. or hon. Members have worries about the arrangements in their areas, I should be grateful if they would first check whether such arrangements are effective. If they have any query or uncertainty, I know that the office of my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces will follow that up. We have made the most thorough arrangements we can to help all the families—and, as hon. Members know, they are not just in this country. The husbands of some 10,000 wives in Germany are away in the Gulf. It is important to remember those families as well.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): Will the Secretary of State take it from me that all right-thinking people in Northern Ireland are behind the troops in the Gulf as they battle for the freedom of Kuwait? Furthermore, they welcome the call of Her Majesty the Queen for the nation to pray, and their thoughts are especially with the contingent of Ulstermen in the Gulf. Can the Secretary of State give us any information about the welfare of that contingent? Can he give us an assurance that it will be the Government's policy to bring to justice those who have carried out the atrocities in Kuwait?

Mr. King: I can indeed confirm that our thoughts are with our forces at this time, and no less with our forces from Northern Ireland. On the information available to me, although I have not yet checked this, I think it probable that the first members of the British forces whom the Iraqi prisoners of war met were from Northern Ireland and I am sure that they were given a good welcome. We support the comments of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Jim Sillars (Glasgow, Govan): Will the Secretary of State confirm that the allied ultimatum, with its reference to withdrawing to the position of 1 August, was quite meticulous in remaining within the United Nations mandate, whereas the Soviet proposal absolved Saddam Hussein not only of the crimes that he committed before Saturday but of the torching of Kuwait and the intensification of the killing of Kuwaiti citizens?

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman makes a perceptive point. There must be many people in Moscow who felt that they were negotiating in good faith but who now feel singularly betrayed by what they have found was happening and what Saddam Hussein's instructions were while Tariq Aziz was in Moscow.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that rumours persist of the most abominable atrocities in Kuwait? Will he welcome the statement made today by Prince Khalid bin Sultan in his military briefing that those responsible for atrocities in Kuwait will be held accountable when the war is over?

Mr. King: Both my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, when the invasion of Kuwait took place, and I have made it clear that all individuals will be held personally responsible for their actions.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Is the Secretary of State aware that there have been excellent co-ordination plans for helping wounded troops from the battlefield to hospital, but that there has been no such co-ordination for counselling, psychiatric care, social services, rehabilitation, jobs and adapted housing for wounded personnel? As those matters are covered by a wide variety of Departments, will the Secretary of State recommend to the Prime Minister the appointment of a special Minister to co-ordinate all those necessities for service personnel?

Mr. King: The right hon. Gentleman may not fully appreciate the work that has been done—and not just in terms of information on casualties. Counselling services, are available 24 hours a day throughout the country on a more comprehensive basis than ever before in our history. I know that all right hon. and hon. Members will welcome that.

Mr. Robert Boscawen (Somerton and Frome): Will my right hon. Friend accept that the best news today is the low level of British and other allied casualties? Will he further accept that battle accidents can cause as many casualties as enemy action? Does he therefore agree that the long training, great skill and leadership that has gone into the preparation for this struggle reflects great credit on our service men and those of the coalition forces?

Mr. King: The whole House will listen with respect to my hon. Friend, who obviously has knowledge of these matters. It is no secret that, even before the tragic accidents which affected United States forces a little earlier in this campaign, we were giving great attention to the risk of accidents to our forces. The greatest possible attention is being paid to avoiding that. Indeed, my hon. Friend will have noticed yesterday that the speed of advance in certain places caused problems and that great care was taken, particularly by Jaguar pilots, to change their targets so as to make sure that there was no risk of such an accident.

Mr. A. E. P. Duffy (Sheffield, Attercliffe): Is the Secretary of State aware that, amid the real qualms that hon. Members will have about a ground war, none can doubt that the allied coalition went that extra mile for peace? Whatever doubts hon. Members may have about the conduct of the war, and whatever their residual anxiety about whether the allied armies will be confined to the clear lines of the United Nations mandate, is the Minister aware that, provided that the UN mandate is observed, there can similarly be no doubt that the allied armies will be fighting a just war, that they will be in the right and that they will include no more formidable an asset than our 1st Armoured Division?

Mr. King: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I heard one of my hon. Friends say that we have gone not one, but 20 extra miles. It is true that we went an extra mile , and an extra mile again, even before the air campaign was launched and yet again with the attempts to see if there could be a resolution before it was necessary to launch the ground campaign. We have tried very hard in that respect. I hope that we shall now see the successful achievement of the United Nations resolutions which, I make it absolutely clear, remains our objective.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, if five armchair generals were to go on television or on radio discussing plans and dispositions, it is likely that the majority of them would propose a staff solution? As that solution is likely to be of interest to the Iraqis, would it not be better for those armchair generals to desist for the safety of our forces?

Mr. King: It is true that because of our air supremacy and strength in other respects, and because of their own lack of communications, the Iraqis are short of knowledge as to where our forces are and their operations. One of the few sources at present available to the Iraqis are radio and television broadcasts. Therefore, it is vital that we do not convey information to them through those media that may be of value.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Was not President Bush's purpose in aborting the last chance of avoiding a ground war, with its attendant casualties, to ensure the destruction of Iraq's military capabilities so as to oblige his ally, Israel, with which there is a strategic alliance and which has wished the destruction of Iraqi forces ever since the Gulf war started?

Mr. King: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman would make that intervention and address those remarks to the Arab members of the coalition, who are bound in our joint actions at this time, but I think that they would regard his intervention as an extremely silly remark.

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): Since the Iraqis have set fire to more than 200 wells, has my right hon. Friend any idea as to the quantity of natural resources that have been destroyed? When the war is over and we are trying to win the peace, will my right hon. Friend consider giving the Kuwaitis, as compensation, part of the Rumailia field that they do not presently own and also part of Zubeir?

Mr. King: The figures of the number of wells that have been destroyed are not absolutely clear at the moment. I understand that what has effectively been lost in the present fires is the current rate of production of oil naturally emerging which does not mean the long-term extinction of the oil reserves.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): Since one of the most powerful arguments for launching the ground offensive was the intensification of the mediaeval barbarity inflicted on the Kuwaiti people by the Iraqi occupying forces, can the Secretary of State assure us that in the current debate about war aims the future safety and security of Kuwait will be high on the list of coalition priorities?

Mr. King: Yes, I can. I have made it clear that we are liberating Kuwait, and we seek to ensure that Kuwait stays liberated. I agree with the hon. Gentleman, because at each stage of this tragic conflict that none of us sought, Saddam Hussein seems to have gone out of his way to confirm us in the rightness of our judgment.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): Does the Secretary of State agree that, if Saddam Hussein really believed that Kuwait was the 19th province of Iraq, the destruction of the oil installations was a peculiar way of showing it? Does he also agree that it is essential that an environmental team should be in train now, ready to go into Kuwait at the earliest possible moment to deal with the destruction of that country's environment?

Mr. King: The hon. Member makes a perceptive and fair first point. As for his second point, I understand that the Kuwaiti Government are working on it now.

Mr. Donald Thompson (Calder Valley): Does my right hon. Friend understand that my constituents have been subjected to a politically motivated peace campaign which has been an embarrassment to people of genuine good will and peace? Does he further understand that most of my constituents wholeheartedly support the coalition and are not much interested in impartiality? They are partial to their own troops and their own side, and they would be angry if they received the sort of so-called impartial reports that the correspondents have lately been sending us.

Mr. King: I have never doubted where the true views of the people of Yorkshire lie. I certainly understand the views of my hon. Friend's constituents. The longer the crisis has developed, the more this country and the world have recognised the need for the action that we are taking; and I have certainly felt that strong support at this difficult time.

Mr. Jim Lester (Broxtowe) rose——

Hon. Members: That is two Conservative Members in a row.

Mr. Speaker: I know. I made a mistake earlier when I called two Opposition Members, so now I am balancing things up.

Mr. Lester: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the military objectives of the coalition forces in Iraq are fully contained within our declared war aims and the United Nations resolutions?

Mr. King: I can confirm that.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): How can anyone seriously claim that this military operation is under the control of the United Nations when the United Nations Security Council has in effect been suspended and the United States of America is calling all the shots and commanding all the coalition forces, including the British forces? How many more young people have to die before the politicians have the guts to tell the military to call a ceasefire and to make every effort through the United Nations to find a peaceful negotiated solution?

Mr. King: The hon. Member could make that contribution only if he refused to believe the evidence of what is happening in Kuwait. I heard him ask how many more young men would die, seeming blithely to ignore the appalling suffering and the outrages that have been committed in Kuwait. How many more people have to die before we can speedily complete this campaign and Kuwait can be liberated?

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): Can my right hon. Friend give the House any idea of the numbers of tanks and vehicles and the quantity of equipment captured by the allied forces? As the campaign draws to a close, as we all hope that it shortly will, will the allied forces continue to give full attention to eliminating military targets which pose a threat to the future safety of Kuwait?

Mr. King: I can confirm that we are continuing the air campaign in spite of the poor weather, seeking to ensure that strategic areas which might be involved in the resupply of the forces in the Kuwait theatre are sufficiently inhibited.

I cannot give my hon. Friend exact figures on the capture of equipment, but just before I came to the House I saw the latest press briefing given by Brigadier General Neale of the United States, in which he gave further figures about substantial numbers of T72 tanks and spoke of tanks in republican guard units now on the move which had been captured or destroyed. However, it is clear that the figure is changing rapidly.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): Does the Secretary of State recognise that many people in this country would have gone the extra mile—indeed, an extra 10 miles—before sending 17-year-olds into battle? What assurance, if any, can he give to those who have expressed concern about sending 17-year-olds with our forces into the land war?

Mr. King: I met a 17-year-old in Germany who was told that he was to be left behind because he was too young to go with his unit. His protests at not being allowed to go with the other forces showed clearly the tremendous morale and mutual support in the regiments and units that went to the Gulf.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my right hon. Friend accept that, whenever there is a conflict, many young Birmingham people are involved—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Those people hope that one clear development will come out of the justifiable and dreadful Armageddon that has overtaken Saddam Hussein and his forces is that it will help to deter other petty Saddam Husseins from embarking on such dreadful adventures, which bring misery to their own people and to the rest of the world.

Mr. King: My hon. Friend has drawn attention to the importance of the position taken by the United Nations Security Council, and to the reason why the Security Council gave authority to member states to use all necessary means to ensure that United Nations resolutions were observed. That is what we are doing, and if our aim is successfully achieved, it will strike a blow for better peace and security in the world in future.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): When all is said and done, do not all of us—in the House and in the country at large—owe a tremendous debt of gratitude to all the allied forces, who are engaged in fighting a monstrous tryanny which invaded, occupied, raped and pillaged a neighbouring country and, even now, continues to permit the foulest of crimes? Those responsible should certainly be brought to justice.

As for the consequences for ordinary Iraqi soldiers, surely the choice now lies in their hands. If they want to save their lives, they should surrender to the allies as quickly as possible—as, indeed, many are doing. Otherwise, many will undoubtedly be cut down and destroyed in battle; they will be dying for no purpose, and on behalf of a regime which holds them in utter contempt.

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman has put very eloquently —as he has done on other occasions—feelings which are, I believe, shared by all hon. Members who see the necessity of facing aggression in this way.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Royal Navy's contribution in clearing mines and protecting United States battleships has been out of all proportion to the size of its force?

Mr. King: I understood my hon. Friend to say that the Navy had made a major contribution. There is no doubt that at present the Royal Navy, and especially with its skills in mine clearance, is playing a leading and crucial part in the amphibious and maritime contribution to the campaign in the northern Gulf.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): We have recently heard statements from the Minister in the Al-Sabah dictatorship that two years of martial law would follow the liberation of Kuwait. We have also heard repeated statements from Britain and America about hopes that another section of the Iraqi army would topple Saddam Hussein, leaving a dictatorship in charge. It is increasingly likely that the allied forces will occupy at least southern Iraq, and will stay for a considerable time. Where are the freedom and democracy for which so many young men and women from this country have been asked to die?

Mr. King: I should have thought that, on this of all afternoons, the hon. Gentleman could express some support for all our constituents who are in harm's way, and whom we wish God's speed in the hope of an early and safe conclusion to the conflict.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): Is it not a fine tribute to the Royal Air Force air crew and ground crew, many of whom come from the north of England, that so many of the targets which could have posed a threat to the ground forces this morning had already been destroyed before the troops arrived there? Will the RAF's continuing quest for the Scud launch sites be continued in the next few days so as to ensure that all those dangerous and mischievous missiles are destroyed?

Mr. King: Yes, the campaign against the Scuds and the attempt to prevent any further launches will certainly continue. It is difficult to obstruct them entirely, but it is clear that the pressure they face, and the risk of detection, have contributed to some of the inacuracy that they have shown and the speed with which they have been deployed and fired.

When the history of this campaign is written, I think that it will be possible to assess just how effective the campaign has been. If my hon. Friend wants me to give a judgment now, I can say that it looks as though the actual achievements are rather greater than some of the earlier estimates.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Given the rapid, encouraging and gratifying advance that has been made, will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that coalition forces are within a few hours at least of the southern Kuwaiti oil wells which are now ablaze? Will the speed of the advance be matched by action to try to extinguish those oil wells?

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman gives me an opportunity to caution the House and to remind it of my statement. The ground campaign has begun well, but we are moving into the critical phase and are encountering forces of greater capability—I do not want to exaggerate or diminish their capability—than those in the front line. In addition, we should recognise that there are a substantial number of them. On the hon. Gentleman's point about environmental considerations, it will be an early concern to extinguish that appalling and nasty blaze.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the risks that our skilled and courageous Air Force has had to take to minimise civilian casualties have been more than justified? Military commanders are carrying out exercises which are essential to prevent Saddam Hussein's military from launching a counter-offensive that could do irreparable damage to the allied forces. There are no military constraints on them doing what is absolutely essential.

Mr. King: My hon. Friend is right. The Iraqis still possess dangerous weapons and capabilities. Every day that the ground campaign is shortened will owe a tremendous amount to the skill and courage of our air forces, whose critically important work has not finished.

Mr. Bruce George (Walsall, South): The speed and rate at which Iraqi forces were captured or surrendered must have exceeded expectations. Is not that a mixed blessing, as it might cause considerable logistical problems for the armed forces? The Secretary of State sent additional forces to Kuwait to cope with the many prisoners expected, but does he foresee sending further troops to cope with what one hopes will be many additional surrendered or captured forces?

Mr. King: No, we have no such plans. The hon. Gentleman paid tribute to the campaign—which owes much, as he will understand, to the meticulous planning that went into it, including provision for medical and hospital facilities for prisoners of war. Extensive arrangements have been made, which I hope will prove adequate for the task.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have another statement this afternoon. I shall call three more hon. Members from each side.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Will my right hon. Friend emphasise that more than 30 countries from as far afield as Argentina, Niger and New Zealand have sent armed services contributions to the United Nations effort in the Gulf? Do not those contributions from such a wide range of countries show that this is indeed a United Nations effort?

Mr. King: That is absolutely correct. The substantial United Nations contribution dwarfs the only other comparable occasion—the Korean war.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): Does the Minister agree with the Soviet spokesman who said that an opportunity for achieving the aims of the United Nations resolution without further bloodshed had been tragically missed? Does he agree that, rather than acting as Little Sir Echo to whatever George Bush said, the Prime Minister should have thrown the weight of this country behind the Soviet peace plan and against the war faction within the American Administration?

Mr. King: The hon. Member said that an opportunity to achieve the aims of the United Nations resolution without further bloodshed had been tragically missed. At that time, Saddam Hussein had given instructions for the total destruction of Kuwait.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the success of the land war so far, which has been due to the great courage of all the troops involved and the remarkable co-operation among soldiers of many different countries. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the events of the past few days have confirmed that there will be peace in the Gulf only when Saddam Hussein is deposed and his military machine destroyed?

Mr. King: Our first objective is the liberation of Kuwait. Our next objective is the achievement of all the United Nations resolutions. We have made that position absolutely clear. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his tribute to the determination of all the coalition forces and to the leadership of General Schwarzkopf, the commander-in-chief, in achieving the excellent progress that they have made so far.

Ms. Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford): Further to the question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill), which I believe remains unanswered, will the right hon. Gentleman tell us clearly where the limits to the war aims lie, now that the land battle has been engaged?

Mr. King: With respect, I have answered that question about four times. There is no change in our position. We have made absolutely clear our commitment to the achievement of the United Nations resolutions.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, because of the professionalism and bravery of allied troops, it must occur even to Saddam Hussein fairly soon that his days are numbered? Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is a danger that Saddam Hussein will seek to vent his anger on Israel, which has been no part of the dispute or war? Does he agree that the coalition must keep an open mind about providing more support for the defence of Israel, should that anger be turned on Israel in further murderous attacks?

Mr. King: I do not think that Saddam Hussein is "about" to vent his anger on Israel—he has made a number of attempts. One of the most appalling features of the situation has been that Israel, a non-combatant country which is not in conflict with Iraq in this matter, has been deliberately attacked by Iraq. We have done all that we can to prevent that. I give my hon. Friend the assurance that our determination to do all that we can will continue.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): My abiding concern is with our front-line soldiers. Several score of my young constituents are serving with the Scottish regiments, and presumably many of those young men are in Kuwait. Despite that concern, I seek an assurance about Iraqi prisoners of war. Given the squalid human rights records of Syria and Saudi Arabia, how confident are the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister that those poor bloody Iraqi infantrymen will be treated by the Syrians and Saudi Arabians in conformity with the Geneva convention—in other words, humanely and compassionately?

Mr. King: All the coalition countries have made clear their commitment to the scrupulous observance of the Geneva conventions and have made extensive arrangements to that end. Representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross——

Dr. Godman: The right hon. Gentleman knows that that is not the truth.

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman says that I know that that is not the truth. The International Committee of the Red Cross has already made visits—it did so before the conflict started—to satisfy itself about the adequacy of the arrangements for prisoners of war. I certainly give the hon. Gentleman my assurance that the British Government have made that absolutely clear. We are anxious that all the coalition countries treat prisoners of war in that way.

Prisons (Woolf Report)

4.23 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Kenneth Baker): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement about the report of Lord Justice Woolf's inquiry into the disturbances last April at Strangeways prison, Manchester, and other prisons. I am grateful to Lord Justice Woolf and to Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons, Judge Tumim, who joined in part II of the inquiry, for such a wide-ranging and constructive report, which includes 12 recommendations and 204 proposals.

The events of last April were unprecedented and unacceptable. Control of one of our largest prisons was lost for 25 days. Significant violence erupted at eight more prisons and at others control was maintained with great difficulty. The country was shocked by the defiance and destruction that we saw nightly on our television screens. I utterly condemn the behaviour of the small minority of the prisoners who joined in that orgy of destruction. As the House will be well aware, 183 persons have been convicted or are now awaiting trial on charges including murder and riot.

The report concludes that some decisions might have been taken differently. Nevertheless, Lord Justice Woolf stresses, and I wish to stress to the House today, that the disturbances were handled with great skill and courage by the prison staff at all levels.

Although Lord Justice Woolf makes some critical comments about the prison service, he also emphasises that the public have every reason to be extremely grateful to the members of the service who over a number of years have shown immense dedication, courage and professionalism. I endorse that judgment.

Immediately after the end of the riot, my predecessor put in hand urgent action. Incidents of this sort must be dealt with firmly and quickly. We have therefore set up a new incident control centre, overhauled contingency plans and clarified the lines of responsibility for dealing with riots.

More staff have been trained in the new and improved techniques of control and restraint that are necessary to handle dangerous incidents. The stock of riot control equipment has been increased. We have completed a review of the physical security of prisons, in particular access to roofs, and substantial improvements have been made.

The country will not tolerate the kind of disgraceful behaviour witnessed last April. We must make clear our utter condemnation of it by introducing a new deterrent. We shall, therefore, as we have already made clear, bring before the House proposals to create a new offence of prison mutiny, which will carry a maximum penalty of 10 extra years in prison. However, Lord Justice Woolf emphasises that we need to balance security and control with justice and humanity and I wholly endorse that view. Guilty criminals have to be punished by the loss of their liberty. Dangerous criminals have to be detained to protect the public.

It is not the purpose of the prison system to provide holiday camps for prisoners, but it is not the purpose of the prison system to provide physical conditions that degrade and humiliate prisoners and strip away their self-respect. Prisons should be places that are austere but decent, and provide a busy and positive regime which prepares criminals for their ultimate release.

Many reforms are already in hand, started by a major programme inaugurated by one of my predecessors, Lord Whitelaw, in 1979. Since 1979, eight new prisons have been built and 13 more are under construction. Over the next two years, 12 new prisons will be opened. The prison population is now some 4,000 below what it was in September 1989. That means that we are in sight of the end of overcrowding. We can now take those reforms a major step further.

I consider that the practice of prisoners having to slop out is degrading and intolerable. It makes it very difficult to run a sensible prison regime and should be brought to an end. The present target is to do that in 1997. Lord Justice Woolf recommends that it should be not later than February 1996. In my view, we can and should do even better. I am now launching a programme to provide all prisoners with access to sanitation day and night by the end of 1994. That programme will cost an extra £36 million over the next four years. I will find half that from existing provision, but I am glad to say that an additional £18 million will be provided.

I also consider that it is wrong for juveniles awaiting trial to be held in prison and I intend to bring that practice to an end.

The report also makes many helpful recommendations about the regimes that we provide for prisoners. We must not forget that while imprisonment punishes the criminal and protects the public, its other purposes are rehabilitation and preparation for a return to the community. Since 1988, there has been a substantial increase in the hours spent on education, from, 5·5 million to 7·7 million. I want to see more prisoners taking up educational courses and training in skills, so that they will have a better chance of leading a life free from crime when they are released. Prisoners must be kept constructively occupied in workshops and other activity, and Lord Justice Woolf makes important recommendations in that area.

Lord Justice Woolf also emphasises how important it is for prisoners to retain their family ties. In my view, it is vital that prisoners maintain that link so that they can assume their family responsibilities on release. It is also the thrust of Government thinking that everything should be done to avoid the break-up of families which can contribute to delinquency and crime. I therefore propose to increase the level of visits to prisoners and extend the arrangements for financially assisted visits for visitors who are on low incomes. I have also decided to increase the opportunities for home leave in open prisons from three times a year to six times a year. I am placing details in the Library of the House.

Lord Justice Woolf points out the value of cardphones, which allow prisoners to retain contact with their families. I am therefore announcing, subject to some limitation for security reasons, that cardphones paid for by prisoners will be provided in all prisons that do not already have them.

Despite the availability of cardphones, letters remain very important to most prisoners. Like Lord Justice Woolf, I believe that the present levels of censorship are unnecessary. I have therefore decided to abolish routine censorship in all establishments except dispersal prisons. Governors will retain, for security reasons, the right to censor.

[Mr. Kenneth Baker]

Those measures represent a major series of reforms, but cover only some of Lord Justice Woolf's recommendations. He makes many other proposals, including the place of the prison service in the wider criminal justice system and the higher management of the service, and I shall give them careful consideration. I propose to issue a White Paper later in the year to take account of those recommendations and chart the direction of the prison service for the rest of the century and beyond.

The changes will transform the living and working conditions of both prisoners and prison officers, but they depend crucially on the managers and staff of the prison service. I have already visited many prisons and have been very impressed with the dedication and concern of the governors and staff whom I have met.

Industrial relations in the prison service have, from time to time, been troubled. The future well-being of the service requires a new spirit of co-operation on all the issues that we face. With that in mind, I saw the trade unions representing all prison service staff earlier today. I very much hope that they will respond in the spirit of Lord Justice Woolf's proposals.

The events of last April marked a watershed in the history of prison service. We cannot, and will not, tolerate the savagery and vandalism in our prisons that we saw then. We have already taken urgent action to remedy deficiencies. Lord Justice Woolf's report recognises that, while prisoners must be held in secure conditions, a decent regime enhances security by making incidents such as those of last April less likely. The Woolf report recommends constructive changes to our prison system which build on the substantial modernisation of the last decade. I have announced today further reforms and more will follow. I commend the report to the House.

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): I begin by offering my whole-hearted congratulations to Lord Justice Woolf on producing a report which can lead to the radical reform of the prison system that this country has needed for so long. The theme that runs through his report is that, although our prison service is generally excellent, it is, all too often, a disgrace to a civilised community.

Like the Home Secretary, I condemn those responsible for the Strangeways riot. Like him, I note that Lord Justice Woolf believes that the prison service dealt with that disturbance, in general, with skill and courage. The important task now is to build on what we have learnt from that unhappy experience. I assure the Home Secretary that we welcome and will support his decision to end by 1994 the degrading process of slopping out. We also support his proposals for improved family visits, better access to families by telephone and letter, and juvenile custody.

Does the Home Secretary agree that the proposal that each prisoner should receive a contract setting out expectations and responsibilities could lead to a penal system that reduces the likelihood of further offences, rather than, as now, making them more likely? That requires the implementation of the whole report, I wish to press the Home Secretary on that, because he has not commented on Lord Justice Woolf's more fundamental recommendations.

I remind the Home Secretary that the majority of the report's proposals were urged on the Government a year ago by the Labour party and submitted in the Labour party's evidence to Lord Justice Woolf's inquiry. In addition to preserving family ties, we recommended a national system of accredited standards; so does Lord Justice Woolf. We recommended a revision of disciplinary procedures, including final appeal to an independent authority; so does Lord Justice Woolf. We recommended access to education, recreation and employment as a right; and so does Lord Justice Woolf. Those proposals were dismissed and derided by the Home Secretary's predecessor. We now look forward to and expect their speedy implementation.

Is it really necessary to wait so long for real progress to be made on those fundamental parts of Lord Justice Woolf's report? We appreciate that some of the structural reforms may take time, but could not the Criminal Justice Bill, which is passing through Parliament and has yet to go to the other place, have its long title amended to allow speedy implementation of at least some of the Woolf proposals? Were the Home Secretary to table new clauses, we would ensure their speedy passage.

How does the Home Secretary propose to implement the proposal that no establishment should hold more than a certified normal level of prisoners? He will recall that recent industrial disputes in the prisons happened because prison officers insisted that exactly that rule should be applied. I therefore ask him directly: is it possible to meet the Woolf requirements on accommodation without reducing prison populations to a far greater extent than the Government now intend? The Home Secretary will recall that we still have a prison population that is, pro rata, far greater than that of any other western democracy and, in the opinion of almost every commentator, far greater than it needs to be or should be.

Finally, I refer the Home Secretary to a paragraph in the report which described the prison service as succeeding "against heavy odds . . . to contain an almost impossible situation by showing immense dedication, courage and professionalism."

The impossible situation to which the report refers is not the Strangeways riot in particular but prisons in general. Since the prison service has acted in general with dedication, professionalism and courage, does the Home Secretary agree that the successful implementation of the Woolf report proposals depends on maintaining the good will of those who are employed in the service? Would not it be absurd to jeopardise that good will by implementing proposals for privatised prisons which are based on nothing more than ideological prejudice?

The Woolf report offers the chance for major reforms of our squalid and socially damaging prisons—reforms that will change them out of all recognition. I urge the Home Secretary to take that chance and to take it at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Baker: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his welcome for the report on the work that Lord Justice Woolf and Judge Tumim have done and for his support for my announcements today.

The right hon. Gentleman raised several matters, the first of which was contracts. It is an interesting idea, but it bears on another recommendation of Lord Justice Woolf —sentence planning. The right hon. Gentleman will know that prisoners in young offenders' institutions and life sentence prisoners now have their sentences planned for them. That may be the most positive way in which to proceed.

The right hon. Gentleman urged me to introduce other changes very quickly. The points that have been made to me by the staff side and by the prison officers whom I met this morning were for a measured programme of reform. They made that point repeatedly. Much is happening in the prison service. Already major reforms are in hand, and I have added some more today. Those people stressed to me the importance of absorbing them and making sure that they work effectively.

As for the certificated level of prisoners in an establishment, we are moving to a situation—we are not yet there—in which overcrowding will come to an end. Over the next two or three years, the increase in places will be 6,000 or 7,000, and that will increase the availability of places to more than 50,000. The prison population this day is just below 45,000. So we are moving towards circumstances in which the supply of prison places will exceed the likely prison population. Of course, that does not mean that overcrowding will be eliminated in all prisons; some local prisons will still have problems. We shall have to work on that, which is why we want the rolling programme in order to end overcrowding.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about good will. I accept entirely that the good will of the staff is needed, and I pay tribute to those I met when visiting prisons. They are dedicated people who are conscious that their job is not only to run secure establishments but to help the prisoners in those establishments. I do not believe that that good will will be sacrificed as a result of the proposal to privatise some types of prisons, because privatised prisons operate satisfactorily in other parts of the world. I do not believe that privatisation will bear on that aspect.

The right hon. Gentleman repeated a point that has been made before—that we have a tendency to lock up more people in this country and that, by some measurements, we have a higher prison population. I asked the statisticians in the Home Office to prepare some papers on those figures.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): To change them.

Mr. Baker: It is of no particular advantage to me to have them changed. As always, I am searching for truth. The chief statistician at the Home Office has done some work on the measurement of the prison population, not only in relation to the 100,000 figure of population, but in relation to the level of crime. On that basis, we do not emerge as the country that has a tendency to lock up more people.

The Woolf report points the way to a better and more positive system of prison regimes in which we can look forward to the possibility of more prisoners leaving prison in a better condition—or at least in no worse a condition —than when they entered.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is no possible justification for the savage violence and wanton destruction witnessed at Strangeways last April? Will he confirm that the ring-leaders will be prosecuted with the full vigour of the law? Does he also agree that, far from the Government's doing nothing, their prison building programme and the measures already contained in the Criminal Justice Bill provide the platform from which Lord Justice Woolf's recommendations for the future of our prison regime can be realised?

Mr. Baker: I echo exactly what my hon. Friend said. The actions that we saw at Strangeways—the defiance, the vandalism and the orgy of destruction—are quite unacceptable. As I said, about 183 prisoners are awaiting charges or have been convicted. Some of them face charges in connection with the most serious offences, including murder and riot. I cannot comment further, because those cases are sub judice, but the action put in hand by my predecessor will ensure that such incidents will not happen again.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Let me express my appreciation of the enormously authoritative and extensive work of Lord Justice Woolf and gratitude that the Home Secretary has seen fit to move rapidly on the specific matters on which he could move rapidly. Why has not the Home Secretary commented on what may be thought to be the central thesis of Lord Justice Woolf's report, which is that there has been a damaging failure of communication among all the agencies in the criminal justice system and that that underlay the appalling episodes that gave rise to the inquiry? I accept that we need time to consider the structural recommendations made by Lord Justice Woolf, but does the Home Secretary recognise that those recommendations are undoubtedly the most important for the future of prison reform?

Mr. Baker: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his comments on the Woolf report. There is already considerable co-ordination between the various component parts of the criminal justice system, and conferences are constantly under way to bring the various parts together. Of course, in preparing the White Paper, I shall look carefully at that point, which is the first in the recommendations.

Sir John Wheeler (Westminster, North): Does my right hon. Friend accept that there will be a wide and warm welcome for the recommendations that he has decided to accept, and for his announcement today? Does he agree that it will be necessary to consider with immense care the details of a report which contains 600 pages? There will be a great welcome for his proposal to publish a White Paper, but does he agree that it should consider both the structure of the prison service and the purpose of imprisonment?

Mr. Baker: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. The wide-ranging nature of the report, which contains more than 200 proposals and 12 recommendations, goes to the very heart of the structure of the prison service and the penal system. I agree entirely that the White Paper must address the structure of the prison service and its management as well as the regimes within prisons. It provides a major opportunity to set out and chart the course of developments for the rest of this century and, indeed, beyond.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): The appreciation of the House is clearly due to Lord Justice Woolf and to Stephen Tumim. What assessment has the Home Secretary himself made, in terms of what happened at Strangeways, of the effect of the wholly inappropriate accommodation there on people who are mentally ill and certifiably so? How many such people were there last April and how many are now accommodated in other prisons due to the lack of other more suitable accommodation? Will the right hon. Gentleman also now urgently reconsider the Government's refusal to recompense the Greater Manchester police force for the full costs of its involvement in the Strangeways disaster?

Mr. Baker: On overcrowding, the report makes it clear that Strangeways prison was seriously overcrowded at the time of the riot; I draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to part I, which deals with that. He asked where prisoners who were not held in prisons were being held.

Mr. Morris: The mentally ill?

Mr. Baker: On the mentally ill, I shall have to write to the right hon. Gentleman.

On the question of overcrowding generally, as a result of the riot, Strangeways will not be able to receive any more prisoners for some time, but K wing has been reopened and was re-occupied in December. That now holds about 190 prisoners and, in mid-May, it is planned to reopen G, H and I wings with integral sanitation. That will bring the certificated normal accommodation up to about 325 places. That will considerably relieve overcrowding, although I am disappointed to tell the House that some prisoners are still being held in police cells. I look upon that as unsatisfactory, even though the figure is well down.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about resources for the Greater Manchester police authority. Payments have been made in respect of some of the special costs involved, including the use of helicopters and the casualty information service that the authority maintained, but the main cost that the authority bore was that of keeping people in police cells. Payments have been made to Manchester police authority in respect of that.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Does my right hon. Friend agree that everyone concerned with the penal system will think this an excellent report and will welcome his commitment not to leave it on the shelf, and especially his realisation that all who work for containment and rehabilitation in the prison service will be able to achieve their tasks only if their work is undertaken in a humane and civilised environment?

Mr. Baker: I accept entirely what my hon. and learned Friend says. The punishment for a prisoner is the deprivation of his liberty. One does not have to add to that circumstances that may lead to degradation or humiliation, which may have the reverse effect of what is required. The philosophy behind the report and behind the thrust of the Government's reforms of prison management is to provide a positive regime for prisoners and ensure that they are involved in education and training. That must be done against the background described by my hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. Robert Litherland (Manchester, Central): The Home Secretary referred to "dedicated" prison staff. Does he agree that it would be outrageous to discipline any member of the Strangeways prison staff who was thrown into a situation last April that was not of his own making, when the real culprits of the piece were the Home Office in general and Mr. Emes especially, who was then the director-general of the prison service, and who overruled the governor's decision when the prison could have been taken the second day, thus saving a lot of misery and a lot of money?

Mr. Baker: When he reads the report, the hon. Gentleman will see that the incident is described in considerable detail, including the events leading up to the riot on 1 April, and the events of 1 and 2 April and the subsequent days. Although it is clear that the governor thought that there should be an intervention when the deputy director-general thought that there should not, Lord Justice Woolf considers that the plan to intervene should have been allowed to proceed. However, his report states specifically that there would have been a serious risk of injury, if not of death, to the members of staff involved, and he explains the reasons why the deputy director-general came to the view that he did.

In response to the hon. Gentleman's first point about disciplinary action, I must advise him that there is no recommendation in the report for disciplinary action against individuals. There may have been errors in what was said or not said or in what was not done, but there is no case for taking disciplinary action.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the whole House welcomes his statement that slopping out is to end by the end of 1994, which is two years earlier than was recommended by Lord Justice Woolf, and carries into effect the recommendations of the Public Accounts Committee? I am sure that all hon. Members will be pleased with that. What steps is my right hon. Friend taking to improve the command centre in London, and what additional training will be given in riot and restraint procedures?

Mr. Baker: The immediate reaction to the report was to improve procedures in the prison service to ensure that, if such an incident or anything similar were to happen again, the management procedures would work more effectively. The incident room in London has been improved and enhanced. The line of command and responsibility has been clearly laid down. In any similar incidents in the future, the governor will clearly be in charge, and his decision could be overridden only by resort to Ministers.

On my hon. Friend's question about control and restraint procedures, such procedures have been developed for about three years now by the prison servive and have been extended. As a result of recent changes, more riot control equipment has been made available. I want more prison officers trained in such techniques.

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): Is the Home Secretary aware that my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland) and I visited Strangeways prison in January during the Christmas recess? We pay tribute to the staff for coping with all the rebuilding work while trying to run a prison. The right hon. Gentleman's tribute to the valour of the prison staff during the riot meets with great approval from the general public. I hope that in due course the Home Secretary will be able to mark their courage in some way, as we do when members of the police and fire services carry out acts of courage.

Will the Home Secretary apply himself to the issue of media coverage and the occasional sensationalism of the television and newspapers? Some of us feel that, as a result of such coverage, some of the prisoners were wallowing in the media spotlight. Will the Home Secretary take a fresh look at that in due course?

Mr. Baker: I do not want to be tempted down the road of censorship, because it would be exceptionally difficult to control the media in such a situation—and, where an event is so visual and obvious, it would not be appropriate. On reflection, I believe that the very fact that it was such a dramatic riot and that it was seen in other prisons encouraged some of the disturbances a week later.

I recognise what the hon. Gentleman said about the staff whom he met at Christmas. They will read his comments in Hansard when it is published, but I pay tribute to them, too. Prison officers are very proud of their work and the more recognition that is paid to them for it, the better—and that is what the hon. Gentleman has done today.

Mr. Chris Butler (Warrington, South): Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind in his forthcoming White Paper the fact that drug misuse in prisons can make the control of prisons difficult? He might even consider introducing the regular screening of prisoners, as happens in other countries.

Mr. Baker: The Woolf report deals with the management of drug abusers in prison, covering those who are drug-dependent when they enter prison and the way in which they should be handled, and the accusations that have been made about the illicit use of drugs in prisons. I agree with my hon. Friend that the recommendations of the Woolf report on that matter are important. However, it is a question not only of drug abuse, but of alcohol abuse. The therapy that is now available for dealing with both should be made available to prisoners who are dependent on those narcotics.

Mr. Terry Fields (Liverpool, Broadgreen): In his quest for truth and honesty, does the Secretary of State agree that the society that has been created by this Government —of poverty, unemployment, despair and homelessness —contributed greatly to the crime figures in this country?

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): That did not cause prisoners to climb on the roof.

Mr. Fields: Is the hon. Gentleman seeking to intervene —[Interruption.] I apologise, Mr. Speaker, for the mutterings from Conservative Members.

Does the Home Secretary further agree that overcrowding dehumanises prisoners and demoralises the prison officers? The Home Secretary used to be the Secretary of State for the Environment, so on another point, has he cast his mind to what he will do with the 14 million poll tax non-payers when they are fined? Will he find places for them?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question is wide of the statement.

Mr. Baker: In replying to a rambling diatribe, I advise the hon. Gentleman simply that, since 1979, this Government have devoted more resources to the prison service than any Government in the history of the British penal system.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): Contrary to what the hon. Member for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mr. Fields) just said, may I advise my right hon. Friend that my experience as a lawyer is that many people end up in prison because they are neither equipped for nor wish to work? In the present circumstances, my right hon. Friend's proposal that prisoners should train and work while in gaol is a first-class proposal. Does he agree that the devil soon finds a use for idle hands?

Mr. Baker: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. Prison regimes should be positive. I have already said that the number of educational hours and the hours spent in training and in workshops should be increased so that prisoners can acquire skills that they can use so that they do not resume their life of crime, but can find a positive job when they leave prison.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): While welcoming Lord Justice Woolf's report, what evidence does the Home Secretary have about health and hygiene and especially about the spread of HIV and hepatitis in prisons? Does he agree that we need an intensive health care programme in prisons? Where immunisation is available, as it is for hepatitis, does he agree that it should be extended immediately to all prisoners who wish it?

Mr. Baker: There is a section in chapter 12 of the Woolf report on the management of HIV, and of AIDS where HIV has developed into AIDS. Certain recommendations are made in paragraph 12.372, to which I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention.

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South): May I join the tributes to the prison staff who faced a dangerous situation with great courage? Will my right hon. Friend remind the House that, despite all the problems, not a single prisoner escaped from Strangeways during the riots, which was a matter of some concern to my constituents who live nearby? While on the subject of public safety, will my right hon. Friend redouble his efforts to ensure that prisoners are removed from police cells as quickly as possible? There is public concern in the north-west on that issue.

Mr. Baker: I agree entirely. No one wants to see in prison cells people who are on remand. It is a totally unsatisfactory practice, and we are doing all we can to reduce its incidence. The highest number of remand prisoners was just over 1,100. This morning there were about 650, mainly in the north-west. Some of the pressure will be relieved when the new Strangeways wings come into operation in mid-May.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): As my right hon. Friend knows, my constituency of Littleborough and Saddleworth, on the outskirts of Oldham and Rochdale, is within the Manchester police area. Does my right hon. Friend accept that my constituents never, never want to see a spectacle such as we witnessed for 25 days at Strangeways prison? The mobility of local businesses and residents was disrupted, and parts of Manchester were turned into no-go areas.

My constituents will be pleased with the Woolf report's recommendations concerning the relaxation of conditions in prisons, and most of them will be delighted at the creation of the new criminal offence of prison mutiny, for which the maximum sentence will be 10 years' imprisonment. I understand that every prisoner, on being taken into gaol, will be informed of that offence and that sentence.

Mr. Baker: I am sure that the new offence will be well known throughout the prison system, and we shall make sure that prisoners know about it. I understand entirely the strong revulsion expressed by my hon. Friend on behalf of his constituents at the events that we witnessed last April. As I said in my statement, such events are unacceptable, and we must ensure that they will not occur again.

Mr. William McKelvey (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): I, too, congratulate the Home Secretary on the speed with which he has adopted some of the recommendations of the Woolf report—especially those concerning changes with regard to slopping out. Will the White Paper refer to after-care for prisoners? Is any consideration being given to the granting of some money to the Scottish Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders and to the National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders? The Scottish association tells me that, at present, it has a very large ove.draft. After-care for prisoners is extremely important if we are to stop recidivism.

Mr. Baker: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his comments about my statement. I shall certainly consider the point that he has made.

Sir William Shelton (Streatham): Will my right hon. Friend accept my congratulations on his report and on his tribute to prison officers? The officers at Brixton prison, which is in my constituency, certainly merit that tribute. Does my right hon. Friend know that a number of juveniles who are in Brixton on remand—I am thinking especially of those in L wing, perhaps remanded for medical reports—find themselves in the most forbidding circumstances? As my right hon. Friend is aware, such circumstances have resulted in suicides. When will he be able to stop this practice?

Mr. Baker: As I said, I regard the practice as unacceptable. I have issued a Green Paper—a consultation document—on the steps that are needed, and I hope to receive representations shortly. Extra resources will have to be provided for secure lock-up accommodation—accommodation not in prisons—for juveniles. I agree entirely that people under 17 awaiting trial on very serious charges—youngsters who are not released on bail—should not be held in prison.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Why does it take a riot to produce reforms of this sort with this degree of urgency? The Home Office must have been out of touch for a considerable time not to have produced the programme that the Home Secretary has now announced. That programme is clearly a consequence of the serious riot.

Does the Home Secretary agree that pettifogging bureaucratic limitations are still being imposed on prisoners? For example, a family who had travelled a long way were turned away because they did not have the right visiting card. The attitude adopted was that the family were at fault. That cannot be helpful. Then there is the case of the prisoner who was forbidden to write a letter in braille to a blind relative. If the new regime that the Home Secretary has announced is to mean anything, such frustrations must be eradicated.

Mr. Baker: If the hon. Gentleman will pass me details of the second case to which he referred, I shall have it looked into. It is not the function of prison governors to introduce pettifogging restrictions. I have emphasised today the importance of prison visits.

The hon. Gentleman says that we are merely responding to the riots. In fact, for a number of years the Government have had in hand measures of fundamental prison reform. When we came to office, the date for the ending of slopping out that we inherited was well into the 21st century. We have provided substantial resources for the prison service, including funds for the largest building programme in prison history. I have been able to anounce today the provision of £36 million of extra money—£18 million of new money—and the ending of slopping out in September 1994.

Mr. Andrew Hargreaves (Birmingham, Hall Green): Will my right hon. Friend accept again the congratulations of Conservative Members on these measures, which are extremely welcome? A number of right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House have mentioned the problem of overcrowding. As a Birmingham Member, I am particularly anxious about Winson Green. Will my right hon. Friend undertake, in the White Paper, to address this problem once again?

Mr. Baker: I certainly give that undertaking. It is a very important matter. One point that the report brings out concerns the problem of overcrowding in Strangeways in the early part of last year. It was a very overcrowded prison. It is now very unusual, as I go round prisons, to find a cell with three prisoners. Some still have three prisoners, but not many. There are cells with two prisoners. Some prisoners prefer to share, and ask for double accommodation. However, we should provide the possibility for all those wishing to have single cells to have them. That is our objective.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Why does not the Home Secretary inject a little honesty into his statement? Everybody outside this place knows that he is making these concessions because of the Strangeways riot last year and one or two other goal riots. The truth is that, when the Tory party was elected, there were three prisoners in every cell. Now, there are three on nearly every roof each summer. The Tory party was elected to set the people free, but the prisoners got out.

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman has not often turned his capacious mind to the question of penal reform. If he had—[HON. MEMBERS: "He has been to prison."] Really? That is most interesting.

Mr. Skinner: I was innocent.

Mr. Baker: Innocent? Well, I am sure that the process did the hon. Gentleman a great deal of good. If the hon. Gentleman follows these matters, he will know that we have introduced a series of prison reforms over the past four or five years. If he would like copies of all the documents that have been produced by myself and my predecessors, I shall be happy to send them to him. Then he will be able to recognise the true reforming nature of this Government when it comes to prisons.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): Does my right hon. Friend accept that hardly anyone who has visited a prison does not welcome his positive reaction to this report? Even with the placement of long-term prisoners outside local prisons, and even with the improvements being made by the Criminal Justice Bill, there must still be some qualms about the ability to meet the requirements regarding certificated normal accommodation in a prison such as Lewes, where there will still be many remand prisoners because the courts send them there. Can my right hon. Friend assure the House that he will liaise most carefully with the Law Officers, with a view to seeing that the law, as administered by the courts, matches his reforming zeal?

Mr. Baker: I accept entirely what my hon. Friend said. Much depends on the sentencing policy followed by judges and magistrates. The Criminal Justice Bill, which we shall be considering in a few minutes, makes major changes in sentencing policy. The main purpose is to ensure that people who are in prison for serious offences are likely to stay there longer. By the same token, those convicted of less serious charges should not go to gaol at all. That is the whole purpose of the bill, and it will have particular relevance for the populations in local gaols like Lewes.

Ms. Hilary Armstrong (Durham, North-West): Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise that, whenever there is a problem in prisons, one of the first things to disappear is the opportunity to work or to take advantage of education? When I last visited Durham prison, where one still sees dehumanising conditions, virtually no education or work was being undertaken by the male prisoners. However, I was impressed by the new work regime in which female prisoners were involved. They wanted a commitment that that could be extended to other prisons. Can the Home Secretary reassure the House that, in moving to the elimination, by 1994, of the appalling practice of slopping out, the Government will not jeopardise the other aim of enabling prisoners to have a fruitful work regime and other educational opportunities?

Mr. Baker: The practice of slopping out is one of the biggest disruptions to the prison day. It takes half an hour per time, and if prisoners slop out four times a day, it completely destroys the planning of a sensible prison day to include visits to workshops and education facilities. Ending slopping out is important for a whole series of reasons. As to education, I remind the hon. Lady that we have extended considerably the amount of time available for education from some 5 million to nearly 8 million hours a year.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Prisoners get only three hours a day.

Mr. Baker: It depends on which prison one goes to. A fortnight ago, I was in a prison that had completely new facilities in the education wing. We are investing heavily in education—[Interruption.] The Opposition are in a dilemma. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] If they are not, I shall make sure that they find themselves in one. We are engaged on a major programme of reform, and we are providing the resources for it.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): I welcome my right hon. Friend's positive response. Did the report say anything about more sentence planning for adults as well as young offenders? Is there not greater scope, in the judicial system, for judges who send people to prison to ensure that the regime to which they send them is appropriate to their needs?

Mr. Baker: I am very sympathetic to the recommendations of Woolf on sentence planning. This already operates in institutions that deal with young offenders up to the age of 21 or 22 and for those who have life sentences. Sentence planning is a sensible idea, because a prisoner can be given a map of what is available to him and what can be offered to him while he is in prison. That is an attractive idea.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): The humane measures that my right hon. Friend has announced will be greatly welcomed the other side of the balance to the toughening up of the parole system that was announced earlier. They are also essentially an extension of the prison building programme that he and his predecessors have undertaken. Will my right hon. Friend ensure that, when reforms are introduced, prisoners are so organised that they will respect them, rather than, as happened in Strangeways, destroying some of the better measures that had been introduced there before the riots? In the category C prison in my constituency, Send, these reforms will be welcomed. Will my right hon. Friend do his utmost to bring forward the White Paper quickly so that we can have the benefits of what is proposed this afternoon as soon as possible?

Mr. Baker: I shall try to do it before the end of the year. I am glad that my hon. Friend presses me in that way. I visited the prison in his constituency, Send, which has a positive regime, set in place by the prison officers and the governors. It is a small but effective prison. I accept my hon. Friend's point about the importance of a positive regime. That lies at the heart of any reform of the penal system.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): May we be quite clear on one point? The Opposition are congratulating everyone associated with the Woolf report, not the Home Secretary. Is he aware that these proposals are the most comprehensive for penal reform this century? It is not clear from his remarks that he is aware of that. Does he not understand that the report is a clear and damning condemnation of the direction of Government policy over the past 12 years? It is no good throwing money at the prison building programme and introduced privatisation in prisons, when the Government's philosophy on penal policy is so wrong. If the Home Secretary does not realise that, he has not been honest with the House.

Can we push the right hon. Gentleman on this? Is the Home Secretary clearly accepting the philosophy of Woolf? We demand to know that. The more we push the Home Secretary, the more we find no categorical commitment to that philosophy. There have been opportunities—as there were when we debated the Criminal Justice Bill last Wednesday—for the Government to accept measures to reduce the number of people in prison. The Government rejected moves to take fine defaulters and the mentally ill out of prison. Is it not about time that the Home Secretary realised that this is his opportunity to make or break his reputation as a Home Secretary?

Mr. Baker: What the hon. Gentleman said about fine defaulting is wrong. Woolf makes positive recommendations on that. One consequence of the Criminal Justice Bill —the unit fine system, which is the method of collection through attachment either of earnings or income support —is that it will ensure that in future there will be much less fine defaulting. The hon. Gentleman should screw up a little generosity, as some of his hon. Friends have, and recognise what we have done. They are kind-hearted people, and I hope that he can be as kind-hearted.

Ravenscraig Steelworks

5.16 pm

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"British Steel's decision, announced last Friday 22 February, to reduce Ravenscraig steelworks to single furnace working."

The matter is specific, in that it relates to the closure of the blast furnace and steel-making capacity, on which undertakings were given by British Steel and announced by the responsible Ministers in both Houses of Parliament at the time of privatisation of British Steel in 1988. Those undertakings, relating to the continued operation of the works and to the offer for sale of the steel-making facilities in the works should British Steel no longer require them, have not been fulfilled, and they must be.

The matter is important because the closure will mean the loss of 1 million tonnes of steel-making capacity, which British Steel cannot do without, given the continuing trade deficit which today's figures have shown extending further. It will reduce Ravenscraig to a level of working from which it will be difficult to recover, greatly increasing the likelihood of an early cessation of steel making in Scotland.

Locally, in my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid), it will bring to almost 3,000 the total of steel job losses this year, with probably over 5,000 further job losses among suppliers, contractors and local businesses. It will be a shattering blow to employment in Lanarkshire and Scotland generally, for which the Government have made no preparations.

Finally, the matter is urgent because the decision has immediate operational implications at the plant for closing down a blast furnace, which will be irreversible.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter which he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"British Steel's decision, announced last Friday 22 February, to reduce Ravenscraig steelworks to single furnace working".

I listened with concern to what the hon. Gentleman said about this matter and the impact that it will have on his constituents. As he knows, I have to decide whether to give it precedence over the business of the House set down for today or tomorrow. I regret that the matter that he has raised does not meet the criteria of Standing Order No. 20. Therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

Tin Mining (Cornwall)

5.18 pm

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the withdrawal of Government support for Carnon Consolidated."

The Government are ending their financial support to Cornwall's last tin mines, Wheal Jane and South Crofty, which will mean 415 redundancies and the end of tin mining in Cornwall. The decision of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—it is his personal decision—to cut the lifeline to the tin mines is appalling. It comes as a tragic blow to all those concerned about the mines, and in particular to those who will lose their jobs.

The Government had promised a further £4 million loan to the mines, but suddenly broke the commitment unexpectedly late last Friday. As they had invested £23 million in the mines so far, to pull out now just to save £4 million is senseless and, considering the social security benefits and redundancy payments that will flow from this, it is hard to see any logic in it.

Tin is at its lowest price ever, and the position can only improve. As a result of the Secretary of State's decision, the mines will not be given a chance. Wheal Jane will be flooded, which will make it unopenable, and South Crofty will go on a care and maintenance basis, which will leave none of the existing employees with an outlook for secure employment. Those job losses are especially tragic because they are unnecessary and come at a time when job prospects in Cornwall are extremely bad. It is a sad day for those who will be made redundant, and my sympathy goes to them and their families.

The Government have behaved disgracefully and irresponsibly. For more than a year, they have engaged in discussions with the management of the mines about how to keep the mines open. Suddenly and unexpectedly to withdraw support, late on a Friday afternoon when no representations could be made and without notice, can be described only as disgusting. The Government deserve to be held in contempt. They should have to come to the House to explain their action. I would have expected them to make a statement, but as they will not do so, I hope that you, Mr. Speaker, will bring them to the Dispatch Box to justify their decision.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the withdrawal of Government support for Carnon Consolidated."

Again, I regret that I must give the hon. Member the same answer that I gave the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray). I regret that the matter does not meet the requirements of the Standing Order, so I cannot submit his application to the House. In the light of what he said, I hope that he will have other opportunities to bring the matter before the House.

War Aims

5.21 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20 for the purposes of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the clarification of war aims in the Gulf."

This is not a posturing effort. With the best will in the world, a statement in the House is insufficient. If the House is to do its job, it should have a three-hour debate on such a matter.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) asked specifically about war aims on the Secretary of State's statement, she was told that there was no change in the position, that the question had been answered four times and that she had better look at the United Nations resolutions. There is considerable confusion, even on the basis of the answers of the Secretary of State for Defence. I adduce for your consideration, Mr. Speaker, just four succinct points.

First, the United States military commanders are saying that it is essential to go into Iraq. Whatever the merits of such a policy, it is not consistent with the Egyptian or Arab coalition members' interpretation of United Nations resolutions. Secondly, when my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) suggested that Saddam Hussein had to be brought to justice, the Secretary of State for Defence assented. On several occasions, it was stated that all individuals had to be held responsible for their actions. In short, the Commons should debate the issues raised by John and Ann Tusa in their article on war crimes in The Times. It opens up Pandora's box.

Thirdly, when the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) said that Kuwait had to be liberated, the reply was that Western troops might well be involved in keeping Kuwait liberated. That goes against the professed views of Iran and the whole background of peace and stability being restored to the area. The House would want to know how, especially in terms of the photochemical smog.

Finally, Perez de Cuellar described the Russian peace proposals as a unique opportunity. It looks to some of us as though the Russian peace proposals have been scuppered, as the Peruvian peace proposals were scuppered by the sinking of the Belgrano during the Falklands war. The Secretary of State for Defence said that the Russians had been betrayed in good faith. This is a matter of timing that should be explained. The real nub of the matter is that some of us fear that our country is being sucked into a war near Greater Baghdad.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the war aims of the coalition in the Gulf."

As the hon. Gentleman knows, under Standing Order No. 20, I have to announce my decision to the House without giving any reasons. I have listened to what he said, but I regret that I cannot submit his application to the House because it does not meet the criteria of the order.

Orders of the Day

Criminal Justice Bill

Not amended, (in the Committee) and as amended (in the Standing Committee), further considered.

Clause 26

THE PAROLE BOARD

Amendment made: No. 17, in page 19, line 30 at end insert—

'(6A) In subsection (6) above the reference to protecting the public from serious harm from offenders shall be construed, in relation to offenders convicted of violent or sexual offences (within the meaning of Part I of this Act), as a reference to protecting members of the public from death or serious personal injury, whether physical or psychological, occasioned by further such offences committed by such offenders.'. —[Mrs. Rumbold.]

Clause 27

DUTY TO RELEASE SHORT-TERM AND LONG-TERM PRISONERS

5.26 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mrs. Angela Rumbold): I beg to move amendment No. 18, in page 19, line 42 leave out 'person' and insert 'short-term or long-term prisoner'.

This is a technical amendment to correct an error in the Bill. It would leave out "person" and insert "short-term or long-term prisoner". As the Bill is drafted, the clause would apply to all prisoners released on licence, which it cannot do. It can apply only to those serving determinate sentences—not to life sentence prisoners who have indeterminate sentences. Therefore, it makes no sense to talk of the three-quarters point for those people. The amendment corrects the anomaly by ensuring that clause 27(3) applies only to short-term and long-term prisoners.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 39

ALTERATION BY ORDER OF RELEVANT PROPORTIONS OF SENTENCES

Mrs. Rumbold: I beg to move amendment No. 19, in page 25, line 24 after 'provide', insert—

'(a) that the references in section 27(5) above to four years shall be construed as references to such other period as may be specified in the order;

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): With this it will be convenient to consider Government amendment No. 20.

Mrs. Rumbold: These amendments give effect to an undertaking which we gave in Committee when we discussed clause 27. We were concerned about the threshold between the automatic and discretionary release scheme which is set at four years in the Bill by way of the definitions of long and short-term sentences. Some of my hon. Friends expressed concern about the four-year period. They were worried that some of the offences committed by people serving shorter periods might require us to have another look at this clause. In Committee we undertook to consider an amendment which would enable the Home Secretary to take a power to vary the threshold.

That threshold could be varied upwards or downwards in the light of the new scheme, but I do not anticipate that that will be necessary in the foreseeable future. My hon. Friends were right to ensure that we had the advantage of retaining flexibility when drawing up the new arrangements. The amendments will allow an adjustment in the important threshold if Parliament believes that that is necessary, and transitional arrangements could be made were Parliament of that mind.

5.30 pm

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): We are worried about Government amendment No. 19, although we have no quarrel with Government amendment No. 20.

Those of us who served on the Committee will remember that the amendments were a concession to the right of the Conservative party who succeeded in what can only be described as a mini-coup.

Section 27 is the key section in implementing the proposals for parole. One of the most positive features is that parole will be automatic for those serving less than four years, and that the discretionary scheme will apply only to those serving four years and more.

In Committee, we welcomed those parole proposals, although we tabled an amendment to ensure that those subject exactly to four years automatically gained parole. Our amendments were in line with what the Carlisle committee decided after much thought.

The Carlisle committee report is of historic importance, and it was considered immediately prior to our discussions on the Bill. We believe that it is crazy, having established a powerful committee to look at a particular problem, which considered that problem in great detail and with much expertise, for the Government then to muck around with the detail of that committee's recommendations.

The thrust of the Carlisle report will be ruined if we start to tinker with the four-year rule. I hope that the Government will not bend any further. We do not like amendment No. 19, and we should like them to have second thoughts about it. It would be far more sensible to keep to the Carlisle recommendations.

As ever, we are the reasonable Opposition—we oppose the amendments not on ideological grounds, but because the Carlisle committee issued a good report. If one tries to mix and match that report with other things, its overall effect will be spoiled.

The Carlisle committee stated:

"Our conclusion is that a four year sentence provides the most sensible threshold beyond which a selective parole system should operate . . . We have come to the conclusion that the two or three year threshold that many have suggested would be too low . . . First, for a selective scheme to be credible there must be sufficient time for new considerations to emerge . . . The shorter the period between sentence and review the more likely it is that the parole decision will be based on no more material than that available to the judge. Second, if the selection process is to be thorough and fair yet not excessively cumbersome and costly the number of cases must be kept to manageable proportions."

We do not want to delay proceedings on this, and we shall not seek to divide the House, but we are unhappy that the amendments could give the Government the ability to tinker with the recommendations of an extremely good report.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for tabling the amendments. I am not entirely sure that the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) got his facts right when he described me as on the right of the party.

I do not agree with what the hon. Member for Huddersfield said about has interpretations of the Carlisle recommendations. I support the amendments because the Bill is introducing something that is entirely new—an automatic, conditional release system. We hope that the courts will use that system in line with a greater certainty on sentencing. We do not know whether four years is the right cut-off point; only experience will show what works in practice.

It would be a mistake not to allow my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to vary the four-year rule either upwards or downwards. I would have great doubts about him varying that rule upwards, although there may be a case for varying it downwards. It would be a mistake to enact the Bill without that power to vary. On the basis of that consideration, I welcome the amendments, which I hope the House will support.

Mrs. Rumbold: It is clear that the Government regard the Carlisle recommendation of the four-year threshold as the right one. None the less, my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), supported in particular by my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Janman) cited some significant figures that made the Government think that it would be right to include an order-making power that could be brought into play in the light of experience in those circumstances where we felt it would be better to have a threshold that was either higher or lower than the four years. For that reason, the Government tabled the amendments.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 20, in page 25, line 26, leave out 'specified in the order' and insert

'so specified.

(1A) An order under this section may make such transitional provisions as appear to the Secretary of State necessary or expedient in connection with any provision made by the order.'.—[Mr. John Patten.]

Clause 43

NOTICES OF TRANSFER IN CERTAIN CASES INVOLVING CHILDREN

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. John Patten): I beg to move amendment No. 108, in page 27, line 7, after 'alleged', insert '(i)'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 109, 113 and 112.

Mr. Patten: The amendments are a direct result of some good debates in Committee on this important issue. They are concerned with trying to help child witnesses in criminal proceedings in two ways—first, through the ability to bypass committal proceedings as set out in clause 43 and, secondly, by placing a bar on personal cross-examination of witnesses by the accused.

I remember that my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) argued about this specific issue in Committee, although much of the argument was carried by those who are absent this afternoon, including the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones)—I believe in being kind to Welsh nationalists—my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton), who is about her business in another part of the country, and that leading member of the Trappist tendency, the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding). That hon. Lady pressed the argument effectively, and I pay tribute to all that she did.

I hope that I can commend the amendments with that brief explanation. They will do a great deal to help child witnesses in terms of bypassing committal and avoiding cross-examination by the accused.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I hesitate to intervene in these proceedings as a Member representing Scotland, but I have a couple of questions about the amendments.

Has the Minister had any discussions with his right hon. and hon. Friends in the Scottish Office on the implementation of such measures in Scotland? I speak as someone who has sought to change the law of Scotland on child witnesses. I did so last year during our deliberations on the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill. Unfortunately, I was unsuccessful. The amendments will determine the status of children and the protection given to them in what can be the most harrowing of circumstances. It is unfortunate that English legislation is well in advance of developments in Scottish legislation. On behalf of the Scottish children caught up in these dreadful circumstances, I must express my deep regret about that.

Two cases pending in Scotland involve the most harrowing instances of sexual abuse against a number of young children, some of whom were only two or three years old when the horrible incidents took place. Nevertheless, children in Scotland caught up in these dismal circumstances will be denied the protection rightly afforded to English children in these most welcome measures. It is a disgrace that identical legislation for Scotland has not been introduced. What discussions have taken place between the Home Office and the Scottish Office on bringing about these welcome changes in Scottish legislation?

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): My right hon. Friend will know of my long-standing interest in this matter, and particularly of my association with the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, which has been concerned about the way in which children have been subjected to the process of appearing in court proceedings. I warmly welcome the clauses in the Bill which, to a large extent, implement the recommendations of the Pigot report. There was a gap in the law with respect to expediting proceedings involving witnesses.

I thank my right hon. Friend for the courtesy with which he received me and my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton), who advised me today that she was unwell and could not be with us. Together with the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding), we discussed these matters, and the Government amendments meet our anxieties.

The Minister will have noticed amendments Nos. 98 and 99 on the Order Paper; perhaps he will confirm that the Government amendments deal with the points contained in those amendments—and are no doubt better drafted than ours. If they do, I shall not move amendments Nos. 98 or 99; of course, if the Opposition Members whose names those amendments also bear wish to speak to them, that will be up to them.

I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for accepting the recommendations made to him on this matter.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Will the Minister say a word about some other matters touched on in the Pigot report? For instance, should there not be a code of practice governing the giving of evidence by children? Do the Government believe it possible to introduce measures to prevent unnecessary delays in court cases that involve this sort of children's evidence?

Mr. John Patten: Is the hon. Gentleman referring to the generality of the Pigot committee's recommendations when he speaks of codes of practice, or is he referring specifically to speeding up court hearings?

Mr. Maclennan: I am referring only to the giving of evidence by children.

Lastly, the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children has also mentioned the need to ensure that no distinction will be made between children who have suffered abuse and children who have witnessed serious abuse and violence—but I suspect that the Government amendments take care of that.

5.45 pm

Mr. John Greenway: I too should like to record my thanks to my right hon. Friend for tabling these amendments. I am sure that he will recall that, when we discussed the matter for many hours in Committee, we did not manage to persuade him of the validity of our arguments, but he agreed to reconsider the matter, and that is what he has done. We are most grateful to him. I fervently believe that the law should protect a child witness as much as it protects a child victim. Indeed, it is often difficult to distinguish between them.

Mr. Sheerman: We welcome the amendments. It is a shame that two of the hon. Members who argued most eloquently for the ideas that they incorporate are not here. I understand that they are unavoidably detained in Select Committees. I refer of course to my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding) and to the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones).

These are important concessions to the Pigot proposals, extending as they do the protection offered to child victims to child witnesses. This subject constituted the most harmonious part of our proceedings in Committee. All hon. Members in Committee wanted as far as possible to make the process of giving evidence in court humane and sensitively handled. The Opposition are pleased that the amendments have been introduced.

Mr. John Patten: First, I want to answer the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), the first part of whose constituency I can never pronounce. He asked me whether discussions had taken place between the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Scotland on these important matters. Of course the two Departments consult on these issues. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Scottish criminal law and criminal code have developed differently from ours, which means that, from time to time, Scottish, English and Welsh law look a little out of kilter. Indeed, my hon. Friends occasionally look with envy at some aspects of the Scottish criminal code. For instance, children's panels are often urged on us; we are thought to be lagging behind in that respect, although we are now trying to achieve the same ends in a different way.

I shall draw the hon. Gentleman's remarks to the attention of the Secretary of State for Scotland, and, if necessary, he and the hon. Gentleman can correspond thereafter.

I reassure my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) that the Government amendments adequately cover the possibility of getting around committal, and of not making it possible for children to be cross-examined by those alleged to have assaulted them. I pay tribute to my hon. Friends the Members for Chislehurst and for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton), and to the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy), who is not here today but who takes a considerable interest in the subject.

I also pay tribute to the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding), who was not here earlier to hear my lavish compliments about how she broke the Trappist vows of the Whips and occasionally went to the Back Benches in Committee to argue the case for children. Her arguments, and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), were powerful. As the House knows, we are a listening Government; we listened and then we tabled the amendments.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) asked whether we were going to introduce a code of practice governing children's evidence. We are. We are already negotiating, if that is the right word to use, these issues with members of the academic community: for instance, with Professor Bull, a notable authority in the area; and with Mr. John Spencer—just to show how broad-minded I am in these matters—fellow of Selwyn college, Cambridge, even though he has occasionally criticised me in print. He is also an expert, and I have not taken offence. We are bent on employing him, if he is willing to advise us within the strict terms of the Bill, on how to incorporate a practical measure for children's evidence.

I repeat: we are a listening Government and a broad-minded Government, and on this occasion we are a Government with whom the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) was happy to do business on an issue in which party politics played no part. I am happy to pay tribute to him and his colleagues for the part that they played in Committee in dealing with these important matters.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 109, in page 27, line 8, after 'committed', insert

'; or

(ii) to have witnessed the commission of the offence,'.—[Mr. John Patten.]

Mr. John Patten: I beg to move amendment No. 110, in page 27, line 9, leave out from 'that' to 'by' and insert

', for the purposes of avoiding any prejudice to the welfare of the child, the case should be taken over and proceeded with without delay'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this we may take Government amendments Nos. 111 and 120.

Mr. Patten: The amendments form the second part of the Government's response to the debate in Committee about the need to reduce undue delay in cases involving child witnesses. During our scrutiny of the Pigot clauses, the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones) moved a new clause that formed the basis of much of the debate. Despite my considerable sympathy with his intentions and those of my hon. Friends, I was unable to accept the new clause exactly as it stood, because it imposed a strict timetable in criminal cases which I felt could lead to the guilty walking free if it was not adhered to to the letter. The amendments would not impose a strict timetable, but would, I believe, establish a clear framework for the elimination of unnecessary delays.

Clause 43 already gives the Director of Public Prosecutions power to bypass committal proceedings if he is satisfied that the case should be taken over by the Crown court without delay. Amendments Nos. 110 and 120, however, strengthen that principle by referring explicitly to the welfare of the child, and I think that a number of hon. Members will approve of that. They also impose a clear duty on magistrates courts and the Crown court to consider how best to avoid delay. For the magistrates courts, that means expediting their residual tasks under schedule 5.

The amendments effectively abolish the argument that is sometimes advanced by those involved in the criminal justice system, that they are not responsible for the delay. They are now responsible for minimising it: the amendments bring that into sharp focus. The amendment will, however, allow judges, who have the often difficult task of dealing with children—whether they are victims or witnesses—to tailor any action to the needs of individual cases, balancing the legitimate interests of child welfare with those of natural justice.

The remaining amendment simply corrects a minor drafting error.

Mr. Sheerman: Yet again, we accept and endorse the Government's proposals. As we said in Committee, delay is often an important factor. In Committee on any Criminal Justice Bill, we increasingly realise the need for better co-ordination between the separate parts of the system: Opposition Members want to reform that relationship, and to expedite the processes involved. Justice that takes a long time is justice delayed, and, sometimes, is not justice at all.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 111, in page 27, line 18, leave out '3 and 4' and insert '2 and 3'.—(Mr. John Patten).

Clause 47

RESPONSIBILITY OF PARENT OR GUARDIAN FOR FINANCIAL PENALTIES

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): I beg to move amendment No. 82, in page 31, line 38, at end insert—

[Mr. Alun Michael]

'(1A) After subsection (2) of that section there shall be inserted the following subsection.

'(2A) In taking the decisions required by subsections (1) and (1A) above, the court shall have regard to such of the following considerations as appear to it to be relevant, that is to say—

(a) whether the parents have neglected to exercise due care and control of the child or young person and whether any such neglect has caused or contributed to the commission of the offence.

(b) whether it is desirable that the child or young person himself should assume responsibility for payment of the sum.

(c) the relationship of the child or young person with his parents and the likely effect on that relationship of ordering the sum to be paid by the parent or guardian.

(d) the respective means of the child or young person and the parent or guardian.

as well as to any others which appear to be relevant.'.'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this we may take amendment No. 83, in page 32, line 31, at end add—

'(5) No court shall exercise its powers under this section in regard to local authorities, except in those cases where the local authority has been negligent in the conduct of its duties as defined in paragraph 2 of this section or has acted unreasonably, given the circumstances of the case.'.

Mr. Michael: The Minister must answer a simple and basic question: does he, and do the Government, accept that it is wrong to punish the innocent? If he accepts our amendment, he will ensure that no parent who is innocent of any blame, and no social services department that has done its job properly, will be punished or penalised.

Amendment No. 82 proposes that, in deciding whether a parent should be required to pay a fine, the court should have regard to a number of considerations that may be relevant. The first is:

"whether the parents have neglected to exercise due care and control of the child or young person and whether any such neglect has caused or contributed to the commission of the offence."

The second is:

"whether it is desirable that the child or young person himself should assume responsibility for payment of the sum."

The third is:

"the relationship of the child or young person with his parents and the likely effect on that relationship of ordering the sum to be paid by the parent or guardian."

The fourth is:

"the respective means of the child or young person and the parent or guardian".

Any other relevant circumstances should also be taken into account.

That, surely, is an entirely correct and reasonable approach, which has been supported by the Government themselves in Home Office circular to courts No. 3/1983 entitled "Criminal Justice Act 1982: Sanctions Against Parents and Guardians". The 1982 Act stipulated that fines should be paid by parents unless the court considered that that would be unreasonable or the parent could not be found. Paragraph 3 of the circular states:

"During the passage of the Bill, considerations which might be relevant to the question of whether it would be unreasonable to order payment by the parent or guardian were discussed. It was suggested, for example, that regard should be had to factors such as whether the parents had neglected to exercise due care and control of the child or young person or whether any such neglect had caused or contributed, whether directly or indirectly, to the commission of the offence; whether it was desirable that the child or young person himself should assume responsibility for the payment of the fine, compensation or costs, or for part of it; the relationship between the child or young person and the parent or guardian and the likely effect on that relationship of ordering that the parent . . . pay the sums".

The Government should surely support the principles contained in the amendment.

In view of the emphasis that the Government have placed on parental responsibilities, it is important for them to state on the face of the Bill that they are willing to protect responsible parents. If they agree that the court should consider the criteria that I have specified, the criteria must be included in the legislation, rather than relegated to a paragraph in a long-forgotten circular of some eight years ago.

In come cases it will be appropriate to oblige parents to pay fines imposed on juvenile offenders, but in many others such a course might be both unreasonable and harmful. In some cases, when a young offender is at odds with his parents, the resentment resulting from the imposition of a fine on the parents—who may already be at the end of their tether, especially when the family is poor —could damage family relationships still further, placing the young person more at risk than ever, and perhaps leading to the commission of further offences.

In some instances, magistrates may consider that, if the fine is to have any value, that will lie in its being paid by the child himself rather than in his parents relieving him of the financial responsibility. I know from my own court experience that that frequently arises. In other cases, the parent may have done all that could reasonably be expected to discipline and control the young person, but without success. All parents will have found occasionally that their best efforts have not succeeded. The Minister may claim to be a perfect parent, but most of us would probably admit to being fallible from time to time.

It is important that the courts should be required to consider those potential pitfalls when deciding whether to impose a fine on the parent of a juvenile offender. The amendment does not, of course, prevent the court from considering any other factors which may be relevant. It does not prevent the court from placing an obligation on a parent if it is right and proper to do so. It does not mitigate parental responsibility, but it protects the innocent parent and ensures that courts take into account circumstances in which placing a burden on parents would be detrimental. The Minister will surely not disagree with that.

When the issue was debated in Committee on 24 January, amendment No. 82 was grouped with others and the Minister did not comment specifically on it. Today, he must comment specifically on its merits, and I hope that he will simply accept it.

Amendment No. 83 says:

"No court shall exercise its powers under this section in regard to local authorities, except in those cases where the local authority has been negligent in the conduct of its duties as defined in paragraph 2 of this section or has acted unreasonably, given the circumstances of the case."

The amendment limits the circumstances in which a local authority can be required to pay a fine. The clause is far too broad, because it is unreasonable to expect local authorities to pay fines for the offences of juveniles if they and their employees have acted appropriately and professionally. Home Office circular No. 3/1983 is relevant, and the same considerations should apply to local authorities.

The Government recognised that in their White Paper, "Crime, Justice and Protecting the Public", which states that the Government will require local authorities to pay financial penalties when juveniles in their care are convicted of offences and

"the court is satisfied that the offence followed a failure by the local authority to carry out its duties."

The amendment requires that that statement be included in the Bill, which places no clear statutory obligation on courts to consider whether the local authority has been negligent or unreasonable and to impose a fine only if an authority has been shown to be at fault.

The assumption in clause 47—an assumption that seems to be in the minds of some of the Government's more right-wing Back Benchers—is that local authorities should always be able to prevent offending by juveniles in their care. That shows little awareness of the reality of caring for those young people, many of whom are persistent young offenders who were taken into care because of their parents' inability to exercise due care and control. The damage caused to those young people may work through to absconding and associated offending. The local authority, which was not responsible for the offending, is left to pick up the pieces.

The Government seem to have turned the cause and effect relationship upside down, and instead of recognising that those young people are in care because of their offending are blaming the local authority for it. I hope that the Minister will put that right.

There are dangers if fining local authorities becomes the norm. It could lead to local authorities reducing home leave and family contact with children in care and it could be detrimental to the young person. There may be increased security in children's homes, at the expense of caring and rehabilitative regimes. I hope that the Minister will agree that a failure to rehabilitate young offenders will increase the long-term threat to the public, and that it must be avoided.

Young offenders may find it amusing and gratifying to see their social worker fined for their behaviour. They may be encouraged to feel that they can break the law with impunity.

Mr. John Patten: The Bill does not say that individual social workers will be fined. The local authority will be at risk for not fulfilling its responsibilities.

Mr. Michael: The local authority would not be fined for not fulfilling its responsibilities—that is the whole point of my argument—but the amendment seeks to correct that. If the Minister meant what he just said, he will accept the amendment. The amendment aims to provide for what he just suggested; by accepting it, he will make life a lot easier.

Young offenders may find it amusing and gratifying to see their social worker fined for their behaviour. If local authorities are punished, that pressure will be passed down the line. I am sure that the Minister understands what I mean by that. Having worked with young offenders, I can assure him that such amusement is a real danger. It is important that the Bill be amended to provide what the Minister has just suggested. I hope, therefore, that he will accept the amendment.

Mr. Patten: I did not want to intervene, because the hon. Gentleman speaks from much personal experience, but for once, uncharacteristically, he seemed to be factually incorrect. He said that individual social workers would be at risk financially; it is important that he should not continue to say that.

Mr. Michael: I take the Minister's point, but he surely understands that, if local authorities, whatever they do and however professional their social workers or correct their systems, are in danger of being forced to pay fines, immense pressure will distort the regime in which social workers work with young people. Young people will rapidly become aware of that and of their ability to play games with their social workers.

The Minister must take that danger seriously. In his first intervention, he suggested that, under the Bill, social services departments would be placed under a burden only if they failed in their duty. We tabled the amendment to correct that. I hope that the Minister, by his intervention, was accepting the amendment. A local authority should be responsible for financial penalties only in specified circumstances when it has acted negligently or unreasonably. That was what the Minister said, that is what I say and that is the purpose of the amendment.

In Committee, the Minister said that there was some protection to local authorities under section 55 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933. However, that section is merely on whether it would be unreasonable to fine in the circumstances. Amendment No. 83 goes much further and defines the conduct or misconduct of the local authority as the factor that leads to a fine being imposed.

The amendments are reasonable and fair. They will ensure that innocent parents and effective local authorities will not be in danger of being forced to pay, while allowing a culpable parent or local authority to bear the burden of a fine. How can the Minister possibly refuse that? He almost seemed to concede my point in his intervention, but he must at least assure us that the principles that I have set out will be observed absolutely in the operation of the Bill when it is enacted.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): The points made by the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) link with the Home Secretary's statement on the Woolf report. Everyone is talking about parent responsibility, but allowing parents to avoid it. In the statement, all we heard was about the poor life of prisoners. So far as I can remember, no one deigned to mention how victims suffer or to make the obvious point that people are in prison by choice—they choose to go there when they break the law, and we should not be too concerned.

We should take great care about making parents responsible for their children's actions, but the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth seemed to be looking for a way out. If some of the hoax telephone calls of the past week were made by children under the age of 17 or 18, and if their parents knew that their kids had access to the telephone, is the hon. Gentleman really saying that we should not worry? If a child had been involved in making those hoax phone calls, a three-month sentence for him or his parents would not be justified—the minimum sentence should be five years, with deportation for any foreigners.

The essence of the point being made by the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth is that we must look for ways to enable parents to avoid their responsibilities. Would he say that they were not paying due care and attention if they were watching television while their 12 or 14-year-old was thumping a policeman at a football match? Should we say, "Those parents did not know that their child was at a football match, so we should not worry"? I am glad that we are making parents responsible. Instead of creating loopholes to enable parents to get off, we should tighten them to ensure that they do not.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): I welcome the clause and support the amendments. I have never been entirely happy with the principle of vicarious criminal liability, which seems to have been embodied in the law for a long time. It does not lead to a need for a court to investigate the degree of parents' criminal liability. The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) assumed that parental liability was involved in all circumstances in which a person committed an offence. That should be demonstrated, argued and proved before a court. One of the benefits of amendment No. 82 is that it would make it necessary to argue before a court the extent to which parents should be liable for the misdeeds of their children.

It is clear from the passage read out by the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) that the Home Office has in mind precisely those considerations which are encapsulated in the amendment. Including them in the Bill would have the virtue of leading to the facts being considered. It may be that that consideration is given, and will be given, in many courts through the presentation of social work reports and so on. If there is a specific requirement along the lines proposed in amendment No. 82, a court will be in no doubt about whether parents are culpable to such an extent that they should be held liable to pay.

Similar considerations apply to amendment No. 83 with regard to the alleged negligence of local authorities. If local authorities are held to be liable, that involvement should be tested. They should not be held to have been negligent without the evidence having been considered by a court. The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington assumes that, if the children involved are in care, the local authority is responsible for their misdeeds, but that assumption severes the connection between the offence and the person who committed it. That cannot be in the interest of justice. I hope that the Government will accept these sensible amendments.

Mr. John Patten: I was greatly taken by what my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) said about hoax telephone calls by juveniles and adults. The House views with revulsion and distaste the hoax telephone calls to the emergency services in recent days, which in certain circumstances could lead to serious injury or loss of life if the emergency services had been diverted. This is a disgraceful habit in the country at large. It is punishable by imprisonment.

My hon. Friend said that the penalties were not severe enough. He must take credit for bringing to our attention the need to consider this issue. Although I shall not table amendments to the Bill, I shall undertake a review in the Home Office of the penalties that can be imposed on those demented people who make hoax telephone calls about devices, causing chaos not only to the emergency services but to the travelling public. Under the present law, the courts are stamping down hard on that behaviour, and I hope that the House welcomes that action. Perhaps we should arm the courts with tougher measures to deal with such people.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington made another important point when he talked about the importance of parental responsibility. I believe that my Conservative colleagues would respectfully agree to disagree with the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) about vicarious penalties. We are talking about those who have charge of children and young people. Whether they are parents, step-parents, grandparents or local authorities, they should bear their share of the responsibility by paying fines if the children involved cannot do so.

Alas, there is no clearer sign of the division between Conservative Members and the Opposition than the long debates in Committee on these issues. We had to agree to differ. It is a pity that the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland could not be a member of the Committee. We genuinely missed him, although we have heard on Report some "footsteps" of what might have been a lengthier speech in Committee. We shall have to agree to differ, because the amendments dilute the principle of parental responsibility on which the Government place great weight.

Mr. Maclennan: Anyone listening to the right hon. Gentleman or reading his speech later may be forgiven for overlooking the fact that he and the Government have diluted the principle of parental responsibility by changing the 1933 Act. It is a question not whether one dilutes the principle but whether one should define the circumstances of the dilution, which is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. Patten: The hon. Gentleman has forgotten three fundamental limbs of the Bill: first, that we expect parents to be in court when their children are tried; secondly, that we expect parents, guardians and social services departments to pay the fines; and, thirdly, that we want the courts to have a considerably enhanced power to bind over parents to use their best endeavours to prevent children offending. If that is dilution, I am surprised at the hon. Gentleman's uncharacteristic misuse of language.

In all cases, before a parent could be ordered to pay a fine, the court would have to think about several factors, such as whether the offence resulted partly from a failure to exercise parental care and control and what effect making the parents pay would have on family relationships. The court would have to take a view on those factors and presumably—although it is not for me to say—that view could be challenged on appeal. That means that obstacles would be placed in the way of the operation of section 55 of the 1933 Act, and the clear principle that it embodies.

When we discussed what is now amendment No. 82—to which allegedly the relevant Minister did not refer in Committee—either the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) or the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) quoted from paragraph 3 of Home Office circular No. 3/1983 on the Criminal Justice Act 1982. As the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth pointed out, paragraph 3 suggested that the courts might want to take account of certain factors—which have been reproduced in amendment No. 82—in deciding whether to make the parent or guardian pay a fine.

There is a world of difference between giving guidance to courts in various ways about those matters that they should consider—which we do all the time as a matter of sentencing practice—and requiring them by statute to take account of those and other considerations in every case. That would result in an inflexible approach and would considerably slow down justice.

I turn now to amendment No. 83. The purpose of clause 47(2) is to bring local authorities within the scope of the law on the parental payment of children's fines in section 55 of the 1933 Act. Local authorities that are prepared to take children into care should face up to, and meet, the same responsibilities as parents. Many do so, but, alas, a few do not. My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington thinks that a good number do not.

We should be clear that clause 47 will apply to local authorities only under certain restricted circumstances. The Government firmly believe that those with parental responsibility must expect to face the consequences. The hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth quoted from that excellently written White Paper, "Crime, Justice and Protecting the Public". He was right to state that we propose that the parental payment provision should apply to local authorities only where

"the court is satisfied that the offence followed a failure by the local authority to carry out its duties."

That is broadly the purpose of the Opposition amendment.

However, on reflection, it is not right to take that approach. It would give the courts an impossible task to perform before they could require a local authority to pay a fine. The courts would have to conduct a trial within a trial to determine whether the local authority had been negligent. That would turn into a mini-public inquiry into the procedures of the social services department in question. Youth courts are not equipped to do that, nor should they be asked to do it.

We believe that it would be better to give local authority social services departments, which try hard in many areas to do a good job, the protection already afforded by section 55 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933. Section 55 provides an exception to the parental payment requirement where

"It would be unreasonable to make an order for payment, having regard to the circumstances of the case."

That means that, where local authorities had properly carried out their responsibilities, courts would not be required to make an order against them. On the other hand, where local authorities had failed in their duties, the courts would be empowered to make a direction.

The approach followed in the Opposition amendment is unnecessary and counter-productive. Clearly there is a yawning gap between the Opposition and the Government, and I do not believe that we will be able to cross that gap easily.

Mr. Maclennan rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. The hon. Gentleman has already spoken. He would require the leave of the House before he could speak again.

Mr. Michael: I agree with the Minister and the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington in their characterisation of hoax telephone calls, especially where those calls receive the oxygen of publicity. Those calls can be tremendously damaging to society, but they have nothing to do with the amendment.

The amendment is simple. Do the Government accept that it is wrong to punish the innocent? In a schizophrenic speech, the Minister made it clear that he does not care if the innocent are punished. In a characteristic speech, the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington showed, as he showed in Standing Committee, that he has extreme views. He is not interested in the effectiveness of the sentence in reducing crime in the future and in protecting the public. He is interested only in fanning the flames of his own prejudice.

Under amendment No. 82, a parent who is negligent or is somehow to blame can be made to bear part, or all, of the burden of the fine. For half his comments, the Minister appeared to agree with Home Office circular No. 3/1983, which sets out the reasonable principles upon which the courts should operate. If the amendment were accepted, it would provide clear guidance to the courts. It would not constrain them. The amendment does not suggest that parents who share responsibility or the social services departments, which through failure, share responsibility, should not share the burden of payment.

The amendment is extremely fair, reasonable and simple.

Mr. Maclennan: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Minister is creating a considerable smokescreen? He is trying to give some of his more atavistic Back Benchers the impression that he toughening up, but he has really imposed a power in place of a duty in respect of those aged over 16, and in that respect he has misled the House.

Mr. Michael: That is absolutely correct. The Minister either agrees with circular No. 3/1983, in which case he can accept the amendment without difficulty, or he agrees with his hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington, and if he goes to that extreme, he will destroy any reputation for reasonableness and liberality that he worked so hard to gain in Standing Committee.

At the end of the day, the Minister does not care whether the innocent parent or local authority is punished. By failing to restate with great authority the recommendations in circular No. 3/1983, he has introduced an element of doubt.

I am certain that we will return to the amendment, perhaps with greater understanding and knowledge, in another place, and to allow that to happen, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 48

BINDING OVER OF PARENT OR GUARDIAN

Mr. John Patten: I beg to move amendment No. 114, in page 32, line 32, leave out from 'Where' to end of line 36, and insert

'a child or young person ("the relevant minor")'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 115.

Mr. Patten: The Government believe very strongly that parents have the single most important responsibility for ensuring that their children grow up to respect the law. Just before Christmas, the Home Office conducted a public opinion survey through the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys. I could have been knocked down by a feather by the results, which showed, that with regard to preventing crime, the general public point the finger not at the Government, the police or schools, but at parents. The survey showed that 53 per cent. pointed the finger at parents. If we had conducted such a survey five or 10 years ago, there would have been a completely different response. There is a considerable sea change in the country. The Government have recognised it, and we are doing all we can to use that considerable change in public opinion away from the dated and outmoded concepts of the 1960s and 1970s.

Mr. Dicks: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, if the amendment does nothing else, it concentrates the minds of parents about their responsibilities and about where their kids are while they sit around with their feet up watching television?

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend is right. Nothing brings that home to me more sharply than the police telling me that, in 1988, 8,000 events happened that would otherwise have been crimes committed by children aged nine and under, who were therefore below the age of criminal responsibility. Some of those events were quite serious. My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington has it game, set and match on the basis of that statistic.

The responsibility of parenthood begins when children are very young and it continues until they are on the edge of maturity and of becoming responsible adults. That parental responsibility for children's behaviour does not cease when children get into trouble—quite the reverse. It is precisely because their children have got into trouble that parents should become involved. It is then that the firm hand or the quiet word can make all the difference.

Clause 48 ensures that parents are involved at what is inevitably a very difficult time for their children. For those under 16, we believe that it is correct that courts should have a duty to ensure that parents are involved, by binding them over. Many 16 and 17-year-olds will also need a firm hand and guidance if they are to succeed in keeping out of trouble. However, many will be living independent lives, and it would not be right to suggest that parents should take responsibility for their behaviour.

Clause 48 states that there is no cut-off point between being a child and being an adult. Some people mature at different rates between the ages of 16 and 17. There are tough, yobbish, thuggish 15-year-olds and wimpish 16 and 17-year-olds who deserve to be treated like children.

The proposal in clause 48 complements the other proposals relating to 16 and 17-year-olds. Amendments Nos. 114 and 115 strengthen those provisions further by removing inconsistencies in drafting which, I should be the first to state, were identified by the hon. Members for Huddersfield, (Mr. Sheerman) and for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett). I seem to be paying compliments to Opposition Members who are absent this afternoon.

In Committee, the hon. Members for Huddersfield and for Denton and Reddish mentioned several important matters which should be reconsidered. The hon. Member for Huddersfield argued that the distinction that clause 48(1)(b) makes between 16 and 17-year-olds living at home who are in full-time education and 16 and 17-year-olds who are not, is artificial. A 16-year-old who is living at home but is not in full-time education may be equally or more in need of parental guidance than a 16-year-old living at home and in full-time education. Although the subsection was simply intended to take account of the practical limitations of parental influence over young people who live at home, I accept that the link with full-time education is, perhaps, artificial. I should not want to include in the Bill provisions that inadvertently encourage young people to leave school, home, or both at the same time.

6.30 pm

I also share the concern expressed by the now absent hon. Member for Denton and Reddish, who explained how linking the power to bind over a parent to the age and circumstances of the offender might allow a devious-minded 16-year-old to get around the provision by delaying conviction proceedings. That is why the Government have decided to table amendments Nos. 114 and 115, which would achieve the desirable end of empowering the court to bind over the parents of any 16 or 17-year-olds, when they consider such action helpful and sensible. The court would remain under a duty to do that where the child was under 16.

The amendments deal with two of the fears expressed by the hon. Members for Huddersfield and for Denton and Reddish, and will further improve the provisions regarding the sentencing of 16 and 17-year-olds and the encouragement of parental involvement. I commend them to the House.

Mr. Randall: I am grateful to the Minister for his compliments about the way in which Opposition Members made proposals. He made some nice comments about the Opposition's ability to argue rationally in Committee.

The amendments remove the absurd proposal that parents of 16-year-olds living at home and in full-time education can be bound over to prevent their children from offending. The inconsistency is that parents may be held responsible for young people who have stayed on in full-time education and who live at the parental home, and may be bound over to exercise proper care and control over the young person. However, if a young person is over 16 and is in work, is unemployed or has left home, the parents cannot be held responsible. Clearly, that is absurd.

I noticed that, every time a concession was made in Committee, the Minister left the Room to allow his right hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold) to deal with it. It is nice to see him conceding such a major argument on which amendments were tabled by the Opposition, but the consequence is that the superb speech that I was going to make on amendment No. 97 no longer needs to be made.

Mr. Patten: That is why I made the concession.

Mr. Randall: It means that I have had to make the speech that I would have made for amendment No. 97 in this debate.

The Minister's concession is good news because it means that we shall not have to debate amendment No. 97.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 115, in page 32, line 39, leave out

'falling within paragraph (a) above'

'where the relevant minor has not attained the age of 16 years'.—[Mr. John Patten.]

Mr. Sheerman: I beg to move amendment No. 90, in page 32, line 41 at end insert—

'(1A) In exercising the powers conferred by this section, the court shall have regard to such of the following considerations as appear to it to be relevant, that is to say—

(a) whether the parents have neglected to exercise due care and control of the child or young person and whether any such neglect has caused or contributed to the commission of the offence,

(b) whether exercising the powers conferred by this section would reduce the likelihood that the child or young person himself will accept personal responsibility for his actions,

(c) the relationship of the child or young person with his parents and the likely effect on that relationship of exercising the powers conferred by this section, as well as to any others which appear to be relevant.'.

The amendment lays down the criteria for binding over parents of juvenile offenders. Although the Labour party takes the subject of parental responsibility extremely seriously, we have different ways of expressing it.

I do not wish to interfere with your judgment, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I thought that the Minister's important remarks about hoax calls were rather out of order. However, we agree with him about the wickedness of such behaviour. It is important to make hoaxers realise that the technology now exists to catch them and that increasingly sophisticated telecommunications equipment means that they will be caught and penalised. Stopping young people offending in the first place is far more effective than dealing with them afterwards. The most effective way to ensure that they do not offend is to make sure that they know that the probability of their being caught is high.

Although we believe in parental responsibility, our notion of it is rather different from that of the Government. The amendment lays down the criteria for binding over parents of juvenile offenders. In Committee, the Minister often said that we are having our cake and eating it, because we do not like the clause on parental responsibility any more than we like the privatisation of prisons. When we realise that we shall not win a vote on the principle of an issue, we try to improve the clause and that aspect of the Bill, even though we disagree with the principle. I hope that the Minister does not come back with his tired old chestnut in response to the amendment.

It is important to emphasise that the inclusion of such criteria would go some way toward reducing the serious disquiet that the clause causes to those who work with and sentence juvenile offenders. The clause disturbs expert opinion in the criminal justice system and that is, in itself, disturbing. As we said earlier with reference to Lord Justice Woolf's report, it is important to work with the people who maintain and run the system. If the magistrates, the Crown prosecution service and the magistrates' clerks do not like a proposal, there is little chance of making it a success.

We predict that the clause will be stillborn. It provides that, when a juvenile is convicted of an offence, the court must bind over the parents unless it is considered that that would be unreasonable. The parents would be bound over in a specified sum up to £1,000 and, if the child re-offended, the parents would be liable to forfeit that amount. In effect, a binding over amounts to a suspended fine. Binding over requires the parents' consent, but the clause empowers courts to fine parents who refuse to be bound over, which renders the idea of consent entirely academic. It is a strange piece of legislation—a sort of Catch 22. I could think of a ruder expression, which I probably should not use because it might be unparliamentary. If someone does not obey the legislation, he has the right to protest, but he will have to pay anyway. The parents will always have to pay.

"to take proper care of him and exercise proper control over him"

Magistrates are extremely concerned about the possible effects of the clause and the Magistrates Association has made known its strong opposition to the proposal. In its comments on last year's White Paper, "Crime, Justice and Protecting the Public", the association referred to "the harmful effect these proposals could have in hastening a breakdown of family relationships".

"Parents may feel that they are being punished twice for one offence of their child".

It is sad that we in the House can easily become divorced from the reality of parenting which is not normal, but marginal. As a student of economics many years ago, I was interested in the marginal concept. We made judgments on marginal utility and marginal demand. When dealing with the criminal justice system, it is important to remember that it impacts most on the marginal family that is just holding itself together with a little bit of luck and making its way through a crisis.

The Minister and the Government have not realised —but magistrates and probation officers do—that to fine parents in many of the families of which we are talking this evening could be the last marginal straw in breaking up that family. That may not concern the Minister, but it concerns the Opposition. We do not want legislation that destroys families instead of binding them together. We do not want more children being forced to live rough in London rather than staying at home because the feeling within the family has become so bitter that they leave home. The clause would help to do that.

The Justices' Clerks Society opposed the clause in its comments on the White Paper and cited a number of additional practical reasons for its concern. It said:

"We oppose the proposals relating to the binding over of parents to take proper care of children and to exercise proper control over them. We foresee protracted hearings where parents refuse to be bound over and it is our view that a fine on a recalcitrant parent would be inappropriate . . . We also believe that the introduction of the requirement will inevitably lead to more contested juvenile cases, particularly where parents were already subject to a bind over. Even where the offence is admitted or proved, proceedings in relation to whether or not the parent (and if so which one) should forfeit the recognisance will lead to further, often disputed, hearings."

Anyone who is familiar with magistrates courts will know that justices' clerks are the most experienced in such matters, spend all their time in courts and give advice to magistrates. They are central to the role of the magistrates courts. I should have thought that the Minister would take more notice of their views. Unfortunately, the clause is driven by the unacceptable right of the Conservative party. I do not know whether the legislation on parental responsibility was made in some hidden, smoke-filled room of the Monday Club—we all know what a disgraceful organisation that is—or by another of the secret right-wing societies in the Conservative party.

Magistrates already have the power to bind over parents in most cases, but they use it in only a handful of cases a year, because they know that in most cases it will not work. The Minister will have another chance in a moment, but in Committee he adeptly sidestepped my question about why, if the power already exists, magistrates do not use it. Will the Minister come back to explain why our contention is wrong? We believe that the power will not be used and that clause 48 will be stillborn. If the Government continue to pass legislation on the basis of ideology rather than what is good and workable, they will bring the criminal justice system into disrepute. It is bad to base law not on human behaviour, but on political ideology.

We believe that making parents forfeit money will increase the pressure on many families for whom life is already a struggle and penalising parents for their children's actions will cause enormous resentment. Where there is already tension between parents and child, it will aggravate relationships still further, putting young people even more at risk. In all too many cases, that is likely to accelerate the trend for parents to throw their children out of the house and swell the growing ranks of young homeless.

The clause is opposed by organisations representing magistrates, justices' clerks, probation officers and social workers, all of whom fully accept the importance of parental responsibility and are actively concerned to find effective ways of reinforcing it. They are the professionals who care about parental responsibility, not some nice little middle-class group, tucked away and working at a distance from the real problems of our country. It is all very well for the nice, tidy, middle-class minority, but the parents with whom we are dealing are the ones for whom the professionals know the reality is different.

I shall quote from a truly revolutionary, red source, The Times. The argument against the clause was summarised in a leading article on 10 November 1990—perhaps Conservative Members hold their breath—which stated:

"This is the kind of proposal that makes perfect sense to middle class ministers."—

[Interruption.] The nice, middle-class Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food does not want to listen—I cannot think of anyone nicer or more middle-class.

The Times leader talked about

"middle class Ministers, who generally leave the taming of adolescence to their children's boarding schools."

How true that is. It would be lovely to see some of the Cabinet sending their children to ordinary, public sector schools. The article continued:

"For, say, the single mother in Brixton, struggling against odds to keep a young person on track, they represent only a threat. Many such parents will be tempted to wash their hands of their responsibilities. Parental influence—the last, best hope of deflecting the youngster from a life of crime—will be removed. The magistrates do not want these powers. Parliament should not force them to have them."

The Government have made it clear that they are determined to press ahead with the proposal despite widespread opposition. By accepting the amendment, they could at least reduce the damage that it is otherwise likely to cause families. I make a last plea to the Minister to think again about the clause, because it will help to destroy parents, families and responsibility.

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Croydon, North-West): I declare an interest as a solicitor. The clause has nothing to do with nice middle-class Ministers, the right wing of the Conservative party or the middle classes, but a lot to do with sound sense. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) has known me for some years and knows that I am on the left of the Conservative party. The hon. Gentleman might think that I am one of the soggy ones. I inform him that the clause appeals to the whole range of thinking throughout the country. It is not from a Tory think tank.

The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) talked about punishing innocent parents. When a youngster commits a crime, I am not even sure whether there is such a thing as an innocent parent. Parents have responsibility for what their children do. Anything that hon. Members can do to reinforce parental responsibility must be welcomed.

I was surprised to hear the hon. Gentleman say that the Magistrates Association was against the clause. I can speak only anecdotally, but almost to a man, the magistrates whom I have known over the years have said that they wanted stiffer powers to make sure that parents were held more accountable. I have appeared in courts many times as an advocate for youngsters aged 15, 16 or 17. Sometimes the parent will be present in court, and he will be asked, "How do you explain the crime that this 17-year-old committed? He was drinking in pubs and then got involved in violence at 10 o'clock at night." That parent may say, "It's up to him. His own time is his own. I don't bother about where he goes after school." Without a doubt, such a parent should be bound over and held accountable for that offence. Another parent may say, "I thought that my son was at the youth club, because that's where he said he was going." Clearly, it would be unreasonable to punish that parent. The courts will be sensible enough to deal harshly only with parents who display an attitude that shows that they could not care less.

I sometimes wonder whether we should extend parental responsibility to those in loco parentis. What about all the young men and women from all social classes who are at fine boarding schools such as Eton and Harrow? Those schools are in loco parentis during term time. The head teachers should be taken to the local magistrates court if one of their 17-year-olds is caught out on a drunken spree. I say that seriously, because schools take their in loco parentis role very seriously. They should be included in the legislation. We must do whatever we can to reinforce parental responsibility.

Mr. Maclennan: The Government have been at some pains to show that they do not wish to fetter the discretion of the judiciary. They used that argument most powerfully in the debate on the sentencing council but, exceptionally, in respect of this clause, they appear to want to fetter the discretion of the judiciary and to do so in circumstances that are opposed by all hon. Members who have representative roles in the administration of the criminal justice system.

This is a bad clause. Clearly it will be honoured in the breach more than in the observance. It is a bad clause because it removes from the court the right to consider the appropriateness of doing what it may wish to do by imposing upon the court a duty that it must discharge unless it thinks it unreasonable so to do. The amendment would remove the sting of the clause by describing the circumstances in which it would be unreasonable to do so. If the Minister argues that there is some discretion, it would be appropriate to acknowledge the wisdom of describing the circumstances in which the discretion should be exercised. There has been considerable debate about this matter, but I hope that, even at this stage, the Minister will not seek to trumpet the Government's concern for parental responsibility as being greater than that of hon. Members who take a different view about how parental responsibility is best reinforced.

The House is aware of the importance of parents in minimising behaviour that leads to crime and of the crucial role that parents can play. However, it cannot be right to impose upon parents a duty that excludes the particular circumstances of cases before the courts. If it were right, I do not believe that those who administer the criminal justice system and have responsibility would unanimously believe that the Government have got it wrong.

Mr. John Patten: The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) cannot have read the Bill. We are not in Standing Committee—the Bill is being considered on Report. The reference to reasonableness is there for all the world to see. It is on page 32 of the Bill. Clause 48(1)(b) uses the words,

"to exercise those powers unless satisfied that it would be unreasonable to do so".

The courts have all the opportunity they need to take into account that which is reasonable and that which is unreasonable.

There is nothing onerous on the courts or on those who come before the courts. Rather, there is a great opportunity, as mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Malins) in a speech that was not only robust but was founded on his experiences in dealing with such issues in the courts. There is everything to be said for having that binding-over power not to punish but to prevent future crime. That is what we are attempting to do.

To use a phrase that I can remember being used by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he was Home Secretary, we are trying to ensure that children grow straight rather than crooked. If, by the intervention of the courts trying to encourage parents to take their responsibilities more seriously, children can be prevented from continuing to grow crooked, that is a very good thing. This measure has nothing to do with punishing parents but everything to do with trying to persuade them to take their responsibilities seriously and with preventing future criminality.

Mr. John Greenway: I spoke to a magistrate only the other day in relation to a case in which a child of only 14 was persistently playing truant. The father did not know that the child's truancy had gone on for six months, and it was subsequently discovered that, during those periods of truancy, many minor but nevertheless serious offences were committed. I am absolutely convinced, as is my right hon. Friend, that it is important to confront the parent with the reality of what the child is up to. That is the real benefit of the measure.

Mr. Patten: As my hon. Friend says, this measure brings the parents slap up face to face with their responsibilities. I was interested in the idea of my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West that we should bring head teachers face to face with their responsibilities, too. I do not think that that is a matter for this Bill, but it is food for thought for a future Bill. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science is very concerned about truancy. We in the Home Office are worried about truancy. If we can deal with the truancy problem more effectively, we can not only prevent offending but bring up children who will perform better and achieve better in school.

We had long debates on this issue in Committee. Of course I take into account the views of the Magistrates Association and of justices' clerks as expressed by their national organisations, but there are about 27,000 magistrates in the country, and their views vary widely. Many magistrates strongly support our view.

Mr. Dicks: We are legislators; we protect the public. We do not legislate for the best interests of magistrates, magistrates' clerks, probation officers or social workers.

7 pm

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) will recall that, all through the Committee stage, the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) kept talking about "the lobby" and holding up and reading from bits of paper which referred to the lobby's views. As my hon. Friend said, we are legislators, and we act in the public interest. We take into account the views of national bodies, which are important, but we must make up our own minds.

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) and I disagreed many times in Committee, especially about his attack on magistrates, which he withdrew. The Minister said that there were 27,000 magistrates and that their opinions differed widely depending on which clutch one talked to. If the measure is so popular, why is not it currently used by magistrates in more than a handful of cases?

Mr. Patten: The present legislation is not drafted in such a way as to encourage its use. We intend to introduce an integrated package of powers along the three particular tracks to which I referred earlier. That package, together with much more training for the magistracy in these matters, will lead to the much greater use of those powers by magistrates courts—and a good thing, too.

Amendment No. 90 is similar in intention to amendment No. 82. My reasons for opposing it are identical to those which I adduced in opposing amendment No. 82. Similar objections arise. I cannot accept the amendment, and I urge the hon. Gentleman to withdraw it.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Clause 51

ATTENDANCE CENTRE ORDERS

Amendment made: No. 40, in page 35, line 43, at end insert:

'(6) After subsection (5) of that section there shall be inserted the following subsection—

"(5A) In dealing with an offender under subsection (3)(a) or (5) above, the court concerned—

(a) shall take into account the extent to which the offender has complied with the requirements of the attendance centre order; and

(b) may assume, in the case of an offender who has wilfully and persistently failed to comply with those requirements, that he has refused to give his consent to a community sentence which has been proposed by the court and requires that consent.".'—[Mr. John Patten.]

Clause 64

POWERS AND DUTIES OF PRISONER CUSTODY OFFICERS ACTING IN PURSUANCE OF ARRANGEMENTS

Mr. Randall: I beg to move amendment No. 84, in page 42, line 34, after 'wellbeing', insert to protect them as far as possible from public scrutiny and insult, and in any such conveyances as are used to transport them to provide them with adequate ventilation, light and standards of physical comfort.'.

The amendment will bring the regulations governing the custody and transportation of prisoners outside prison into line with the European prison rules. Rule 50 states:

"When prisoners are being removed to or from an institution, they shall be exposed to the public view as little as possible, and proper safeguards shall be adopted to protect them from insult, curiosity and publicity in any form."

The second part of rule 50 states:

"The transport of prisoners in conveyances with inadequate ventilation or light, or in any way which would subject them to unnecessary physical hardship or indignity, shall be prohibited."

The European rules are not binding in law but the Council of Europe recommends that "governments of member states be guided in their internal legislation and practice by the principles set out in the text of the European Prison Rules . . . with a view to their progressive implementation."

The Committee of Ministers included that recommendation in the preamble to the rules, adopted by it on 12 February 1987.

In addition to requiring the adoption of the European prison rules, the amendment would extend to the prisoner custody officers the requirement of domestic rule 38, which states:

"A person being taken to and from a prison in custody shall be exposed as little as possible to public observation, and proper care shall be taken to protect him from curiosity and insult."

The need for regulations governing the physical conditions in vehicles used to transport prisoners was graphically illustrated by the death from heat stroke in 1989 of Terence O'Shea. He was being transported from court to prison in a prison van with inadequate ventilation. The pathologist who carried out the investigation into the death said that, even five hours after his death, Mr. O'Shea's body temperature was still 2 deg Centigrade above normal. Perhaps the Minister of State will remember from physics that one can almost double the temperature to convert it into degrees Fahrenheit. That means that Mr. O'Shea's body temperature would have been about 4 deg Fahrenheit above normal. I do not know whether the Minister remembers the formula—I do: it is F minus 32 divided by nine equals C divided by 5. I am sure that the Minister will find that, by inserting 2 deg Centigrade into the formula. Mr. O'Shea's body temperature was 4 deg Fahrenheit above normal which is serious.

If the transportation of prisoners is contracted out to private companies which, by definition, are bound to have different motives from public organisations, there may be a temptation for them to cut costs and not provide adequate care and attention for the prisoners, which may result in inadequate ventilation and space. Our amendment seeks to make such unnecessary and wrong cost-cutting impossible.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): The hon. Gentleman is being a little unfair to private companies. He should bear in mind the fact that, if a private company has a contract, it will have an incentive to keep standards high so that it does not lose the contract when it is renewed. I appreciate that there is an ideological divide, but does the hon. Gentleman accept that what we have found in Southend-on-Sea when we have privatised some services is that private contractors want to maintain standards so that they can keep the job next time round?

Mr. Randall: The hon. Gentleman makes a good argument, and I agree that that is the case, but the other side of it is that, to keep the business, a contractor would have to compete with the public sector, and to do so, he would undercut it on cost. The question is, where do the priorities lie in terms of cost-cutting? I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will know that, where hospital services, such as catering, have been privatised in his constituency of Southend, East, there are numerous examples of things going wrong if there is too much cost-cutting. We are simply saying that there is a threat of such things happening. The Terence O'Shea case shows that we are talking about a real problem.

I am sure that the Minister of State will remember discussing this matter in Committee, when she said:

"although I cannot accept the amendment with its current-wording, it would be churlish of me indeed not to take it away and consider bringing back at a later stage a suitable amendment which covers the hon. Gentleman's points, particularly about adequate lighting and ventilation, which I believe is already covered."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 29 January 1991: c. 564.]

Opposition Members came to this debate expecting the Government to table an amendment on this subject. Sadly, however, we have been disappointed. I do not believe that the right hon. Lady is being churlish, because that is not her nature, so other mechanisms within the Home Office must be causing this important matter not to be amended in legislation. The consequence is that the recommendations of the European Economic Community and the other rules to which I have referred, which exist purely to ensure good practice, are being omitted from our legislation. We regret that, and will listen carefully to see why the Minister has failed to table the amendment that we expected.

Mrs. Rumbold: The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) has given me a little to think about. He reminded me of my physics lessons. Although physics was not one of my best subjects at school. I was not so bad at it that I could not recognise the intensity of heat to which Mr. O'Shea was subjected when he was being escorted.

We take extremely seriously the importance of protecting from curiosity and insult those who are being escorted and of ensuring adequate heat, ventilation and lighting. Although I have failed significantly in the eyes of the hon. Gentleman—kind though he has been towards me this evening and sorry though I am to have been unable to table the amendment to which he was looking forward—we shall table an amendment in another place in the form, we believe, of an order-making power so that, in relation to contracted-out prison escorts, the Secretary of State can make rules to protect prisoners from public scrutiny and insult.

The rules will be similar to the present rule 38(1) to which my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) alluded in relation to private, contracted-out escort services. It is, however, important to remember that the O'Shea case occurred when the public sector was responsible for escorting. The rules need to be changed to ensure that, while prisoners are being escorted in the private sector, they have protection similar to that which they enjoyed before.

In the light of that, I hope that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West will feel reassured. Although I have been unable to table such an amendment this evening, it will be tabled in another place.

Mr. Randall: Opposition Members welcome what the Minister has said. It appears that she recognises the seriousness of the problem but was prevented from tabling an amendment today because of the lack of time to consider it fully. I note that she has said that the Government will introduce a measure in another place in the form of an order-making power. I am sure that all hon. Members will welcome the Minister's attitude and look forward to an amendment being inserted in the Bill in another place.

Accordingly, on behalf of the Opposition, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 66

POWERS AND DUTIES OF PRISONER CUSTODY OFFICERS ACTING IN PURSUANCE OF ARRANGEMENTS

Mr. John Greenway: I beg to move amendment No. 116, in page 43, leave out lines 13 and 14.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to consider the following amendments: No. 117, in page 43, line 16, leave out 'to which this section applies' and insert 'which—

(a) is established after the commencement of this section; and

(b) is for the confinement of remand prisoners, that is to say, persons charged with offences who are remanded in or committed to custody pending their trial, or persons committed to custody on their conviction who have not been sentenced for their offences;'.

No. 118, in page 43, leave out lines 25 to 28 and insert——

'(4) The Secretary of State may by order made by statutory instrument provide that this section shall have effect as if there were omitted from subsection (2) above either—

(a) paragraph (a) and the word "and" immediately following that paragraph; or

(b) paragraph (b) and the said word "and" or

(c) the words from "which", in the first place where it occurs, to the end of paragraph (b).

(5) No order shall be made under subsection (4) above unless a draft of the order has been laid before and approved by resolution of each House of Parliament.'.

No. 119, in clause 74, page 47, leave out line 8.

Mr. Greenway: Clause 66 provides the framework for a private sector experiment through the provision of a new remand centre at Everthorpe.

In Committee, I introduced a group of amendments which would have had the effect of considerably widening the opportunity for private sector involvement throughout the prison service. We argued for that proposal for many hours, and I am disappointed that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State has not been convinced by my arguments and has not agreed to the bolder step that I suggested.

I hope to have a little more success with this group of amendments. They are technical amendments, which would allow the experiment at Everthorpe to be extended in the light of the experience of that project. I acknowledge that my enthusiasm for private sector involvement in the remand system—and perhaps, eventually, in the prison service—is not shared at all by Opposition Members, or fully shared by some of my hon. Friends, who believe that we should proceed with much greater caution. I accept and acknowledge that majority view.

However, I hope that my right hon. Friend might see the wisdom of incorporating in the Bill a framework under which, subject to the agreement of Parliament, the experiment could be taken a stage further if the plans for Everthorpe prove successful. The changes I propose in these amendments would give the Home Secretary and the House the flexibility that the clause as drafted denies.

Surely, on the day on which Lord Justice Woolf's report has at long last been published, hon. Members can agree at least on the desirability of improving the prison regime still further. We shall need time to reflect on the detail of the Woolf recommendations. I have already spotted the suggestion concerning the provision of community prisons, with a view to maintaining links between a prisoner and his family and the community. I am sure that that would be very beneficial. Then there are the suggestions concerning alternative methods of managing prisons.

As I said in Committee, the need to improve the prison regime is urgent and great. It would be wrong to close our minds to some of the more innovative opportunities that the private sector may be able to offer. I acknowledge the need for a cautious approach, but I hope that my right hon. Friend will feel that in these amendments we have struck the right balance, and that she will find it possible to accept them.

7.30 pm

Mr. Teddy Taylor: I support what my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) has said. In so doing, I am reminded of Corrie primary school on the island of Arran. Many years ago, I was a Minister in the Scottish Office for about a year and a half. There were lots of exciting things that I wanted to do, and lots of exciting reforms that I wanted to introduce, but looking back on that year and a half, the only specific thing that I recall achieving was keeping Corrie primary school open. The local council had proposed that it be closed, but as a Minister I had power to overturn that proposal. I did so, on the grounds that I thought that the school would prosper. Happily, it survives to this day. To justify my faith in my real achievement, I go to Arran every year for a holiday. That is one way of seeing the greatness of what I have done in politics over a period of 26 years.

In what way is Corrie primary school relevant to this clause, which, so far as I can see, is intended to be a great reforming provision? On the basis of what is laid down, it seems that only one remand prison will be available for consideration. Criminal justice measures come before us very rarely. If we have this as the basis of our experiment, and if we wait three or four years to see how it progresses, the prospect of reform will be very limited indeed. We are not saying that there is a case for changing the whole character of the legislation—indeed, that cannot be done at Report stage—but we should have the opportunity—perhaps next year, perhaps the year after—to bring forward some regulations by which the matter could be reopened.

Why has there been so little progress? At the time of the Corrie school incident to which I referred, we had a very large, enthusiastic and talented civil service, whose members knew far more about everything than I did. That is why they did nothing at all—which was probably very wise. In the prisons section of the Home Office there are some extremely talented people, who probably know more about everything than I do. There is always a temptation for individuals to hold back, to avoid going too far. I hope that this Minister will have a great reforming career. Indeed, I know she will. She has great ability and integrity. I am asking her not to overturn the clause or to reopen the whole business, but simply to accept that, if there is a possibility—perhaps next year or the year after that—of reopening the subject by bringing forward regulations, that possibility should be grasped.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale has been very reasonable, which is unusual for someone who consistently supports farmers. What he is saying is that things like this should not simply slip through but should be subject to affirmative resolution. Nothing could be more reasonable. Most of the views that my hon. Friend expresses are ones that I, as a Conservative, find it difficult to support. However, I hope that the Minister will accept that this is a very reasonable proposal which does not go too far.

We do not want to see the Minister's hands tied so that nothing can be done. There should be some arrangement whereby she could come back to the House and advise hon. Members to consider arrangements that had worked out. Perhaps they would not have worked out. All I am saying is that we should have some arrangement whereby, without drafting a completely new law, the case could be reopened. I hope that the Minister, who always displays reasonableness, will allow this little chink of light for the benefit of those who think that there is something worth while here.

Mr. Sheerman: This is the part of the Bill to which we object most strongly. I am sure that no hon. Member fails to understand the reasons for our objection. We believe that pressure is being exerted by certain elements in the Conservative party to push the Bill in an even more radically rightward direction.

Earlier today, we were talking about the most important report of Lord Justice Woolf. When I pressed the Home Secretary on whether the change of direction was a philosophical one, he did not seem to understand my point. That point is absolutely germane to this debate. For 12 years, the Government, instead of addressing the fundamental problems of our penal system, have thrown money—£1 billion—at the problem by building new prisons, but that did not work. More recently, they have come up with the notion—stimulated by organisations such as the Adam Smith Institute—that private prisons may provide the answer. In fact, neither is the correct approach, because the Government have got the philosophy wrong.

If the Minister is right in terms of her commitment to Woolf, she will one day reflect—probably quietly, away from the television lights and the Chamber—on the fact that acceptance of the philosophy of Woolf involves accepting a total change of direction as a fundamental necessity. If she were to accept the pressure from some of her right-wing colleagues, on the Standing Committee and outside it, to broaden the scope of privatisation—which is what this amendment would do—she would be making the mistake of retaining the old bankrupt philosophy. What Woolf has provided—if only the Government could recognise it—is an opportunity to come up with the correct solutions to the problems of penal policy. The whole country would be grateful if the Government would show the courage and clarity of thought which are necessary to recognise that.

I expect that I shall not be successful, but I must try to persuade the right hon. Lady that, if she were able to recognise that dichotomy, she would reluctantly tell her colleagues that the Government had seen the light. I realise, of course, that she has to be polite to her colleagues. On this first day post-Woolf, the Government should show a willingness to change direction by refusing to go down the road of privatisation. The Labour party is totally opposed to the proposals for private remand prisons. We have always said that this would be the thin end of the privatisation wedge. Indeed, before the Bill had completed its Committee stage, the Minister had changed her mind and moved further in the direction of privatisation per se, rather than just privatisation of remand prisons.

We find those proposals repugnant. The case against privatisation was put most eloquently in July 1987. I am sorry that the Foreign Secretary, who was sitting on the Front Bench only a few minutes ago, is not here now to hear me quote the words that he uttered as Home Secretary. He said:

"I do not think that there is a case, and I do not believe that the House would accept a case, for auctioning or privatising the prisons or handing over the business of keeping prisoners safe to anyone other than Government servants."—[Official Report, 16 July 1987; Vol. 119, c. 1303.]

Why did privatisation get on to the Home Office agenda? The answer is simple. It did so because of the failure of the Government's policies, which has shown itself in one simple way—the overcrowding of our prison system. The number of prisoners escalated from 43,326 in 1983 to an alarming 50,265 in 1987. The pressure was particularly bad in the remand sector, where unconvicted prisoners endured some of the most squalid conditions. It goes against any concept of justice that people who have not been proved guilty of an offence are kept in the worst cells and the worst prisons.

The pressure grew for something to be done. We know that the Government's first reaction was the frantic building of more prisons. They expanded the prison building programme so much that they faced a bill of £1 billion on top of the running costs of £1 billion a year. That was a massive investment. If anyone was throwing money at a problem, it was the Government.

People could see that that was not working. It was suggested that we should go down the American route, but who wants to do that? Hon. Members who served on the Committee with me will be sick to death of my citing the American experience. In America, there were 3·33 million people in prison in 1974 and 1·3 million in 1990. I do not often correct the shadow Home Secretary, my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), but by a slip of the tongue he got it wrong earlier. He said that we had the worst prison record in the industrialised world. While we may have the worst record of imprisonment per head of population in the Council of Europe countries, including Turkey, our record is not worse than that of the United States, and I hope that it never will be. The increase in the supply of prisoners there seems never-ending, and that looms large in the minds of the Government and the people of the United States.

The other suggestion which came out of the woodwork, or out of the Adam Smith Institute, was privatisation of the prisons—if not all of them, at least the worst affected, which are those on the remand side. Instead of building more prisons, the Government should have done something about reducing the prison population. They should not now, belatedly, be returning to the idea of privatisation. It is a delicious irony that these proposals for expanding the role of the private sector in the prison system should come at a time when the prison population is beginning to fall.

The Labour party's recommendations on reducing the prison population have at last been heeded. The Government have finally listened to the experts. I am not saying that the Labour party has great expertise, but it was prepared to listen to the experts before writing its policies on penal reform.

If this is the wrong policy at the wrong time, why are the Government pursuing it? Part of the answer must be that they are giving in to commercial interests. It is no secret that certain construction companies close to the Conservative party stand to gain from the privatisation of prisons. That such interests are influential in determining penal policy is wrong in principle and dangerous in practice. I am old enough to remember former United States President Eisenhower warning against the military-industrial complex. I should be warning against the penal-industrial complex, whose participants have more to gain from an increase in the prison population than from a reduction.

There will be pressure for more prisoners. As I said in Committee, that is not a conspiracy theory—it is an inevitable law of economics. People do not go into such business to make a loss. The hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) spoke of privatisation. He will know that the guarding of a defence institution by a private security company is all very well with a top-rate company, but without regulation of the industry, chief constables worry about the quality of the firms at the lower end of the market. Competitive tendering forces Government bodies to accept the lowest or almost the lowest of tenders. The senior executive of a leading private security company said to me only in October, "Do you know, Mr. Sheerman, that in Scotland a defence establishment is being guarded by a private security company which pays its employees £1 an hour?" The hon. Gentleman will know about Scotland.

This is not a conspiracy theory. The economics of the situation, in an unregulated industry, will lead to the cowboys taking over not only in the rest of the private security world, but in private prisons. The Government have no plans to regulate security industry, and without such regulation, nothing that the Government say can reassure the Opposition that there will not be a sector of the prison system run by the cowboy element of the private security industry.

Behind these measures is a black hole into which the Government's policy will fall—their unwillingness to regulate the private security industry. I know that, I am anticipating a later debate, but the two are closely linked. In Committee, Conservative Members bizarrely told us that prisons built by private developers were unutterably better in design, construction and siting than those built by the public sector, which the Government argued were badly designed and planned buildings, with poorly executed work. Yet if a private contract is given to a firm to run as well as build the prison, they argue, standards suddenly and miraculously improve. That is a devastating comment on our building and development industry. I happen to know many people who work in the building industry, and that is a slur on their work. It is a misunderstanding of the public and private sectors.

Good, well-designed prisons can be built and run by the public sector. The Woolf report says just that. When my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook said that we had a good prison service and a rotten system, he hit the nail squarely on the head. That is the problem that the Government cannot address. Can the private sector build prisons and operate them well and cheaply?

It is interesting that all the rhetoric about effectiveness that we heard in the early days of this debate seems to have disappeared. The financial memorandum states:

"Competitive tendering for the operation of remand centres is not expected to have a significant financial implication."

The American experience leads to the same conclusion. Even Charles Logan, a member of President Reagan's commission on privatisation, in the best researched pro-privatisation book on the American scene, agrees that it is still unproven that private prisons will cost any less than prisons in the public sector.

It was noticeable and alarming that, in discussions with Deloitte Haskins and Sells, private-sector operators claimed that savings could be made by reducing staffing levels through design innovation and technology. Groups such as Inquest are greatly worried about the prospect of turning remand prisons into electronic boxes. The appalling number of suicides in recent years shows that remand prisoners need close attention and contact with more and better qualified staff, not more electronic wizardry and gadgetry. All the research shows that human contact is most important in preventing suicide. That was not mentioned in today's statement and the questions and answers following it. Even since the ghastly events at Strangeways, more people there have committed suicide.

I do not want to bore the House with the American experience, but despite the vast prison population there, there are no private federal prisons and there are only 9,000 adult offenders in privately run gaols. Therefore, the experience of the United States is extremely limited.

Mr. Chris Butler (Warrington, South): As I understand the figures, 25 per cent. of prisoners are federally delivered up to the private sector, and there is now a total of 20,000 beds in the private sector in the United States.

Mr. Sheerman: I think we split down the middle. My latest figures, which I got from the House of Commons Library only this week, show that there are no federal prisoners in the private sector, but that the numbers in the private sector may have risen. The hon. Gentleman may have more up-to-date figures than I do, but between 9,000 and 20,000 is a tiny percentage of the 1·3 million prisoners.

In Committee, the Minister rested her case on the Australian experience. I have checked that, and found, that the position is certainly not as impressive as she would have us believe. The experiment has been going on for only a short time. The number of prisoners in the one prison that is in the private sector is small. Most published material relates to Borallon prison in Queensland, but the claims made about its success are premature. Most experts in our penal lobby argue that it is far too early to make claims about improved recidivist rates, that the prison was operational only in January 1990 and that to make such a claim borders on the irresponsible. It is much too early to speak about cost-effectiveness. Borallon is still running in, and for much of the time has been running at under capacity. The Australian and American experiences do not lead to the conclusions that Ministers seem to suggest.

There is a problem in accepting the Government's arguments when one considers the moral aspect. It is easy to get entrapped by the Government's logic and to argue on their terms. In that way, we are reduced to talking about pounds and pence—the cost of imprisonment. On the day the Woolf report is brought to the attention of the House, we should think about philosophy and underlying values. At the forefront of our argument are our strong moral objections to the use of private prisons.

The deprivation of liberty is the strongest punishment that can be imposed on an individual. Once a court has decided on a prison sentence, the state should be directly responsible for that prisoner throughout his or her sentence. The prospect of private companies deriving commercial gain from imprisonment is grossly distasteful. Private companies, motivated by the requirements to maintain profit margins and share dividends, will compromise inmate care and welfare provision. The Government are taking a cavalier attitude to that and to public safety.

We are gravely concerned that control and security may be seriously compromised by undertrained and inexperienced employees of the private-sector industry. We doubt that our security guards will have the ability to handle the difficult and potentially violent situations that can arise.

I do not have to expand on my case on a day like today. The report about Strangeways and the evil disturbances in our prisons last April leads any fair-minded Member and citizen to the conclusion contained in paragraph 1.4 of the Woolf report. It pays tribute to the men and women involved for their professionalism and care. Indeed, Woolf specifically says that two further questions should have been asked when he was given his terms of reference. The question should not have been why the riots took place, so much as why they had not taken place years ago, given the state of our prisons. What is the conclusion? In paragraph 4, he concludes that, if it were not for the dedicated, highly trained professionalism of those who run our prisons—the governors and prison officers—the riots would have occurred earlier and would have been more widespread.

When the Minister replies, will she tell us what guarantee she has about the level of care, training and expertise that will be found in the most difficult area of the penal system, the remand system, or any other sector when the penal system comes under private unregulated industry? Remand prisoners are highly volatile. Many have never been in prison before and are terrified and even psychologically disturbed by the experience. Many will be found innocent. What guarantees does she have about the provision in private remand or any other private sector of the penal system?

I have made the main points of my case.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: At length.

Mr. Sheerman: This is an important debate. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I do not normally take so long on Report, but, as he knows, one or two of these matters go to the heart of the Bill.

There is an inherent misconception in the proposal, which may intrigue the hon. Member for Southend, East. I know that that hon. Gentleman likes the free market, which is lauded by the Tories, but it is a strange marketplace that has one customer only and where those at the sharp end in receipt of service are not at liberty to change their supplier. Such a lack of choice does not represent a free market, more a captive one.

We want to flush out the Government's true intentions, because the Minister was less than clear in Committee. On 31 January she said:

"The Government cannot accept the amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale . . . because we would need to come to terms with the full implication of what he has to say".

Later on, however, there was a more positive reaction from the Minister:

"I am willing to consider the amendments".—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 31 January 1991; c. 577, 601.]

It must have been those differing comments that totally confused the press, because when I spoke to some of them in the following two days, half of them thought that the right hon. Lady had warmed to the amendment, while the other half said that she had thrown it out without much thought. I should like the right hon. Lady to come clean about her views.

A much clearer view of the Government's intentions is provided in the magazine New Builder. It is interesting to look occasionally at the less customary sources of information. We all read The Economist, the New Statements and Society, and such publications, but it is not often that one reads New Builder. In the 7 February edition, we learned that the hon. Member for Rydedale (Mr. Greenway) and the hon. Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) had told the journal that:

"they had convinced the new Home Secretary and the Prisons Minister, Angela Rumbold, that the proposals for privately built and managed prisons in the Criminal Justice Bill did not go far enough".

We also learned that, on the proposals to end the remand of juveniles to prison department establishments and secure more accommodation, the Government were considering the proposal that councils should contract private consortiums to undertaken those projects on a design, build and manage basis. I hope that the Minister will comment on that.

We also discovered from that magazine that the hon. Member for Westminster, North is even more enterprising when it comes to city-centre prisons. He considers that Brixton, Pentonville and Wormwood Scrubs represent an endless source of land for the property market. He said that those prisons occupy sites of considerable value and that "the Home Office is warming to the idea of giving the sites to private developers in return from them building smaller, privately managed remand centres nearer the crown Courts".

Obviously New Builder has some insight into what is going on in the Tory party and its relationship with the building industry. It makes absolutely fascinating reading.

Conservatives may argue that, although the Woolf report concludes that the prison system is in an appalling state and in need of change, the Labour party is being a dog in the manger because it will not go along with the Tory party's insights into how to change such dreadful conditions in our prisons. Such an argument is a red herring. The Woolf report should lead to a radical improvement of the present prison system, not the development of a few brand new prestigious private prisons.

We believe that the state of the penal system is too important to deal with on party political grounds. The future penal system should be agreed upon by the two parties and the Woolf report should be agreed upon by the two parties, and the Woolf report should be the basis of that agreement. If the Conservative Government could bury their ideological hang-up on privatisation of prisons, they would discover that there was enormous support for policies that would radicalise our present penal system.

It is important to note the poisonous effect that the obsession with privatisation will have on the men and women working in the prison service. Such privatisation is opposed by everyone who works in the prison service—certainly the prison governors do not want it. In that connection, how on earth could Ministers introduce an amendment in January concerning what the press described as "flying governors"? No matter how the wonderful private remand centres or prisons are extolled by the Government, it seems that, when a riot takes place, they cannot cope.

The Government suddenly introduced an amendment to provide that a governor from a proper prison in the public sector would be flown in at a moment's notice to deal with any crisis. That is bad enough in itself, but the Government did not consult the governors about that proposal. I understand that the Minister had met representatives from the Prison Governors Association only a couple of days before, but no mention was made then of that proposal. That is a strange way in which to deal with the professionals who run our prison service.

The right hon. Lady should think again before she opens the door a bit more to the amendment tabled by the right of her party. On reflection, she will appreciate that it represents a dangerous path. Such a privatisation measure could sink the one opportunity we have to catch up with the civilised part of the world on penal policy.

Mr. Bruce George (Walsall, South): I should not think that many hon. Members or people outside believe that our prison service is anything other than a national disgrace. It is not right simply to point the finger of guilt at the present Government, as the deficiencies within the prison system did not start in 1979—the blame must go back many generations.

In the past 11 years, the Government have had opportunities to make the necessary reforms, and some things have been done that I applaud wholeheartedly. It is regrettable, however, that in typically British fashion it took a crisis in the prison service—the riots—to precipitate the encyclopaedic report that was presented to us today.

Just because matters are in crisis does not mean that we should move to an aberrant system that is shifting, however incrementally, to a system of private prisons. I believe that Woolf and Tumim have pointed the way and that, if the Government, and future Governments, are prepared to devote resources and provide the political support, we shall have a prison system about which we need not feel a deep sense of shame. If Ministers were asked to take foreign visitors round many of our city-centre prisons, built in the previous century, I am sure that they would refuse to do so. No person of any compassion could feel anything but acute embarrassment at visiting many of our city-centre prisons.

The state of such prisons is no criticism of prison officers, who cannot like to work in such an environment. At least prisoners are in and out in a set time in most cases, but prison officers must spend much of their careers in that dreadful environment and in many senses the effect is degenerative. In passing, I pay a tremendous tribute to the men and women of the prison service who have been engaged to work for many years in adverse surroundings.

We all know that there is much scope for improving the system, but we tend to forget that there is much in the prison service that is experimental and innovative and about which we need not feel the same sense of humiliation. We need to build on those positive elements of the prison service. Lord Justice Woolf has pointed the way in which Governments must go. I cannot accept, however, that even a limited experiment with privatisation is worthy of anything other than condemnation. If by some misfortune the Government accept the amendment, more than a simple experiment would be involved, because that experiment will lead to a mushrooming of private prisons. That cannot be endorsed.

I support many reforms in the prison service and many of the alternatives to prison, but there will always be a place for prisons. I do not belong to the utopian wing of my party, which believes that if only we provided good opportunities for people they would not commit crimes, and that we must create alternatives to prison for almost all who would otherwise go there. That is nonsense. There are people who need punishment, which should be paralleled by a reforming element. So let us reform, but let us not indulge in this nonsense.

I should have thought that the privatisation mania to which we have been subjected had run its course. Perhaps the Government have been tempted to support plans for more privatisation than we had expected to prove to some of their supporters outside, who may be feeling depressed about how the Government have evolved in the past couple of months, that there is still a strong ideological commitment to privatisation and to some of the dottier ideas of the past 10 years. Without wanting to insult friends in the academic world, I must point out that such ideas should have been confined to professors' offices; but now, because of the peculiarities of the political system, they have been enshrined in legislation of which we are suffering the consequences.

I am not opposed to all forms of privatisation. As I said in Committee, I would not fight to the death to return some privatised companies to the private sector. Some concerns will inevitably remain outside public control, but I cannot concede that privatising the prisons is anything more than an idea supported by the more dotty Members of the House. I had hoped that privatisation of the prisons was just the death rattle of the ideological passions of the 1980s, but perhaps my assessment was too optimistic.

Privatisation of the prisons can come in many guises: in the form of contracting out services such as catering or cleaning; and in the form of allowing contractors to build, manage and operate. There is no single model for privatisation.

Why are private prisons to be inflicted on us? They may be a consequence of the ideologically impoverished seeking inspiration from other societies that have gone through the process and picking up their ideas, running them across the Atlantic and trying to translate them, in their feeble way, into British clones of the American experiment. Many of the perceptions of the success of the privatised prisons in the United States have been based on simplistic analyses. The Select Committee on Home Affairs investigated private prisons, and the aspects of its report that relate to private prisons contain more of the ethos of the political pamphlet than the ring of a serious report by a Select Committee.

8.15 pm

The report by Mr. Young for the Adam Smith Institute was also based on limited research experience. Extrapolating on the basis of limited experience, the report judged, wrongly, that the experiment had been successsful in the United States.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) said earlier, the experiment in the United States has been too limited. An excellent book recently published by Ryan and Ward on private prisons in America and on whether the American experience has any relevance to us states:

"The American experience of privatising the delivery of punishment overall in the United States is both uneven and limited. It is uneven in that it is more prevalent in the south . . . more common in the juvenile sector than in adult corrections; more likely to apply to service delivery than to ownership and/or management."

So that research has shown that the experiment in the United States has been limited, and we should not draw the wrong conclusions from it. The Adam Smith Institute, which is closely connected with the Heritage Foundation in the United States, has praised a system that is undeserving of eulogy. Mr. Young could see no evil in the private sector and was unwilling to see Governments do anything in the prison sector free from his criticism.

The Select Committee that visited the United States produced a political report. By that I do not mean to criticise its Chairman, who has not attempted to hide his close connection with the private security industry. He has been an able proponent of the private prison system, and his predecessor as Chairman—this is also a matter of public record—now serves as chairman of an organisation that is considering building private prisons.

The Home Affairs Select Committee did not perform a good service for the House. I am appalled by the idea of a prison industry, by the idea of the state delegating responsibility for punishment to the private sector and by the idea of prisons being run for profit. I fear that a private prison system will be largely unaccountable. It will not deliver the nirvana that some of its proponents argue it will—places where the food is great, where warders run around not dressed in uniform and where wonderful recreational facilities abound; in short, places not unlike Hi-de-hi holiday camps. That is all an illusion.

On the basis of my experience of the private security industry, I must conclude that the private sector is ill equipped to manage, run and staff prisons. I shall discuss later why I believe that. Bidding for contracts can mean only that good companies will be driven down to the lower level of their competitors. Staff salaries will suffer, as will staff training. We shall not begin to reach the stage recommended by Lord Justice Woolf. He has argued that, although the standard of training in the United Kingdom could be described as reasonable, we must aim for higher standards. The Netherlands may provide us with a model.

Our standards of training are already light years ahead of those in almost every private security company. If the private sector cannot remotely match even the present system of training, which Woolf has argued is inadequate, I cannot believe that it will have either the resources or the enthusiasm to emulate the standards that he requires of prison officers in both sectors.

I hoped that the Bill would merely introduce a narrow experiment and that, when that experiment had been properly evaluated, it would be allowed to die the death. I fear, however, that the Government have other things in mind; and I deplore that.

Mr. Maclennan: The case in principle against the clause has already been adequately deployed, and I do not propose to continue with that line of argument. I wish the Minister to explain how she expects the clause and the amendment—with which she is rumoured to be sympathetic—to fit in with the Woolf recommendations for remand prisons.

In my view, both the clause and the amendment are inconsistent with the purposes of the Woolf report; moreover, they make the achievement of the ends recommended in that report—after careful consideration—much more difficult. According to Woolf,

"the inquiry has concentrated particularly on the position of remand prisoners. This is because they represent a significant proportion of the prison population, and because they unjustly suffer some of the worst conditions in the prison system . . . To emphasise the importance of these matters, the inquiry recommends that there should be a separate statement of purpose setting out the prison service's responsibilities relating to remand prisoners. This statement of purpose should reflect the principle that remand prisoners should normally be accommodated, treated and managed separately from convicted prisoners."

That, surely, is a profoundly important recommendation. How does the clause fit in with it? It seems to want to establish a bifurcation in the custodial treatment of remand prisoners. At least the original clause did not intend all of them to be subject to privately contracted arrangements; but, if the Woolf recommendations apply to the prison service, they will presumably have to apply, and be monitored, in the private sector, which strikes me as a bizarre administrative approach.

Woolf went on to consider the problems of remand prisoners in much more detail. On page 250, in paragraph 10.79, he wrote:

"The many initiatives which have been taken in recent years to try to tackle the problem created by the size of the remand population have on the whole been successful. Indeed the scale of their success suggests that there were, and almost certainly still are, a substantial number of people remanded in custody who should not be in prison . . . The problems created by the unnecessary remands need to be tackled from a number of different directions. Each involves co-operation between the Courts, the Crown Prosecution Service, the Probation Service and the Prison Service."

If the clause and the amendment are passed, a fifth wheel will be added. Similar co-operation will be needed with the private sector, involving a separate series of relationships. I believe that that will confound the present administrative confusion, in the part of the prison system in which the greatest problems are widely recognised to exist.

We must judge the appropriateness of the clause and the amendment by whether the tests recommended by Woolf are more or less likely to be met. On page 327, in paragraph 12.309, Woolf suggests "Accredited Standards for remand centres".

That will mean a set of separate tests and monitoring arrangements to find out whether the privatised service is operating effectively, which cannot make sense.

The whole report reflects considerable disquiet about the management of the remand population. Woolf diagnoses that as stemming in part from the assumptions that are made about the degree of security that all remand prisoners require. The privatisation proposal strikes me as, at best, irrelevant to the solution of the problems described so cogently by Woolf, and, at worst, likely to make the task of eliminating them much more difficult.

As well as recommending the implementation of certain broad principles, Woolf suggested that helpful guidance would be provided by the proposals in the Prison Reform Trust's publication about regimes for remand prisoners, by Dr. Sylvia Casale and Miss Joyce Plotnikov. Will that helpful guidance be required of those who run the private sector? It is difficult to explain or justify a bifurcation of the system in a sector that has had so many problems, leading to—admittedly—so much unfortunate practice.

It is not as though the Government were proposing a "pure" privatisation. Those who run the prisons will have to operate according to rules and regulations established by Government; the controller, for instance, will be a Crown servant. This is an example of gesture politics on the part of Home Office Ministers who are trying to placate the holders of an uninformed view within their own party, which carries no support outside that party and which the Government would be wise to reject. They now have the perfect reason not to act; indeed, if they accept the amendment, it will be seen as a pre-emption of the Woolf recommendations—as, indeed, thumbing their nose at recommendations, and a pretty contemptuous approach to some serious suggestions. That would be highly unfortunate.

8.30 pm

Mrs. Rumbold: In Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) moved several amendments to clause 66 that would have been rather more dramatic in their effect than amendment No. 116. Perhaps he listened carefully to the debate and to the comments of our hon. Friend the Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Stevens), who said that, if we want to extend clause 66, which applies only to remand prisoners, we should proceed cautiously and step by step to ensure that contracting out is not only acceptable to the Home Secretary and the Government but an effective means of managing prisons. My hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale said that, if the Government accepted the amendment, that was the way in which he would expect us to proceed.

The Wolds is the only remand prison that can be contracted out under clause 66, which the Government are minded to enact. The hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) expressed concern about private prisons being a dreadful failure or an aberration. My hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale is saying only that, if it is proved that they can be effectively managed by the private sector, the Government, having carefully considered the implications and ramifications, might extend that proposal to, for example, a young offenders' institution. That is a reasonable proposition for the House to consider.

We have had a long and considered debate. The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) made the Labour party's position clear. It opposes the private sector being involved in the running of prisons. I understand that, but I do not necessarily agree with the ideological point that the prison service can be run only by the public sector. I do not accept that only the public sector should be responsible for the management of prisons.

The debate is being held on the day when the Wolff recommendations became public. I reaffirm—I hope that the hon. Member for Huddersfield accepts this in the spirit in which he made his comments to me—that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and I, and indeed the whole Government, are committed to improving the prison service. I do not agree with the suggestion by the hon. Member for Huddersfield that the Government have tried to improve the prison service simply "by throwing money at it", although since 1979 much public sector money has been spent on improving prison service establishments, which were in a distressful state.

As the hon. Gentleman rightly said, only three years ago, our prisons were full and it was not possible to refurbish them. We therefore opened eight new prisons, and will open a further 12 in the next few years. Coupled with the decision that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced today to end slopping out by 1994, that will contribute to achieving the important target of reforming the prison regime. If a prisoner must slop out four times a day, it does not help to establish a good regime under which he can undergo a sensible education, work and training programme.

Mr. Sheerman: The right hon. Lady has delicately avoided giving a firm commitment to implement the Woolf recommendations, which is what Labour Members have been waiting to hear.

Mrs. Rumbold: The hon. Gentleman has already received an answer. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary announced a package of measures to implement immediately a major part of the Woolf recommendations. As the report was published only today, he reasonably said that many of its recommendations will be considered for inclusion in a White Paper. No Government, of whatever political persuasion, could have done more than my right hon. Friend.

I must confess to the hon. Member for Huddersfield that New Builder is not my early morning or bed-time reading. Perhaps I should ensure that I read it as well as Punch, the Spectator and The Economist. I must also confess that I do not yet read the New Statesman and Society.

Mr. Sheerman: What about Christopher Robin?

Mrs. Rumbold: As all my hon. Friends know, Christopher Robin is a favourite of mine.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) suggested that clause 66 and the amendments would be incompatible with the Woolf recommendations. I do not share that view. I do not see why private remand centres, which perhaps would use different methods but would have the same aims, could not operate successfully. They would operate under contract to the Home Office. I do not see why co-operation with other parts of the criminal justice system would be more difficult under these proposals.

Mr. John Greenway: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Woolf recommendation to segregate remand prisoners within the prison regime was the basis of the recommendation of the Home Affairs Select Committee on private sector involvement in the remand system?

Mrs. Rumbold: My hon. Friend is correct. The Government are taking the first step in considering contracting out a remand prison. We believe that this opportunity will not easily arise again. As my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) said, this is a chink of light. If, and only if, the contracted-out remand centre proves to be a success might we move towards privatisation of other parts of the prison service. The House should accept the amendment.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Amendment made: No. 117, in page 43, line 16, leave out

(a) is established after the commencement of this section; and

(b) is for the confinement of remand prisoners, that is to say, persons charged with offences who are remanded in or committed to custody pending their trial, or persons committed to custody on their conviction who have not been sentenced for their offences;'.—[Mr. John Greenway.]

Mr. Sheerman: I beg to move amendment No. 91, in page 43, line 19 at end insert—

'(2A) The Secretary of State shall prescribe in any contract entered into under subsection (2) above standards which shall include standards with respect to—

(a) space per person, air volume, ventilation, heating, floor space, window space and time per day spent in cells;

(b) bathing facilities and frequency of opportunities for bathing;

(c) sanitary facilities and inmates' access to sanitation;

(d) supply of clothing;

(e) provision of meals;

(f) medical care;

(g) inmates' access to work, training, education, association, exercise and physical education;

(h) facilities for visits and inmates' contact with families;

(i) inmates' access to lawyers;

(j) provision of information concering bail and legal aid;

(k) inmates' access to advice and assistance from probation officers and social workers; and

(l) facilities for religious observance, to which the contracted out prison shall conform.'.

Amendment No. 91 is in line with our general views in opposition to prison privatisation that we outlined in the debate on the previous amendment. It deals with the serious problem of providing minimum standards. It would require privately managed remand centres to meet specific minimum standards laid down in the contract. That sounds as though I want to have my cake and eat it, but the amendment is intended to improve something that we hate, loathe and detest.

Throughout the passage of the Bill, we have made it clear that we fundamentally oppose the privatisation of the management of prisons, which is wrong in principle and fraught with serious dangers in practice. If the Government proceed with the private management of one or more penal establishments, everything possible must be done to ensure that private contractors are held accountable for providing decent standards for prisoners.

The amendment is clear and no one can misunderstand our intentions. The case for setting standards of the kind set out in the amendment was made in the Green Paper, "Private Sector Involvement in the Remand System", published in 1988. Paragraph 69 of that document states:

"Operating a remand centre will make heavy demands on the management responsible, and it is important that the company is left in no doubt as to the essential requirements. Contracts will have to set clear and enforceable standards. In the present prison system there is no existing composite document which lays out comprehensively and in detail the requirements for a remand centre regime. One will therefore have to be developed for this purpose. In order to give scope for innovative solutions to problems, it will be important for standards to be defined so far as possible in terms of the results to be achieved, rather than the methods to be employed."

I do not want to delay our proceedings, and I realise that the arguments are understood by the Minister and by all sections of the House. Minimum standards will be debated time and again as we return to the Woolf report and refine its message. Once we have had an opportunity to consider the 800 pages of the report at more leisure than we have had today, I am sure that we shall return to the subject of minimum standards in both public and private sectors.

Mrs. Rumbold: I understand the position of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), who has once more emphasised his opposition to the proposal for privatisation within the prison service. Although he reiterated his concerns about the proposal, he none the less stated that, if the Government proceed with the proposal, it is important that there should be high standards which would be rigorously enforceable.

For the sake of the hon. Member for Huddersfield, I repeat the assurance given in March 1989 by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, who was then Home Secretary:

"Standards would be high and would be rigorously enforced."—[Official Report, 1 March 1989; Vol. 148, c. 278.]

A contract would cover the issues set out so clearly in amendment No. 91. While I cannot list all the other things that will be set out in the contract, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that all those matters and more will be covered. We shall not tell contractors how to do their job but shall set out clearly in the contract what we wish them to achieve in respect of good and safe care of the prisoners to protect the public as well as the prisoners.

Mr. Maclennan: Does the Minister's response to the amendment show that she accepts for privatised remand prisons the recommendation made by Lord Justice Woolf that there should be accredited standards for prisons? If so, does she also accept it for the public, or will there be two different sets of standards?

Mrs. Rumbold: The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) would recall, if he had been present this afternoon, that when my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary presented the Woolf report to the House, he said that he would reflect on that matter and deal with it in the White Paper to be issued later this year. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will ensure that he is fully aware of that consultation process.

I wish to reassure the hon. Member for Huddersfield that the parts of the contract which deal with the matters under discussion will be made public. Confidentiality will apply only to those parts of any contract which, for sensible, commercial reasons are too sensitive from a security point of view. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will feel that we have given satisfactory reassurances about the way in which contracts will be drawn up.

Mr. Sheerman: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

9 pm

Mr. George: I beg to move amendment No. 124, in page 43, line 19, at end insert—

'(2A) The Secretary of State shall only enter into contracts with persons under subsection (2) above if he is satisfied that persons employed by them are adequately trained and vetted.

(2AA) The Secretary of State shall issue guidelines setting out the standards and qualifications of applicants for contracts under this section.'.

My remarks will be brief because, first, I moved the amendment in Committee and, secondly, I have been leaned on.

Those hon. Members who attended the Committee will know that I speak with some interest in the operation of the private security industry. I said earlier, that the concept of private prisons appals me. There is no point in being utopian and saying that there will be no private prisons, because the Bill will be enacted. At least there has been one experiment in the form of a privatised remand centre, on which we may expand.

If we are to have privately run remand centres, it is incumbent on us to discuss the details of their staffing and management. I should prefer to have members of the current prison service operating in prisons, because they have had a lengthy training. They attend a training college near Wakefield, for which they are carefully selected—only one in 10 of those who apply are selected. On completion of the training course, they are closely supervised. These dedicated men and women have an esprit de corps based on a long tradition of public service in prisons. They require enormous experience and are trained and retrained.

The Woolf report, however, did not consider that that was good enough. Referring to training, it argued, in paragraph 13.108:

"For this reason, and because it could also improve the present state of morale in the Prison Service, we recommend that more attention be paid by the Prison Service to training. A greater commitment to training would also help to show that the Prison Service cares about its staff".

The report then says that the Prison Officers Association extols the virtues of the Netherlands prison service and says:

"There, staff had systematic training over the first five years of a prison officer's career, and advanced training between the third and fifth year of his service. This provides an indication of just what is possible."

The report then mentions standards elsewhere and the skills that the prison officer is expected to acquire in the course of his or her service.

The private sector will never be able to come within a million miles of the present system. The prospect of its even aspiring to achieve the higher standards laid down by the Woolf report is simply pie in the sky. With support and funding, the public sector could achieve those objectives, but the private sector is inherently incapable of delivering the quality of service that is required.

Mr. Maclennan: The hon. Gentleman's argument can be further fortified by Lord Justice Woolf's recommendations on recruitment. The report states in paragraph 13.167:

"The Inquiry accepts that it is to the advantage of the management of the Service as a whole for recruitment decisions to be made at Headquarters."

Mr. George: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I always prided myself on being a speed reader, but I have not yet absorbed all the report, nor am I likely to do so. Obviously, the hon. Gentleman is a speed reader, or perhaps he started from the back of the report and worked his way to the front—we expect that sort of thing from the hon. Gentleman.

Training in the private security industry is farcical. I shall not bore the House with details, but for most companies in the private security industry, training does not exist. Those companies that make an effort may provide a day's training, and companies belonging to the British Security Industry Association are obliged to provide three days' training. However, that obligation is not met by many of the BSIA's members. There are some good, specialised security firms that lay on higher standards of training, but they are the exception. Training is expensive and if companies are in competition, they cannot win against another private security firm that does not attach great importance to training.

The private sector will not try to attain the standards required, because the remand prisons' guards, operatives and security officers will require the same standard of expertise as exists in the prison service today. Will the Home Secretary lay down standards and insist on the private sector attaining those standards? The Home Secretary must be aware that it will be enormously expensive to achieve those standards, and if contracts are let, that must be built into the calculation. I fear that training is so inadequate that companies will fail to achieve any standard that might be set.

The amendment also seeks to establish standards that would enable the private sector to recruit intelligently. That does not simply mean keeping out people with serious criminal records—the negative approach to recruitment. We want the private security industry to be a sufficiently attractive career with a suitable salary to attract the right calibre of men and women to serve in it. Remand prisons need high-calibre recruits. We do not want—as happens in other parts of the private sector security industry—to recruit from the bottom end of the market and impose on those recruits standards that they cannot achieve.

I have not the slightest shadow of doubt that the overwhelming majority of private security firms do not have vetting procedures. As I said in Committee, all that firms want to know is whether the body is warm and can start work the following day. New recruits are then measured up for uniforms and placed in a job the following day or, in many cases, the same day. Many firms do not even go through the pretence of checking references. Better companies have telephone communications systems that can trace back five years in an attempt to contact employers. They then try to trace back a further 15 years by writing to previous employers, but that takes weeks. It is an imperfect system that does not work.

The Government say that they will adopt a system of certification that is better than the hit-and-miss system operated by many firms in the industry at present. It is still to some extent, although less than in the past, a nudge, nudge, wink, wink approach whereby crime prevention officers are approached or former police officers are on the payroll to give some sign whether the person being hired has a criminal record. That is an appalling way to proceed. What I dislike about the system of certification is that it will be bestowed upon a handful of companies and the rest will have to worry for themselves. We need a system in which all private security firms have access to necessary information, with appropriate safeguards. The Government do not support that view.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the situation in Northern Ireland is comparable to the one that he suggests in which security firms must be authorised by local authorities?

Mr. George: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely correct. The one precedent in the United Kingdom is in Northern Ireland, and it approaches the licensing system that I have been trying to achieve without success. There are precedents in most other countries. It is a matter of some amusement, although it is probably more likely a matter of considerable anger—a combination of motives—why the Government refuse to do what should be done, and establish a statutory licensing authority to vet applicants and companies and lay down minimum standards. As I have said many times, there is anxiety that there are too many people with serious criminal records in the private security industry. In a leaked report two years ago, chief police officers clearly pointed out that problem.

The private security industry has low status and low pay and it is held in low esteem by the police and the public. Its staff turnover is enormous. Lucky companies have a 100 per cent. turnover a year and the bad ones have a 450 per cent. or 500 per cent. turnover a year. Men and women work for £2 an hour, taking home £70 to £80 a week, and they may work 70, 80 or even more hours for the privilege of taking home barely a living wage.

The companies that apply for contracts within that sector will not be the poor companies; they will be the better ones. However, the deficiencies inherent in the weaker, smaller and imperfect companies also tar the better companies. There are not two systems of private security in this country, there is one system, and it is bad and needs to be improved. There is the complacent view that the rubbish firms will not apply for contracts in private prisons and that it will be blue riband companies, building consortia and security firms. Who knows, an American company closely linked to Kentucky Fried Chicken may apply. Who knows what companies are likely to apply? I cannot accept that such companies are different from the rest. The whole system stinks, and it needs to be altered.

The Government are pursuing an important experiment. At least they can partially rescue the system. Ministers have given me some assurances, and I am grateful for them. I hope that, if the system is introduced, certain safeguards will be built in. I do not think that the Government have great confidence in what they propose, because of the many safeguards that they are building into the system. My hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield referred to the "flying governor". The Home Office does not have much confidence in the private sector. That is why a Home Office governor can be parachuted in to pick up the pieces should the system fail. There will be the commissariat system in which the Home Office employee will parallel the private sector manager.

There are many other safeguards. Therefore, I am not quite as alarmed as I was when I initially read the legislation. The system could be partially retrieved if only the Home Office were prepared to lay down rigorous standards. I hope that the lessons that the Government learn from this legislation will eventually lead them to introduce a full-blown system of private security regulation. My criticism is not necessarily of the private security industry but of the system within which it is permitted to operate.

Mr. Sheerman: It is always a pleasure to follow my old friend the hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George). He is such an acknowledged expert in this matter that it is with a sense of humility that I support his amendment. We know of his vast knowledge of the matter, but I should like to make one small correction. My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) was worried that his only legacy to posterity in Committee would be the coming of the phrase "the flying governnor". He wanted it put on record that it was not "the flying warden".

9.15 pm

The amendment attempts to introduce regulation of the private security industry, and that is why we support it. It is an immensely important amendment. I should describe the Governments' lack of recommendations as a black hole. I give credit where credit is due—the two Ministers of State did a pretty good job on the brief, but on this matter, they failed to convince. One could see them hovering around, worried about falling into the black hole when we pressed them to say how they would control the private security contractors if there were no standards or regulations.

They had no answers to the questions put by the great authority on the Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, South; they had no answers when we pressed them from the Front Bench. The Government have no way of controlling what would happen if the private sector were allowed a free rein even in the small element of the private remand sector, let alone in an expanded sector.

Last week, I received a telephone call from a reporter who had got hold of a story—I do not know whether it is true—that the Ministry of Defence was talking about arming the private security people who guard our defence installations. We must make absolutely sure that our defence establishments are secure from terrorist and other attacks. If the Ministry of Defence, with all its security, cannot get it right and ensure that standards are high and that a level of competence is delivered by the contractor at the agreed price, what hope is there that the Home Office will get it right in relation to imprisonment? There are very real problems.

This is an immensely important issue. The Opposition fundamentally oppose the introduction of privatised prisons, but if they are to be introduced, far more effective mechanisms are needed to regulate the private security industry. Clause 71 and schedule 8 are not sufficient protection.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, South that much of the private security industry has an appalling record. That does not apply to all companies; they are not all tarred with the same brush. There are some acceptable and reputable companies, but the industry is huge, employing 150,000 or perhaps 200,000 people—twice as many as the regular police force. There is a notorious lack of vetting of staff, derisory training of employees and appalling levels of pay. There are no minimum standards.

However, in a competitive free-for-all, the bad companies affect the good. Bad companies with non-existent training and the lowest levels of pay put in the lowest bids, which undercut those of their more reputable counterparts. To obtain contracts, good companies are forced to reduce standards. How will Ministers stop shoddy companies replacing better companies?

I remember an occasion in Committee when we were discussing our experience in local government. I gave the example of being forced by a particular piece of legislation —I cannot remember which Government introduced it —to start taking competitive tenders for all our housing contracts. What happened? Who saved money? Time and time again, we walked into a trap of accepting the lowest tender from a fringe builder who went bankrupt halfway through the job. We had to get someone else in to finish the work. That is what happens with competitive tendering.

One has only to look at the experience of the Ministry of Defence to see the dangers involved. For years, the Opposition have argued that the private security industry must be properly regulated, and that self-regulation will not do. We need a system allowing for minimum standards of training and, in the case of prisoner custody officers, we would expect that training to be very rigorous. We need a proper vetting system and adequate wages. One does not get quality unless one pays a decent wage.

On 31 January, when we discussed the matter in Committee, the Minister said:

"I am interested in all the hon. Gentleman's comments. I shall seriously consider what he said and try to ensure that we have the right standards and protection to deal with private sector contractors. We shall examine the circumstances carefully so as to protect the interests of the public and of the Government and Home Secretary of the day."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A; 31 January 1991, c. 611.]

What conclusions has the Minister reached? What titbits has she hidden away? If she does not accept the amendment, the Bill will go to the other place with no provision for control over who runs the private sector side of the operation. This is a dangerous part of the Bill. Without control, private security has no future in which any of us can have confidence.

Mrs. Rumbold: I was sad to hear the hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) say that he could not give us one of his long and discursive speeches about private security. I enjoyed them very much in Committee, and I was looking forward to another episode.

Mr. Michael: An epic.

Mrs. Rumbold: Yes, an epic. I have great respect for the hon. Gentleman's knowledge of these matters, to which the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) referred, and I understand the concerns that he expressed in arguing for the amendment.

We discussed the matter at considerable length in Committee. As the hon. Member for Huddersfield and I have said before, clause 71 and schedule 8 provide for the certification of a prisoner custody officer. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will have to be satisfied that a prospective prisoner custody officer is a fit and proper person to perform the relevant functions and—most important—that he has been trained to an approved standard before he gains such a certificate. That is an exceedingly important measure, which I wholeheartedly support.

In addition, there is another provision to ensure proper protection for those who undertake such important tasks: the contractors themselves will use selection procedures. If, at any point, it turns out that a prison custody officer is not a fit and proper person, the Secretary of State will have the opportunity to revoke a certificate. If an unsuitable person should, by any remote chance, slip through the net, that will reflect upon the contractor who employed him or her.

It has always been clearly understood that, if any aspect of the prison custody service is contracted out, accountability in respect of public safety and for the way in which prisoners are treated will in no way be diminished. As I said several times in Committee, that is very important. The responsibility will continue to be discharged, albeit in a different way. Accountability remains, simply because the Home Secretary could not afford to place the prisoners in the custody of people who are not totally respectable and reliable.

There is no question of the Home Secretary allowing less than satisfactory firms to be responsible for employing those who will carry out prisoner custody tasks. The companies that we have come across up to now have all been major long-established companies with high reputations. I do not believe that my right hon. Friend would wish to deal with any companies other than those with the highest qualifications.

Mr. Sheerman: That is exactly the point that I was addressing. The first issue is how we can decide on the standards and the criteria. What is the mechanism and the structure? Who will authenticate the process and ensure that certification works and delivers? Secondly, does not the right hon. Lady realise that, once we are involved in competitive tendering, it will no longer be the reputable, the nice or the quality people whose names will come across her desk, because once she starts to exclude people on competitive tendering grounds, she will find that she has involved both herself and the Government in a civil court action that will open the door to all the other people —rightly, in civil legal terms—and she will be forced to take all comers?

Mrs. Rumbold: The hon. Member for Huddersfield is recalling his local government days, when we contracted out repairs on council houses. That was one of the first areas of local government work in which the private sector became involved. Of course, everyone who wished to had a perfect right to tender for those contracts and nobody is saying that that would not necessarily be the case here. However, what happened in local government—I am confident that this is what will happen in this case, building on the experience of local government—is that all firms will be looked at carefully to ensure that they comply with all the requirements.

As was the case with local government, the cheapest firm is not necessarily always chosen now. Some local authorities, however, did not take responsibility for ensuring that their ratepayers got the best value for money. When considering firms for private sector contracts, it was, and is, important to ensure that the best services—the most cost-effective and the most efficient services—were chosen and they were not necessarily always from the cheapest contractors.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten) well knows what happened in local government, because he too has experience in that world, and he knows perfectly well that it is important to choose quality as well as the lowest price.

Mr. Allason: Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is a difference between mending windows for a local authority and looking after prisoners? Does she accept that there is a contradiction between the Government's determination to regulate and to authorise security firms in Northern Ireland and their determination not to do so for the rest of the United Kingdom?

Mrs. Rumbold: Of course contracting out local government services is different. Nevertheless, local government serves a useful purpose when drawing an analogy with the kind of contracts that we are looking at for the prison service, and I prefer to keep to that analogy for the time being.

On the issue of public safety and the way in which prisoners are treated, the Home Secretary will also need to be satisfied that the contractors have the necessary financial backing and management resources to take on such contracts. Large sums of money will be involved. We are talking about multi-million-pound contracts, which will certainly be beyond the reach of any of the so-called "fly-by-night" firms about which the hon. Members for Huddersfield and for Walsall, South have great concern.

Having reconsidered these arguments and aired them yet again—we discussed them thoroughly in Committee, when I undertook to ascertain whether we could go further than we had at that stage to meet hon. Members' concerns—I hope that what I have said reaffirms that we have done that. I can give an undertaking that we shall be very open about the standards required of contractors, especially in respect of training, about which I know full well the hon. Member for Walsall, South is particularly concerned. I too regard training as an important issue. When we come to consider what should be required for certification and the work that the contractors must carry out, we shall certainly give very careful consideration to what Woolf has to say.

9.30 pm

Mr. George: Despite the assurances that have been given, I feel that this amendment should be put to the vote.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Clause 67

OFFICERS OF CONTRACTED OUT PRISONS

Mr. Randall: I beg to move amendment No. 104, in page 43, line 35, at end insert

(; and (c) a monitor, who shall be a crown servant, appointed by the Secretary of State.'.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 105, in page 43, line 41, after 'director', insert 'or monitor'.

No. 106, in page 44, line 5, leave out 'controller' and insert 'monitor'.

Mr. Randall: The purpose of this amendment is simple. We are concerned about the position of the controller as defined in the Bill. We understand that the controller is to exercise disciplinary power at the same time as he is to report to the Secretary of State on the running and administration of the prison. Although we are happy that a Crown servant, the controller, rather than the private director, will exercise disciplinary powers, we believe that he should not at the same time report to the Secretary of State on the running and administration of the system. In reality, he would be reporting on himself, since the exercise of disciplinary powers is integral to the running of the prison.

The amendment separates the two functions by introducing a monitor who is responsible for reporting to the Secretary of State on the day-to-day running of the prison, including the activities of the controller, who is simply there to exercise his disciplinary powers—no more, no less. We believe that such a separation of functions represents the appropriate way in which to proceed. It is wrong in principle for the controller to report, in part on his own activities.

Mrs. Rumbold: I listened with interest to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall). I am a little surprised at his argument for splitting the controller's duties, because I was under the impression that the hon. Gentleman believed that having a controller in the private sector represented an additional responsibility that did not exist in the public sector. I am therefore surprised to learn that he now proposes that we should have not only two people, a director and a controller, but a third person. I am not convinced of the logic of that argument.

I do not want to be unkind to the hon. Gentleman, but his suggestion for splitting responsibilities between the controller and a monitor is rather superfluous. His amendment is unnecessary and I have little sympathy for it.

The amendment does not add anything to the responsibilities of a controller, who I believe is the adequate person to monitor the work of a private sector prison in co-operation with the director, but with direct responsibility to the Home Secretary. I cannot accept the amendment.

Mr. Randall: I listened with interest to what the Minister said about what we consider to be a dilemma in the reporting structure, and I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 76

CASH LIMITS FOR PROBATION SERVICES

Mr. Michael: I beg to move amendment No. 92, in page 50, line 16, leave out paragraph (a).

The amendment would delete paragraph (a), which amends the Powers of Criminal Courts Act 1973. That paragraph removes the obligation to provide "sufficient probation officers" and in its place it substitutes the words, "such number of probation officers as may be agreed between them and the responsible authority to be a sufficient number of such officers".

If the Bill goes through as it stands, it will require the probation committee and the local authority to come to an agreement on the number of probation officers needed——

Mr. John Greenway: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I know that we all have difficulty following the order of amendments when dealing with such a technical——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know what the hon. Gentleman is about to say. I have just been told that the hon. Gentleman's amendment was accepted. I was going to put it at the end of this debate, but since the hon. Gentleman has raised the matter now, I shall put the amendment formally with my apologies.

INTERPRETATION OF PART IV

Amendment made: No. 119, in page 47, leave out line 8. —[Mr. John Greenway.]

Mr. Michael: The Minister appears to have been consumed by the confusion and was not listening, so I shall start again.

The amendment is intended to straighten out an anomaly in the Bill, in which we find the curious suggestion by the Government that words in the 1973 Act which show a need to have sufficient probation officers in an area should be substituted by a requirement for a probation committee to agree with the local authority the number of officers required in an area. That is nonsense.

I approach the matter with some neutrality, having been chairman of a local authority finance committee and a member of a probation committee—so I can claim to be well informed. My information leads me to suggest that the Bill is nonsense as it stands.

Under the new regime that we have, partly as a result of the Bill and partly as a result of developments initiated by the Minister and his colleagues, the Home Office will decide the finances needed within a formula for a particular probation area. The Home Office will offer advice on the numbers required. The Home Office will determine 80 per cent. of the finances in any event, and the local authority will have to fall into line. In any case, the local authority discusses the budget with the probation committee year by year, and will continue to do so.

The Central Council of Probation Committees understood, following discussions with the Home Office Ministers and officials, that, once cash limits were set, as they will be in future, on probation committee budgets, committees will have the discretion to determine their own priorities and resource needs, including staffing, within the budget and subject to all the other restrictions. For instance, there will be regular Home Office inspections, including a study of staffing levels in probation committees, which are accountable in Home Office statistics and in their own annual reports.

Our amendment seeks to delete the requirement in paragraph (a) because it is at best meaningless and at worst a recipe for pointless disagreement between probation committees and local authorities. It appears to give some control to local authorities, but in fact it does no such thing. If the Minister wants to delete the words "sufficient probation officers" from the 1973 Act, let him admit as much and do. I have had private conversations and I have corresponded with the Minister on these matters, and I am a little disappointed that the provision is still in the Bill at this stage. I had hoped that the Minister would have moved a Government amendment by now to dispose of the problem.

In Committee, the Minister suggested that subsection 76(2) did not change the role of local authorities or of committees, but that is precisely what it does and why it is necessary to remove it from the Bill. It is a drafting mistake, and even at this late stage I urge the Minister to listen to the voice of reason as well to the voice of experience in the form of the Central Council of Probation Committees and other bodies. He has made a mistake; he should accept that he has and tidy up the Bill.

Sir Anthony Durant (Reading, West): I have had some difficulty finding a point at which to intervene today, and I am slightly off course in the debate on this amendment —except in so far as it relates to probation officers.

Probation officers in my constituency have been to see me, anxious about their role in the probation service. They believe that the Bill may damage their role with their clients. They fear that they will be allocated the judicial role of punishment rather than the remedial role of helping their clients.

I hope that the Minister will reassure me that probation officers' vital role will be carefully considered and that, when dealing with clients, they will not be allocated a role strictly to do with punishment at the expense of the remedial side of their work.

Mr. John Patten: I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West (Mr. Durant) that the Government envisage a careful expansion in the probation service until the financial year 1993-94. The autumn statement provides a useful background for the amendment. It proposes the introduction of more than 800 new probation officers over the next three years—the biggest single injection of officers of both sexes that has ever occurred—as well as a 25 per cent. increase in overall expenditure on the probation service in the years up to 1993-94, taking inflation into account: the biggest single cash increase that the service has ever received.

We want the probation service to change its present role. We want it to develop its considerable skills in confronting offending behaviour and making offenders face up to what they have done, so that they do not do it again. That means exercising control as well as care—caring authority, as it were. Vigorous, forward-looking bodies such as the Association of Chief Officers of Probation, and that valuable organisation, the National Association of Senior Probation Officers, are already gearing themselves up to the task.

My hon. Friend's Reading constituency faces a challenge. I value the work of the probation service in Berkshire: under its excellent chief probation officer, it is one of the best probation services in the country. It will have formidable opportunity to do what probation officers do best—stop people offending again.

I have invested a good deal of time in arguing, in Committee and in the corridors, with the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) about clause 76 and the issue that he has raised tonight. I pay tribute to the knowledge that he has acquired, both as the former chairman of a council finance committee and as one who has served in other parts of the criminal justice system. The trouble is that he and I cannot agree on the meaning of words. Sometimes, however much we respect someone else's judgment, we must agree to disagree. The hon. Gentleman and I have engaged in a lengthy correspondence: our word processors have been at it hammer and tongs over the past three or four weeks. I intend to place in the Library the full correspondence, complete with marginalia, so that posterity can judge which of us was right.

The intention of clause 76(2) is not to usurp the role of committees in deciding how many probation officers are needed, but simply to allow local authorities to object to expenditure on them, and to allow either the committee or the local authority, in default of agreement, to seek a determination from the Secretary of State. The subsection is necessary to prevent the cash limit from becoming de facto a precept on the paying authority. Thus expenditure on probation officers will be brought into line with existing arrangements relating to other items of current expenditure.

Local authorities are already able to object to many other items of expenditure in committees' estimates—on a range of non-probation officer staff issues, on accommodation and on equipment. There seems to be no good reason for continuing to single out expenditure on probation officers for special treatment when they now add up to only about half the staff in the probation service.

I disagree with the hon. Gentleman's interpretation of the Bill. Clause 76 is extremely well drafted, as are all the rest. My interpretation is absolutely clear, and the amendment—well-meaning though it is—would not improve it in any way.

Mr. Michael: The hon. Member for Reading, West (Sir A. Durant) made a valid point. I am glad that he used the excuse of the amendment to mention the work of probation officers. From my knowledge of their work, I agree with his comments. He led the Minister astray a little into commenting on the probation service in general, but who can blame him for that? The problem is simple—the Minister is wrong.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Criminal Justice Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Boswell.]

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Michael: For one moment, I thought that you, Mr. Speaker, had intervened on my suggestion that the Minister was wrong. I realise now that you were not questioning that.

The Minister is wrong to say that paragraph (a) is necessary to ensure that the cash limit does not become a precept. A local authority must agree the budget with the probation committee. It is not, as the Minister suggested, a question of agreeing expenditure on probation officers, which is already provided for in the agreement on the budget. The paragraph says that the local authority must agree the number of people that the probation committee will employ.

I am afraid that the Minister, despite the considerable good will that he has shown my efforts to persuade him that he is wrong, has got it wrong yet again. I am delighted that he is to place our correspondence in the Library so that the great British public and hon. Members will be able to read both sides of our exchanges and realise that amendment No. 92 is correct. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment, so that the other place can agree it.

Clause 77

INFORMATION AS TO FINANCIAL IMPLICATIONS OF DECISIONS

Mr. John Patten: I beg to move amendment No. 100, in page 51, line 10, after 'of', insert '—(a)'.

Mr. Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to consider Government amendments Nos. 101 and 102.

Mr. Patten: I remind the House that, when the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) moved new clause 4 last Wednesday, which was defeated on a Division, I said that the Government were bent on tabling their own amendments to achieve the same ends, to introduce matters of gender and race and to make clear the importance of avoiding discrimination in the criminal justice system. I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Sheerman: We welcome the Government's decision to make this little concession on race. Amendment No. 101 allows for ethnic monitoring not only of court decisions but of persons engaged in the administration of justice.

Amendment No. 101 refers to sex discrimination. We should recognise our important achievement in persuading the Government to act. We are having our cake and eating it again, but we are pleased that we pushed them sufficiently to make them go away and think about it.

It is important, however, to stress that the amendment goes only a little way towards achieving our objective. The anti-discrimination statement which we unsuccessfully tried to incorporate in the Bill is important. In the debate last week, the Minister generously agreed to meet a deputation, including hon. Members from both sides of the House, and to discuss over a cup of tea——

Mr. Patten: The kettle is always boiling.

Mr. Sheerman: If the kettle is always boiling, will the Minister see a deputation from the black lobby, who are concerned to put their case on the need for a declaratory clause?

Mr. Patten: I often see representatives of the ethnic minority groups and have done so throughout my years at the Home Office. I have seen the black lawyers and others, but if the hon. Gentleman wishes to bring another group as part of an all-party delegation to discuss the issues, the kettle is on the hob.

Mr. Sheerman: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for the willingness that he has shown. Several people are involved, such as those associated with the Church and those associated with the law. It would not be an unmanageable delegation. Those people have asked me to put this case. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, last week the community and race relations unit of the British Council of Churches pointed out the need for a declaratory clause and stressed the importance of a statutory commitment in making the position plain to minority communities.

Mr. Patten: I have written to that body to discuss these issues directly, and have been in communication by correspondence with several organisations.

Mr. Sheerman: I thank the right hon. Gentleman. Now that he has accepted the point about a deputation coming for tea to talk about the importance of this issue, I believe that it will not be too late in another place to put that provision into the Bill. We debated this matter in Committee. The right hon. Gentleman was not entirely persuaded, but he went halfway. This declaration would reaffirm some positive elements in people's views on what the criminal justice system is like.

The Minister knows that what people feel about the criminal justice system is important. If I may draw a parallel with the fear of crime, it is important to affirm to people that the fear of crime is much greater than the reality. In the same way, we believe that it is important to affirm to ethnic minorities that the reality of racism in the criminal justice system is not so great as it is believed by their communities to be. The declaratory aspect of the Bill would go a long way to reassuring them. I accept that the Minister will keep a relatively open mind on that issue.

Amendment agreed to.

New Schedule

PROVISIONS SUBSTITUTED FOR SECTION 15 OF 1965 ACT

Variation and discharge of supervision orders.

15.—(1) If while a supervision order is in force in respect of a supervised person it appears to a relevant court, on the application of the supervisor or the supervised person, that it is appropriate to make an order under this subsection, the court may make an order discharging the supervision order or varying it—

(a) by cancelling any requirement included in it in pursuance of section 12, 12A, 12AA, 12B or 12C or section 18(2)(b) of this Act; or

(b) by inserting in it (either in addition to or in substitution for any of its provisions) any provision which could have been included in the order if the court had then had power to make it and were exercising the power.

(2) The powers of variation conferred by subsection (1) above do not include power—

(a) to insert in the supervision order, after the expiration of three months beginning with the date when the order was originally made, a requirement in pursuance of section 12B(1) of this Act, unless it is in substitution for such a requirement already in the order; or

(b) to insert in the supervision order a requirement in pursuance of section 12A(3)(b) of this Act in respect of any day which falls outside the period of three months beginning with the date when the order was originally made.

(3) If while a supervision order made under section 7(7) of this Act is in force in respect of a person it is proved to the satisfaction of a relevant court, on the application of the supervisor, that the supervised person has failed to comply with any requirement included in the supervision order in pursuance of section 12, 12A, 12AA, 12C or 18(2)(b) of this Act, the court—

(a) whether or not it also makes an order under subsection (1) above, may order him to pay a fine of an amount not exceeding £1,000 or subject to section 16A(1) of this Act, may make an attendance centre order in respect of him; or

(b) in the case of a person who has attained the age of eighteen, may (if it also discharges the supervision order) make an order imposing on him any punishment, other than a sentence of detention in a young offender institution, which it could have imposed on him if it—

(i) had then had power to try him for the offence in consequence of which the supervision order was made; and

(ii) had convicted him in the exercise of that power.

(4) If while a supervision order is in force in respect of a person it is proved to the court under subsection (3) above that the supervised person has failed to comply with any requirement included in the supervision order in pursuance of section 12A(3)(a) of this Act directing the supervised person to participate in specified activities, the court may, if it also discharges the supervision order, make an order imposing on him any sentence which it could have imposed on him if it—

(a) had then had power to try him for the offence in consequence of which the supervision order was made; and

(b) had convicted him in the exercise of that power:

(5) In a case falling within subsection (3)(b) or (4) above where the offence in question is of a kind which the court has no power to try, or has no power to try without appropriate consents, the sentence imposed by virtue of that provision—

(a) shall not exceed that which any court having power to try such an offence could have imposed in respect of it, and

(b) where the case falls within subsection (3)(b) above and the sentence is a fine, shall not in any event exceed £5,000; and

(c) where the case falls within subsection (4) above, shall not in any event exceed a custodial sentence for a term of six months and a fine of £5,000.

(6) A court may not make an order by virtue of subsection (4) above unless the court which made the supervision order made a statement under subsection (1) of sectiion 12D of this Act; and for the purposes of this subsection a certificate under that section shall be evidence of the making of the statement to which it relates.

(7) Section 16 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 (fixing of certain fines by reference to units) shall apply—

(a) for the purposes of subsection (3)(a) above, as if the failure to comply with the requirement were a summary offence punishable by a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale; and

(b) for the purposes of subsections (3)(b) and (4) above as if the failure to comply with the requirement were a summary offence punishable by a fine not exceeding level 5 on that scale; and a fine imposed under any of those provisions shall be deemed for the purposes of any enactment to be a sum adjudged to be paid by a conviction.

(8) In dealing with a supervised person under subsection (3) or (4) above, the court shall take into account the extent to which that person has complied with the requirements of the supervision order.

(9) If a medical practitioner by whom or under whose direction a supervised person is being treated for his mental condition in pursuance of a requirement included in a supervision order by virtue of section 12B(1) of this Act is unwilling to continue to treat or direct the treatment of the supervised person or is of opinion—

(a) that the treatment would be continued beyond the period specified in that behalf in the order; or

(b) that the supervised person needs different treatment; or

(c) that he is not susceptible to treatment; or

(d) that he does not require further treatment, the practitioner shall make a report in writing to that effect to the supervisor.

(10) On receiving a report under subsection (9) above, the supervisor shall refer it to a relevant court; and on such a reference, the court may make an order cancelling or varying the requirement.

(11) In this section "relevant court" means—

(a) in the case of a supervised person who has attained the age of eighteen, a youth court;

(b) in the case of a supervised person who has attained the age, a magistrate's court other than a youth court.

(12) The provisions of this section shall have effect subject to the provisions of section 16 of this Act.'.—[Mr. John Patten.]

'(a) it has consulted a probation officer; and

(b) it is satisfied that it is feasible to secure compliance with the requirement.'.

No. 24, in page 56, line 46, leave out 'probationer' and insert 'offender'.

No. 25, in page 57, line 42, at end insert—

(a) sub-paragraphs (4) and (6) of paragraph 2 above; and

(b) sub-paragraph (3) of paragraph 3 above, shall each have effect as if for the reference to 60 days there were substituted a reference to such greater number of days as may be specified in the direction.

(2) In this paragraph "sexual offence" has the same meaning as in Part I of the Criminal Justice Act 1991.".

No. 26, in page 59, line 4, leave out 'section 10' and insert 'that section'.—[Mr. John Patten.]

Mr. John Patten: I beg to move amendment No. 27, in page 59, line 8, leave out from 'satisfied' to 'his' in line 9 and insert—

'(a) that the offender is dependent on drugs or alcohol;

(b) that his dependency caused or contributed to the offence in respect of which the order is proposed to be made; and

(c) that'.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider Government amendments Nos. 28 to 34.

Mr. Patten: The amendments make two substantive changes to the provisions in schedule 1 on the treatment for drug and alcohol misuse. Those changes were recommended to me by the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs criminal justice working group and were pressed on me powerfully by my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler). I commend the amendment to the House.

Mr. Butler: The Government have proved themselves a listening Government in this respect, but I can give them only eight marks out of 10 for the amendment. In Standing Committee I referred to the use of "dependence" and "dependent". The Government seem to be trying to resolve the problem by including the definition of a propensity towards the misuse of drugs or alcohol within the definition of "dependence". I am not completely satisfied with that.

In 1982 the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs recommended the use of the phrase "problem drug taker" rather than a range of terms including "drug dependent" or "drug addict". The advisory council on alcoholism recommended the use of the term "problem drinker".

If we do not use the terms "problem drinker" or "problem drug taker", a person may be excluded from treatment who does not use drugs or alcohol habitually, but who may use them regularly. Similarly, some people use stimulants only at the weekends. They might not be taken within the definition of drug-dependent, but they may nevertheless have a drug-related problem. Legislation should take into account the accepted terminology recommended by the Government's advisory bodies, accepted by the Government and which has formed the basis for the provision of treatment in the community.

With regard to amendment No. 32, I am not sure why sub-paragraph (5) appears in schedule 1. It is difficult to see what additional powers or authority it provides or why it is required. If there are additional grounds for its inclusion, it is not clear why it should apply specifically to residential provision. There is an argument that it should apply to any change in the treatment requirement, not just to one type of treatment.

I realise that I have made a technical point and I should be happy for my right hon. Friend the Minister to respond to me in writing. I suspect that my point about amendment No. 27 may be taken up in another place, failing satisfaction here.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): I do not wish to detain the House on what other hon. Members must consider to be a small point. However, I endorse what my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler) said. My hon. Friend's point is extremely important in the context of drugs, which remain a tragic problem in our communities. The whole thrust of the Bill is absolutely in the right direction in advocating treatment rather than prison sentences. It is terribly important that we take to heart those points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South.

I urge the Government to re-examine sub-paragraph (9) of amendment No. 32. That sub-paragraph seems to allow a combination order that would involve the imposition of a community service order for not less than 40 and not more than 100 hours in addition to the probation order, and a requirement to undertake treatment for problem drinking and drug taking.

The difficulty is that an individual with a drug problem has a very serious problem that requires treatment. The concentration should be on the supervision and completion of the specified treatment. There is a potential difficulty in undertaking a community service order because of that drug problem. For such an individual, finding appropriate service is likely to be extremely difficult.

That does not mean that it is not inappropriate to impose a combination order but it would be difficult to expect a combination order to be imposed that also had a treatment requirement attached to it.

Mr. Patten: I shall respond first to my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone), whose long-standing interest in and authority on these issues we all respect. We set great store by the combination order. It may be difficult and challenging for the probation service, and the voluntary organisations that sometimes assist it—to which I pay tribute—to find suitable community service for the particularly chaotic characters who are sometimes addicted to drugs and alcohol or who, from time to time, go on drug and alcohol binges, but who are not clinically dependent.

10.15 pm

It is important that people who are not trading in hard or soft drugs, but who are the unfortunate and sad misusers of those substances, receive some form of sanction or punishment to replace a prison sentence. I do not want such people to go to prison, any more than others do. I want drug offenders who trade and traffic in drugs to go to prison for a long time, and have their assets and those of their families confiscated. We must find a way of pursuing those assets beyond the grave if the defendants inconveniently die before convictions are brought.

It is critical for courts to have combination orders available to them to ensure that, when a sentence is handed down by the court, it means something to the offender and the community, and people do not effectively get away with breaking the law. I appreciate the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes.

As usual, my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler) made some interesting points. He wondered why paragraph (7) was included in schedule 1. It provides for "the offender to receive part of his treatment as a resident patient in an institution or place notwithstanding that the institution or place is not one which could have been specified for that purpose in the probation order."

I can clear that up now without having to go to the unnecessary lengths of writing letters, although the matter may be examined in another place. There may be places that would not normally be specified in a probation order, to which we would want such people to be directed for treatment specifically linked to their condition, either as a dependent person or someone who indulges in what are known in the trade as alcoholic binges or drug abuse.

Amendments Nos. 27 and 33 enable a requirement to undergo treatment to be included in a probation order when an offender either is dependent on drugs or alcohol or has a tendency to misuse them. Everything does not hinge on dependency itself. That "either/or" policy must be linked to a contribution to the offence. At present, the criterion in schedule 1 refers simply to the defendant being dependent on drugs or alcohol. The amendments will deal with the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South. I welcome the chance to answer his questions.

The amendments ensure that the requirement to undergo treatment is used only when the misuse of drugs or alcohol is directly related to the offence. That will cover cases where the person was not clinically dependent on alcohol—hence the debate over the use of "dependence" —but had indulged in a drinking binge that led to the commission of crime.

I hope that the House will feel able to accept the amendments after my clarification of those points.

Amendment agreed to.

Order for Third Reading read.

10.20 pm

Mr. John Patten: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The Criminal Justice Bill has been improved in an excellent Committee stage to which hon. Members on both sides have contributed—I refer in particular to the official Opposition and the absent hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones) on behalf of the third parties. My right hon.

[Mr. John Patten]

Friend the Minister of State, Home Office and I are very grateful to those who served on the Committee for the way in which they improved the Bill.

I have only four points to make. First, the Bill has brought about a number of widely welcomed fundamental changes that have appealed to both sides of the House. For example, some radical and long overdue reforms to the parole system have been received with universal plaudits.

Secondly, the Bill has also seen the breaking in to the world of penal affairs and the criminal justice system a greater measure of involvement by the private sector than this country has ever seen before. The measure of the help that the private sector can bring, alongside the voluntary sector to court security duties and in the running of private remand centres, will help this country and its penal system.

Thirdly, the Bill marks a signal attempt on behalf of Her Majesty's Government in the fight against crime, on this occasion looking not at trying to bolt the door after the penal or criminal horse has escaped but at trying to deal with issues at the root. That is why we have placed so much attention in the Bill on parental responsibility and on trying to improve parental responsibility to stop young people growing crooked and contributing to crime when they are older.

At the same time, we have also wanted, through adopting the radical proposals of the Pigot committee in respect of child witnesses, to make quite sure that more guilty child abusers are brought to book and put in prison. Our changes in the parole system will mean that they will stay in prison for a considerably longer period than they have hitherto.

Fourthly, the Bill has made the most radical changes to the sentencing framework of the criminal justice system that this century has seen. The ability that the Bill confers on sentencers to ensure that those who commit serious, violent and sexual crimes receive punishment commensurate with those crimes—normally meaning that they will be sentenced to considerably longer periods than they get now and that they will stay in gaol for considerably longer periods—is balanced by a similar series of provisions that enable much greater punishment in the community to occur so that minor, less serious and non-violent criminals are punished outside our prisons.

It is peculiarly apposite that we are making these changes on the day on which Lord Justice Woolf's excellent report was published. That fundamental change to the sentencing structure will underlie developments in the criminal justice system, not just in this decade or in the first decade of the next century. It will be the fundamental underpinning of the criminal justice system well into the next century. No Bill is immortal, but this Bill will make a fundamental change to the way in which we do things. I commend it to the House.

Mr. Sheerman: It has been a long process. This Bill was the major Bill in the Gracious Speech, and we spent many hours debating it in Committee. As the Minister said, this is an important day. The day on which Third Reading took place will be looked back on as a historic day for the criminal justice system.

We discussed the hallmark of this Bill in Committee. When the Government went along with the independent authorities that had been asked to consider particular problems—I refer to the Prior report and to the Carlisle report—and when they introduced into the Bill the distillation of such wisdom, they produced important and encouraging provisions.

Thanks to a little help from the Opposition in tidying up bits and pieces here and there and in nudging the Government here and there, the Bill is not too bad in parts. However, other parts of the Bill are not based on such a sound pragmatic framework but are more concerned with the ideological claptrap of a Thatcherite society. Nowadays, even that term is out of date. We look with dismay at the provisions dealing with parental responsibility and privatisation.

The Woolf report, which we discussed this afternoon, is uppermost in our minds. There is an inevitable contradiction between those provisions and what the Woolf report said, which we believe is the basis for a bright future for the criminal justice system—certainly the penal side of the system. Historians will look back on this day as the day on which there was a possibility of change in our penal system. Unfortunately, that change will not occur because of the Third Reading of this Bill. People will remember this as the day of the Woolf report and not the day of Third Reading.

For those of us who wanted a more thorough reform of our penal system, it has been a sad day. The Government have prevented us at every twist and turn from debating and amending the Bill. First, they deliberately constrained the debate by giving the Bill its long title, because they knew that the Woolf report was on its way. To some extent, we believe that the Government have delayed the Woolf report coming to the House because they did not want the embarrassment of it arriving in time to allow a real opportunity to amend the Bill here.

What is wrong with the Bill is that it missed that opportunity. There was even pettiness last Wednesday on the first day of Report, when we were arguing for simple measures to get people out of prison, which is what we thought the Bill was about—and those measures are in Woolf. We must get out of prison those people who should not and need not be there, such as the mentally ill. We tabled an amendment in Committee and last Wednesday on Report to try to get out of the penal system the 20 per cent. of mentally ill people who should never have been placed in it. We tabled a simple amendment to ensure that a pyschiatric report would be available to a court when it was thought necessary.

Another issue on which we feel bitter is the imprisonment of fine defaulters. Opposition Members want to get away from the Dickensian world in which debtors are sent to prison—17,000 fine defaulters are sent to prison each year. They should not be clogging the system. That is against any supportable system of justice.

Throughout the passage of the Bill, the Opposition have attempted to criticise constructively those parts of the Bill that we support, while making quite clear our principled objections to the Bill's objectionable and doctrinaire proposals. We have attempted to improve the Bill with a range of new suggestions that would be of great benefit to the criminal justice system. We have succeeded in making the Government think again on several proposals.

I do not want to crow, but I shall list one or two. The definition of "serious harm" in clauses 1 and 2 has been greatly improved. The Government have at least started to see the importance of statutory obligations to tackle racism. They have improved on their initial blunder with regard to clause 25 and homosexual offences. But the Government have still not got those issues right, and we hope that there is still time to move. We shall be pressing for further changes in the other place.

We have succeeded also in persuading the Government to get rid of the five-day rule. There have been constructive changes to the section of the Pigot proposals to include, for example, child witnesses within the Bill's protections. The Government have got rid of the daft proposal to allow parents of 16-year-olds living at home and attending full-time education to be bound over. We can claim that all those are some minor successes that have been achieved not only by opposition but by the fact that we have taken the Bill seriously and tried constructively to aid the Government when appropriate.

We shall continue to push these and many other issues in another place. In addition to the issues that I have already raised, we shall press the Government to accept our new clause to divert the mentally ill from prison. The treatment of the mentally ill is a blot on our present system. I hope that, in the light of the Woolf inquiry, the Government will come to see the wisdom of our proposals. We hope, too, that the Government, in the light of Woolf, will warm to our proposals to limit the number of fine defaulters who are committed to prison. We anticipate that, in another place, our new clauses to ensure that this country complies with the European Court of Human Rights' ruling on life-sentence prisoners and on the abolition of the mandatory life sentence for murder will meet with more favour. We shall continue to argue our case for a sentencing council, which we believe is at the heart of where the Government have got the Bill wrong.

We have objected to many of the proposals in the Bill from the outset. We regard curfews and electronic monitoring as dangerous gimmicks, which research has shown to be a farce. Then there are the proposals on fining and binding over parents. Glibly described as attempts to shore up parental responsibility, they do nothing of the sort. Populist and simplistic, they seem designed to tip the more vulnerable families in our community into breakdown.

Finally, there are the privatisation proposals. No Bill is complete without some reference to this dogmatic obsession. The Government are determined to plough on and, indeed extend this idea, despite the appalling record of the private security industry, and despite all the damage that it is doing to relationships with key personnel in the prison system. Privatisation is poisoning the atmosphere in the prison service, at a time when a responsible Government would ensure that they were pulling everyone behind them as they moved to the implementation of Woolf. Relationships with prison governors are at an all-time low, and relationships with prison officers are not good.

I hope that the Government will think again and allow some of the key proposals of the Woolf report to be incorporated in the Bill. When the Home Secretary introduced the Woolf report—all 800 pages of it, which we had had about an hour and a half to absorb—we pleaded with the Government, even at this late stage, to think again, with a view to incorporating some of that radically new philosophy into the Bill during its passage through another place.

Again I ask the Home Secretary, who is now on the Front Bench, and his team really to think through the issue. As we said earlier today, we see Woolf as a change of philosophy. If the Government accept it, they have markedly changed their stance. Let me refer to a point about which I pressed the Home Secretary. If the Government really accept Woolf, the simplistic approaches—building more prisons, and privatising a sector of the service—have been recognised for what they are. These were always false paths.

This Bill is good in parts, and it has been improved in parts. However, two important parts of it will do major damage to the criminal justice system and will be resented by magistrates and by those who work in the prison service. What we need is an all-party, more moderate approach. We hear that, these days, it is fashionable in Government circles to talk about a centrist role in policy terms.

At this late stage I ask the Home Secretary to come back to the centre of the political spectrum in terms of prison reform. If he draws back from the ideological realms of privatisation, the Opposition will extend the hand of co-operation. Let us together look at Woolf and decide not to take an ideological attitude to criminal justice and penal reform, but to adopt a pragmatic approach based on the facts. If the Government do that, the prospects for criminal justice in this country will be much brighter.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): Unlike the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), I welcome this Bill in all its parts. It is a moderate but very dramatic and positive step forward, and I endorse what the Minister said in his moving Third Reading.

For the first time, provision is being made for a community sentence specifically capable of being used to reduce the use of imprisonment as a punishment for those who have alcohol or drug problems. Of all sentences of imprisonment for offences under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, 52 per cent. are for periods of less than 12 months, and 36 per cent. are for periods of less than six months. It is likely that the majority of people serving these short sentences are themselves drug users.

Within prison, although there have been efforts to provide a care system involving the prison medical service and the probation service, prisoners serving very short terms are rarely seen by either service. For the population of drug users, imprisonment is a temporary disruption of their drug use. They are ideal candidates for non-custodial sentences. So are those drug users convicted of non-drug offences, whose offending is linked to their drug use.

I hope that, even at this late stage, my right hon. Friends the Minister of State and the Home Secretary will think again about the suggestions made by my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler) and myself, and will consider whether those minor changes could be incorporated in the final version of the Bill, so that it might do a 100 per cent. job, as opposed to a 99·9 per cent. job, of improving the system in the way in which the Home Secretary and this House want to see it improved.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): I am sure that the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) will forgive me if I do not follow his points, although, like the Minister, I recognise the hon. Gentleman's long interest in this matter.

I am extremely sorry that I was in a meeting preparing for a Standing Committee tomorrow morning and thus unable to be in the Chamber when the House considered the provision allowing children to give evidence on video. As the Minister knows, like the hon. Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims), I have been interested in this matter for some time, and I am pleased that the Government have taken the view that they have, because a need clearly existed. However, it would be inappropriate for me merely to compliment the Government on one aspect of the Bill when other parts of it do not meet with my approval.

Before I entered the House in 1970, I was a school-master—probably an old-fashioned one, because I took the view that young people should behave themselves. I would not dissent if the Government took a similar view. However, if the Minister wants to reduce the level of crime, irresponsibility and disorder among young people, the Bill will not serve that purpose. They should ensure greater hope and more opportunities for young people.

I am delighted by the success of the South Yorkshire police, although I find it preposterous that the Home Office should tell us to employ 18 more police officers next year when the Department of the Environment then pursues policies which will cause us to lose 200. We have managed to secure a high level of detection, despite the fact that the vast majority of young people leaving school in my constituency see no economic opportunity of any real worth. I am amazed that the crime rate is not higher, in my area and in the country as a whole. The position will not improve until the Government pursue other policies, as well as those on criminal justice.

My hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) urged the Government to adopt a more pragmatic position and to reject the dogma of privatisation in the penal system. Like my hon. Friend, I am a practising politician, so I should like the Government to continue on this course because the vast majority of people will regard privatisation of our prison service as preposterous. I wonder how many of them will be talking about a convicts' co-operative. I wonder how many people, next time one of the millionaire fiddlers in the City of London is sent down for fraud, will ask whether he has gone into a private, five-star institution, perhaps financed by the Government under the business expansion scheme and thus offered at a 40 per cent. discount. [Laughter.]

Conservative Members may laugh, but I remember taking part in the first debate on one of the early privatisations—that of Amersham International. Conservative Members said that the assets of the company were in the hands of the people who worked in the company. When I suggested that, if that was so, they should establish a co-operative, they mocked the suggestion—largely because they knew that they would make an enormous profit within 24 hours of the company being privatised. I wonder how many will laugh when they realise that the people now recognise that privatisation has become preposterous. Privatising prisons is a move that the vast majority of people, who retain a grasp of common sense, will regard as ridiculous.

Mrs. Llin Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I am certain that the Minister did not expect me to let this Third Reading opportunity go by without mentioning the evidence of children and the Pigot report.

I am pleased with the progress that we have made on children giving evidence, but we have not yet got it right. I should like to put down a few markers. I cannot understand why, if a written transcript of a sick child's statement made before a magistrate is admissible in evidence under sections 42 and 43 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1969, the Minister could not agree to add the words "and a video tape", especially as he considers that the provision already exists in the Criminal Justice Act 1988. I shall keep asking him that question until I am satisfied with his answer, which is far from the case now.

Children should have a right to a say on the use of screens and video links in our courts. I am not convinced that they will have that protection unless the right is written into the Bill. Our courts do not yet have sufficient understanding of the needs of young children to allow them to have such protection. Cases involving this are frequently brought to me, and I shall describe just one.

Some months ago, a lady telephoned me about her young daughter aged eight, who was giving evidence in Inverness high court. Scotland is supposed to be progressive about the needs of children. She said that, in court, the lawyers and the judge sat in their wigs and gowns and that her child spoke quietly about the disgusting things that the accused man did to her. She was expected to give all the details. There was no microphone. The lawyers shouted at her and the judge told her to speak up. The more they shouted at her, the quieter she spoke. In the end, the case was thrown out because the judge said that, as the court could not hear the evidence, it could not try the case. That is not justice for children. The courts have still to understand that young children must have special consideration because of the strain they are under.

I shall return, as will many of my hon. Friends here and in another place, to the case for a pre-trial hearing. I believe strongly that our court rooms are no places for small children. Until we remove their ordeal of having to appear in court, we will not have the law right. We have some way to go before the Government accept the full impact of the Pigot report. Many of my hon. Friends and I will continue to press for that.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

Construction Industry Training Board

10.48 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Robert Jackson): I beg to move,

That the draft Industrial Training Levy (Construction Board) Order 1991, which was laid before this House on 29th January, be approved.

The proposals before the House seek authority for the construction industry training board to raise a levy on the employers in the building and civil engineering industries, to finance the running costs of the board and to run a grants scheme. The proposals are the first to be submitted by the board since it was reconstituted last year. They are different from those submitted in previous years in that the levy is now based solely on a payroll basis.

The basis of the proposals is a levy of 0·25 per cent. on the payroll of employers in the industry, and a levy of 2 per cent. on all payments made by employers for sub-contract labour. Employers with a payroll of £45,000 or less will be exempt from the levy. The proposals have the support of the employers, as required by the Industrial Training Act 1982, and the full support of the board.

The House will know that the Government thought long and hard about their decision to retain this statutory training board. In principle, we believe that independent employer-led arrangements which have the full support of employers offer the best way forward for industrial training. In general, the track record of compulsion through statutory levies in raising the quality and quantity of training is not a good one.

We have, however, retained the statutory principle in the case of this industry because of strong support from employers. The construction industry has particular characteristics which create peculiar problems for training. The mobile nature of the work of the industry, the mobile nature of its work force, both geographically and between employers, together with the large-scale use of sub-contract and self-employed labour produce a unique set of circumstances in those sectors of the construction industry.

Let me emphasise that we consulted widely with the industry about the CITB. There was a widespread and strongly held view that the CITB should be retained but that its management should be streamlined and reformed. In addition, the employers in the industry argued strongly for the retention of a statutory levy because of the largely self-employed nature of the labour force.

We were therefore persuaded to give the industry a chance to reform its training board, to remodel it as an employer-led body, and to alter the basis of levy collection. The revised basis of the levy proposals before the House today is one indication that reform is happening. I am happy to say that other reforms, such as the internal restructuring of the board's management and improvement in financial control, are also taking place. I expect shortly to see the Board's revised proposals for its grants scheme, and later in the year its strategic plan. All this is an indication that the CITB is proceeding in the right direction.

We intend to keep a close watching brief on the Board. Its powers to raise a levy are exceptional and the Government, like the House, must be convinced that they are absolutely necessary to preserve the basis of training in the contruction industry. Because of the peculiar nature of the industry, the Government have decided to continue with a statutory board for the time being. As we said in the 1989 White Paper, however, we continue to believe that the most effective incentive for companies to train is a knowledge and understanding of the skill needs and not centralised regulation based on statutory powers.

I believe it is right for 1991 that the House should approve the proposals before it. I commend them to the House.

Mr. Henry McLeish (Fife, Central): I praise the work of the CITB, because the construction industry employs nearly 1·8 million people and makes a valuable contribution to the quality of life and a significant contribution to the economy. We do not intend to divide the House on the order, but we have serious misgivings about the nature of some of the proposals included in it.

The order should be seen against the background of a construction industry in crisis. The order may be supported by the House, but it was not overwhelmingly supported by the CITB. The order also continues the systematic dismantling of the two remaining training boards, which are the continuing victims of the purge that was visited upon the training infrastructure in the 1980s.

The order underlines the Government's failure to address the serious issues of sector provision and the need to develop strong, responsible and adequately funded initiatives to tackle some of the economic problems that we shall face in the years up to 2,000.

We are most concerned about how out of step the Government are with what is happening in Europe; how out of line they are with best British practice in training provision, and how out of touch they are with the key contribution that a supply side skills initiative could make to economic well-being and the quality of life of young people and adults in the labour market.

There are a number of charges that we must direct at the Government. Despite the Minister's fine words, the order has not enlisted the full support of the CITB. We have grave reservations about the details in the order, some of which I shall outline later.

Our second charge is that the Government have abandoned any serious commitment to sector-led iniatives. The record of the past decade is ridiculous: of 23 training boards, 16 were removed, followed by another five, and two were grudgingly accepted as part of the statutory framework. I fear that even they will not last much longer, because the Government are keen on the voluntary sector, and that means that nothing practical will be allowed to get in their way.

The third charge relates precisely to the attachment to voluntarism. Ministers say that they do not want bureaucracy or the imposition on employers of a statutory framework. Why then do successful countries have such statutory frameworks, under which their contribution of supply side skills initiatives make a great impact on the economic well-being and industrial performance—and on a key area in which Britain remains weak: output per person employed?

Fourthly, the Government have invested in training and enterprise councils, which we support. But TECs can co-exist in an industrial and training strategy only alongside a strong sector base. Anyone who knows anything about training knows that we must deal with companies' specific difficulties. TECs have a role to play in helping with difficulties in local labour markets, for instance. We must also attack inter-company difficulties through sector-based initiatives.

It is sad that, after 12 years, the Government seem to be moving away from the type of policies that apply in Europe and from the growing consensus surrounding the need for strong sectors.

My fifth charge is that the Government often lecture us to the effect that industry knows best. The CITB has told the Government that it knows best, but in a spectacular example of hypocrisy, the Government have been unwilling to accept the wisdom of the very people whom they have entrusted with the future of training in construction. Our evidence shows that to be true.

The changes in the levy are important. First, the form of calculation is to be changed; and, secondly, the level of exclusion will be altered. The previous levy on employers was levied per capita and different annual rates were set for different trades. That system will be replaced this year by a payroll levy, as the Minister told us. It is true that the move to a payroll levy has won general approval, but many people think that the level at which it has been set is far too low. The Government have forced the CITB to set the levy at the low rate of 0·25 per cent.

The Building Employers Confederation, for instance, which represents the largest group of employers, argues that that percentage is far too low. The BEC wrote to the CITB on 4 September 1990 as follows:

"With regard to the level of 0·25 per cent. . . . the Confederation considers that it may be unwise to set such a low level at this point in time. Furthermore, during the present period of uncertainty with regard to the future funding of training, especially in respect of Training and Enterprise Councils, and Government cutbacks in YT funding, the Board should not allow the industry's long term training to be jeopardised through lack of sufficient financial support raised through levy."

So that section of the industry is not happy with the 0·25 per cent.; the needs of the industry demand a higher levy.

When reconstituting the CITB, the Government made it clear that they wanted to increase the financial exclusion level. That has always been opposed by the CITB and most of the industry. The Minister has insisted, against the board's advice, that the small firms exclusion level should be increased from £15,000 to £45,000. That, of course, will affect both the 2 per cent. on labour-only payments and the 0·25 per cent. payroll levy. Even after the CITB was forced to back down over the exclusion thresholds, several employers' organisations wrote to the CITB in September last year complaining about the decision. They included the Building Employers Confederation and the Electrical Contractors Association.

In its 90th edition, in October 1990, under the headline

"Warning that training will be hit: Levy 'Escape' Limit Goes Up to £45,000",

Construction Board News reported:

"Despite industry's stated view that all firms should contribute to the cost of training, the CITB has had to agree to a government instruction to exclude many more smaller firms from paying the statutory levy.

This, says the CITB, will cut the amount of levy income and reduce its ability to carry out training."

The industry has clearly spoken, through its newspaper. The proposal was supported by neither the industry nor the board; it was imposed over their heads by a Government who were wedded to the notion of voluntarism, rejecting the practical, common-sense views of board members.

The Construction Board News editorial also said:

"In acceptance of another condition imposed by the Government, the CITB has also agreed to switch its levy charging system to one of a percentage of each company's payroll."

The initial imposition of conditions does not suggest any degree of voluntarism between Government and the CITB. It clearly shows that the Government have made up their mind that this is the direction that the board will follow. It is not a case of industry knowing best, but one of Government knowing best and handing out their own perverted ideology by diktat.

When the board was reconstituted, it did not approve of a levy system that was not tied to exemption. Again, the Government had stated the conditions under which the board was to operate. They forced the board to undertake a review of the issue of exemptions, and even laid down criteria for how it was to evaluate the views that it received from employers. The review revealed—interestingly—that 10 of the 11 main employers' organisations supported the retention of statutory levy not tied to exemption. The only employers' organisation that wanted to introduce the exemption system was the Scottish Plant Owners Association: as a Scot, I say that with some regret.

The result of the review was a severe rebuff for the Government's policy of leaving training to the market. On every occasion, the board made its views clear; but it had no chance of changing the Government's mind. It must be remembered that these were handpicked industrialists. There were only two trade union representatives on the board, which was not packed with people who would instinctively oppose the Government's aims. Nevertheless, it felt obliged, through the press and in other ways, to voice its concern about a Government who it felt were working against its interests.

The changes proposed in the order are all linked to the future of the CITB. When it was reconstructed in 1989, the Government made it clear that they were reluctantly giving in to employer pressure: they cannot deny that. What is more, the CITB was given not so much a clean bill of health as a conditional reprieve. It was reconstituted for three years; at the end of that period, its future would be reassessed. Many employers' organisations fear that the Government's real intention is still to get rid of the board.

Let me remind the House of the conditions under which the two remaining statutory boards had to operate. Clearly the Government had been moved by pressure to retain them, but had not been moved by force of argument to accept the wisdom of such a move. A press release issued by the Department of Employment on 4 April 1990 included a reference to a letter in which the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State had set out the priorities to the new board. The first was to "continue to develop and promote as a matter of priority modular based nationally recognised vocational qualifications for all occupations within the industry."

No one could disagree with that objective.

The second was to "operate in a way that ensures its strategies programmes and activities are fully compatible with the development of Training and Enterprise Councils."

Some have argued that it should be the other way round, because in many competitor countries strong sector initiatives are complemented by local delivery, by local market intelligence and by bringing employers together to tackle skills training. The Government want sectors to fall into line with TECs, which were barely developed at that time.

The third condition is important:

"The use of levy funds directly to subsidise training provision and the industry's YTS schemes should be rapidly phased out."

Finally:

"More small firms should be given protection from the burden of levy."

Political ideology permeates Government thought on the future of sector initiatives. Voluntarism or the market model are all-important, and any other consideration, especially a practical one, must play a secondary role.

In a Department of Employment press notice on 9 November, the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Fowler) outlined his views of the future of the CITB and its construction section. He said:

"In two sectors I have accepted the strong arguments of employers that statutory arrangements should continue for the time being. But this does not shake our belief"— not practical training considerations, but "our belief"—

"that a voluntary approach offers a better, long term solution to meeting industry's own training needs."

There is not an iota of practical evidence to back the right hon. Gentleman's "belief". Will the Minister say what evidence the Government have to sustain that view?

"I have told the two ITBs concerned that we shall be carrying out a searching review in about three years time to see if statutory arrangements are still necessary."

The sting in the tail followed:

"At present I am minded to think that they too should move to an entirely voluntary basis."

The simple logic is breathtaking—a belief with no evidence to back it. In effect, the right hon. Gentleman was saying, "We shall have a searching review, but we have made up our mind, so for three years do what you wish under the conditions we impose but after 1993 your time will be up."

There is more practical and compelling evidence of the Government's intention to wind up the CITB. They have encouraged sectors such as heating and ventilation, plumbing and electrical contracting to remove themselves from the scope of the CITB. Under the order, they have increased the exclusion threshold from £10,000 to £45,000 and have refused to allow the payroll levy to be set higher than 0·25 per cent. A Labour Government will undertake not a political but a positive review of sector initiatives and of the non-statutory training organisations.

Those changes have dramatically reduced the CITB's income, in addition to the more general cuts in funding of youth training and employment training. The CITB is being forced to spend more than it receives each year, and its reserves are being eaten away. For the year ending 31 March 1990, its income was £167·6 million, but for 31 March 1991, its expected income has been cut to £125·2 million, with levy income cut from £74·4 million to £59·6 million and income from YT cut from £83·9 million to £52·39 million.

For the year 1989-90, the CITB had a current account deficit of £1·46 million, but for the year ending 31 March 1991, the estimated deficit is £14·465 million. Over the next two years, it expects to receive even less income in levy and Government funding for YT. The CITB has to assume a budget deficit of more than £10 million for each of those years. That amounts to a budget deficit of more than £35 million in just three years. The CITB's total reserves were £74·5 million as at 31 March 1990. It is clear that the Government are forcing the CITB to spend all its reserves as a way of helping the wind-down of that organisation.

On 13 February, in the CITB's news release, the director of training, Douglas Shaw, was reported as saying:

"Forecasts of an annual deficit of between £10 million and £11 million in each of the next three years and a consequent fall in the Board's reserves make it necessary to look closely at both the nature of training and the level of support for each category."

There is a clear implication that income is falling because of levy changes and massive cuts in YT and ET funding. The net consequence is that the board uses its reserves, which will last for a finite time, or it cuts the volume or the quality of training or it cuts both.

Obviously, the Government are putting the CITB in the worst of all worlds—it will not be able to satisfy construction employers, because expenditure is declining, and it is risking its reserves simply to maintain current expenditure levels. I hope that the Minister will comment on the financial difficulties facing the board as the Government's policy unfolds over the next two to three years.

It is crucial that we consider all those aspects against the background of the crisis facing construction training programmes. Before the recession, the biggest problem facing construction was skills shortage. The Reading university centre for strategic studies in construction, in a report called "Building—2001", estimated that the annual skills shortfall in construction could be as high as 50,000. The CITB annual report for 1989-90 shows that the shortage of school leavers was undermining training even further. Numbers on the CITB's two flagship training schemes, the YTS and the electrical contracting industry scheme, were down by more than 2,000 on the previous year. A total of 22,453 people started on those schemes in 1989-90 whereas a year earlier the figure was 24,621.

News comment last year also painted a bleak picture of what was in store for new entrants to the construction industry and YTS. An article in The Independent of 8 June 1990 stated:

"The biggest youth training scheme in the country, involving 37,000 construction trainees, is under 'fundamental review', which could lead to severe cuts or even closure."

That was dramatic news at that time, but it is now clear that the number of apprenticeships has slumped. The number of new entrants next year will drop by about 7,000 compared with the number this year. Obviously, all these financial and political pressures are having a direct result on the volume and quality of training.

If this is the skills revolution about which the Government constantly talk, we should like to know how the Government can spend less, force the boards to spend less and affect quality and volume. The CITB is forced to work on the assumption that it will train even fewer entrants in the next two years. In 1991-92, the CITB is estimated to be training only 17,000 new entrants. Further evidence of training cuts comes from figures published by the National Joint Council for the Building Industries, which oversees the building industry's 8,400-strong apprenticeship scheme. That organisation says that the number of apprentice registrations is dropping drastically compared with previous years.

It would be bad enough if the industry was facing only a skills crisis. The Building Employers Confederation's most recent quarterly state of the trade survey, published in February 1991, shows that training is likely to suffer badly in coming months, but it also shows that 53 per cent. of building firms experienced a cut in output, in the last quarter of 1990. Sixty-seven per cent. of the top 20 national contractors reported a cut in output, and 50 per cent. of firms reported a cut in inquiries for new work. The BEC has also estimated that 100,000 jobs in the building industry could be lost by the end of this year.

When the Minister opened this debate, he did not refer to the crisis facing the industry or to the fact that quality and volume training were being cut. Skills shortages stand at 50,000 a year, and the industry also faces the massive impact of the recession. Obviously we are far from having a world-class work force in the construction industry, but the industry has a great desire to work towards that objective.

This shabby tale of the Government's commitment to training in the 1990s raises several issues. The first relates to small employers. The Government are obsessed with the idea that small employers should be cut off from the reality of industrial life and from a fair contribution to training. Figures from the 1988 labour force survey and unpublished data from the Department of Employment computer show the problems facing small employers. Expenditure on training per employee in a company comprising 10 to 49 employees was 98p per hour. For a company employing between 500 to 999, the figure was £3·07. Expenditure per employee as annual costs for training for the firm employing between 10 and 49 employees was £19. However, for the firm with between 500 and 999 employees, the cost was £61.

Small employers need assistance, but the Government's logic is to exclude them. However, that places stresses and strains on the funding for the board's activities in training in general. The Government also do nothing practical to allow small employers to participate effectively in the skills training that a small company needs as much as a large company.

The Government's figures suggest that, instead of pursuing the political holy grail of voluntarism and exclusion, they should be taking a more positive look at the problems facing small employers in construction and elsewhere and then providing some practical solutions. It is evident that small employers face difficulties, but the Government, for political reasons, turn a blind eye to them.

This shabby tale also raises questions about training and enterprise councils in relation to sectors. The engineering industry training board which claims a lead in the industry, was very critical of TECs in an article in the Financial Times on 24 January. It was critical because it thought that the TECs were in danger of creating alternative and inconsistent standards in relation to national vocational qualifications.

However, a much more telling criticism of the Government's approach to sectors vis-a-vis TECs appeared in the March 1989 quarterly published by Incomes Data Services Ltd., which read:

"This is the argument coming strongly from several industries at the moment, notably the Chemical Industry Association which established one of the more successful non-statutory training organisations in the aftermath of the abolition of most of the Industry Training Boards in 1982. Local emphasis, the CIA told a recent CBI conference on training, 'must not be allowed to override, dilute or prevent sectoral and national standards, must not step outside agreed sectoral and national policies and must not allow the loudest voice to fill the biggest local fist with most of the new local resources . . . TECs will only meet their local needs inside a coherent national framework . . . We see each TEC acting as an additional resource, as additional pressure point upon training and educational priorities, but not as a replacement for a sector's own local network'."

That is industry telling the Government that their skewed priorities, which mean investment in TECs to the exclusion of sectors, are not something that British industry can support.

The Government must acknowledge that the Chemical Industries Association is responsible, powerful, efficient and forward-looking in dealing with the needs of its industry and, in particular, skills. If that is so, and we should let industry, which knows best, carry out that role, why do the Government never listen to industry? The answer is that they have closed minds and political prejudices. Time is running out for the Government to tackle the skills crisis before a Labour Government return to do so more seriously—[Laughter.]

The third issue that I wish to raise amid the laughter and merriment from the sleepy Ministers is that of the non-statutory training organisations. When the Government were dismantling the statutory training boards in the 1980s, they also set up industry training organisations—the voluntarist arm of the sectoral skills initiative. But interestingly, on 26 February 1988, a study was undertaken, and a press notice issued by the Department stated:

"The research paper is the result of the first comprehensive review of the country's 102 Non-Statutory Training Organisations, which represent firms employing about five million people."

It said that more than half—56—could be described as effective. It does not need a brilliant mathematician to work out that that must mean that nearly half were, by definition, ineffective. The caveat was thrown in that some organisations were being reorganised and so could not contribute to the survey.

If that is successful voluntarism, will the Minister say why the new experiment has, in many cases, been such a magnificent failure—so much so that, on 24 January 1991, a mere three years later, a major research project to examine the effectiveness of the national network of sector-based industry training organisations was announced by the then employment Minister?

The Government stumbled into one change which, for political reasons, could never work. Therefore, three years later, after a report had told them that half the organisations were ineffective, a major review is undertaken. I hope that the Minister will consider the need not only to review the NSTOs, but to review positively the work of the construction industry training board so that it can be assured of a future beyond 1993. The lack of certainty in its work is causing immense problems.

The fourth and most important issue that the Government have failed to address is that of economic performance and productivity. Every study that compares Britain with Europe comes up with two broad conclusions. First, our European competitors have sector initiatives that are strong and employer-led, but that also have Government support. There is a relationship between all the partners, including the trade unions and the providers.

Secondly, it is clear that every other country in Europe has a better and more consistent record of improved productivity than we do. The Government may respond and say that, in the early 1980s there was a massive shake-out of labour, restrictive practices were removed and there was an increase in productivity. But where is that productivity miracle now? It cannot be delivered through training and enterprise councils or through a company's specific training. Until we establish a better base for foundation skills for 16 to 19-year-olds, it cannot be achieved through that mechanism. It can be done through supply side initiatives in sectors. Whether in engineering or construction, it is clear that productivity is linked to supply side initiatives.

The Government are throwing away an excellent opportunity to tackle the long-term productivity problems, increase output per person and reduce unit costs. That is the key to this country's success in the 1990s. Through sectors, skills and leadership, we have the opportunity to make better productivity improvements than we have at present. On small employers, TECs, NSTOs and economic performance the Government are guilty of ignoring reality, best practice in Europe, and the growing consensus in British industry about the way forward.

I urge the Minister to extend the remit of NSTOs and to consider a secure future for the Construction Industry Training Board and the construction section of the engineering iindustry training board. The Government should take on board the idea that sectors should have a status similar to that of TECs. Both are urgently needed and both are part of our industrial and training strategy for the 1990s, but they are complementary. One cannot survive without the other. Obviously, the enhanced status for sectors will mean that they will become an important part of the debate rather than, as at present, being regarded by the Government as a Cinderella.

Thirdly, in public policy terms, we must get away from the simplistic "politics first, voluntarism" first attitude to statutory provision. If industry says that we need change, will the Government listen? If there is a consensus on a way forward, will the Government listen? Surely we do not need an over-prescriptive Government allowing a statutory board to continue and then setting limits and parameters within which it can operate. Is there not a balance or flexibility so that we can allow industry to work with Government to achieve the best for its sector, in the interests of its sector, and not be tied by the over-prescription that we constantly see?

Fourthly, will the Government reconsider the fact that they have marginalised the employee part of the partnership? Where in this country can we find the ideal that other European countries have? We do not have it. Obviously, unless we can bring in employee representatives in a more positive way, we shall make little progress.

I do not expect for a minute that the Government will take on board any suggestions that we make, but it is clear that, if the Government will not attend to the skill needs of the nation, we certainly shall. In the remaining few months until there is a Labour Government, it is incumbent on the Minister to take seriously the issues that the Opposition raise.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): I shall speak for only a couple of minutes, and I shall do so on the basis of having worked directly in the construction industry since 1967 and having been a director of a member firm of the Building Employers Confederation, for which I also worked directly for six years. Therefore, I declare an interest as a director of a large construction company which pays levy and receives grant as a result of training.

The strictures of the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. McLeish) were grossly exaggerated. It is ridiculous to suggest that the Government were not listening. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State has made it absolutely clear that the Government were minded to abolish the construction industry training board a couple of years ago and that they listened not only to the industry but to a considerable number of the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends. In particular, they listened to my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham). The training headquarters of the construction industry training board is based in Bircham Newton, which is in my hon. Friend's constituency. My hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North-West has done an outstanding job in defending the interests of his constituents and raising these matters with Ministers. I pay tribute to him.

Having worked in the industry for many years, and still working in it, I know that the board is absolutely essential to the industry. Despite the continual use of the expression "the construction industry" by the hon. Gentleman and many other people, there is no such thing as the construction industry, except as an overall expression. There are a large number of different industries and different trades within it. Some of them do absolutely no training. The private house building sector, for example, has hardly any apprentices. The vast majority of the work that takes place on house building sites is sub-contracted to labour-only gangs and self-employed men. It is an extremely efficient system but not one which produces many apprentices. That is well known. The hon. Gentleman gave figures showing the declining number of apprentices. I remember giving exactly the same figures 20 years ago in discussions with Ministers at the time. The number of apprentices rises and falls according to the state of the industry; at present, the industry is in recession and is therefore taking on fewer apprentices. That is extremely regrettable.

However, in practice, if there were no construction industry training board and if there were no statutory levy —in particular, if there were no levy for labour-only sub-contractors, which is rightly set at the higher figure of 2 per cent. in the order—there would be virtually no training in the industry. People would continually be poaching each other's men; men would simply move from one site to another hunting the higher bonuses that are on offer, particularly when the industry is in good shape, which at present it is not. It is essential, therefore, to maintain the levy.

I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's strictures about the exclusion of the smallest firms. I agree with the Government that it is right, although I know that that view is not popular with many of the trade associations. As I said, I worked for one for six years. Quite apart from the administrative nightmare of trying to collect any levy from firms that employ one or two men—or possibly no one at all—such a system would take us back to exactly the problems that we faced in 1969.

I do not know whether the institutional memory of the hon. Member for Fife, Central goes back as far as that, but mine does. I worked in the industry then—directly, at the Building Employers Confederation—and I was concerned with those problems. The board nearly collapsed then. It was Robert Carr and the incoming Conservative Government who saved the board and put it on a firm basis, just as the present Government and the present Minister decided to continue with it.

The basis for the salvation of the board by Robert Carr, then Secretary of State in 1970-71 was that it was agreed that it was ridiculous to continue to allow the very large companies—I am a director of one—to make a profit out of the board and the levy because they were training so many people in management and getting all the levy back and more, while small companies employing two or three people could send to be trained once a man whom they could ill spare off site and would then have to go on paying the levy indefinitely, year after year. My hon. Friend the Minister is quite right to exclude such firms from the levy, and I support him in that regard.

Let me stress to my hon. Friend, however, that construction is not like other industries. It has a mobile work force. It does not have fixed places of employment. Men move from site to site, and sites close, often after quite a short period. If we are to retain any training in the industry at all, we must have a board and we must have a levy. We now have an excellent board with a fine chairman in Cliff Chetwood and a new chief executive in General Wilmott. I wish it every success and I look to my hon. Friend to ensure that it has a good solid future.

Mr. Jackson: I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) for recognising that the Government have been flexible and have listened to the industry's arguments and taken into account the special circumstances pertaining in different sectors of the industry—hence the proposals that we are debating today. I agree with my hon. Friend that it is ironic that the Opposition should have chosen this of all occasions to denounce the Government for having ideological hang-ups about voluntarism. Perhaps the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. McLeish) did not think deeply enough about the circumstances when he chose this occasion to launch his attack.

I welcome the hon. Gentleman's support for the CITB and for its work. I agree with him about it. I also welcome his endorsement of the new training and enterprise councils, although I rather regret the hon. Gentleman's tendency to attempt to set up an opposition between a TEC approach and a sectoral approach. As he said at one point in his speech, they have to be complementary. Arguments based on the premise that they are somehow rival approaches, which formed an element of the hon. Gentleman's speech, are ill founded. The TECs and the industrial training boards—the sectoral bodies—have complementary roles, and we must recognise that.

The hon. Member for Fife, Central rather ironically chose to make a strong pitch in favour of a compulsory levy approach to training. This is not the occasion on which to debate the Labour party's evolving policy on training, although I assure the hon. Gentleman that we take his ideas seriously. We had an opportunity for an extensive debate about these matters only a few weeks ago. The Opposition signally failed to give the House the chance to consider their latest thinking. Opposition Members said nothing about their ideas about compulsory levies—it was Conservative Members who took those matters up.

The hon. Gentleman spoke of the Government's "perverted ideology" in favour of voluntary approaches. The argument about compulsory levies and their value is essentially a practical one based on what works best. The hon. Member for Fife, Central made great play of the experience of other European countries, but there is only one major one that operates the sort of compulsory levy system of which the hon. Gentleman was talking. The French have had considerable success in their training experience, but the majority of those who have examined the system reckon that their levy system has been irrelevant to it.

It is not as though we in Britain are without any practical experience of operating a levy system. We had one, under Governments of both parties, from 1964 through to the early 1980s. If the hon. Member for Fife, Central is right when he says that we do not have a world-class work force in the construction industry, the roots of that must go back to the 15 years when we had the sort of levy system that he considers to be a panacea which will solve all problems.

The Government's philosophy on training, as I explained when I replied to a recent debate on the subject, is to work with employers to improve the quality and quantity of training. That is the way in which we shall achieve the productivity improvements to which the hon. Gentleman rightly attaches importance. Most employers feel strongly that a voluntary partnership will work best. Where there is support for a statutory approach, as there is in this instance, we shall accommodate it. The hon. Member for Fife, Central should recognise the irony of the Opposition rebuking the Government for our attachment to voluntarism during a debate on a statutory levy.

Mr. McLeish: The Minister cannot have it all ways. The attack on the Government's form of voluntarism was based on their hypocrisy. The CITB was given a conditional reprieve. The Government were in the curious position of wanting to step back from interfering with industry while saying to the board, "Yes, you can operate on your own, but you must have more exemptions for small businesses and a low payroll levy. You must not use funds from the levy to invest in youth training." That is a curious form of voluntarism. We have argued that over-prescription will stem from the voluntarism that the Minister is preaching.

Mr. Jackson: The other great theme of the hon. Gentleman's speech was small firms, and I shall take it up. Before doing so, I express the view that he has not recognised the extent to which there has been consultation with the industry about the operation of the CITB. The decision to retain the principle of a statutory levy arose from consultation with the industry, as did the various reforms which have taken place within the board. The hon. Gentleman must not assume that every arrangement is perfect. It is necessary to keep arrangements under review, and that is what we did. The consequences of that are the changes to and reforms within the CITB to which he referred.

The hon. Member for Fife, Central talked about the levy and the level of the CITB's income. Secondly, he referred to the small firms exclusion threshold. The levy of 0·25 per cent. was a matter for the board, and it was the board that proposed it. The income from it will be the same as that which would have been derived from a per capita levy. The hon. Gentleman spoke of the Opposition's plan for a further review, should they form a Government. I take from that the implication that the hon. Gentleman would intend to increase the levy. I can imagine the kind of welcome that that would receive from the building industry, which I hope will take note of what the hon. Gentleman has said—indeed, I am sure that some of my hon. Friends will draw its attention to the hon. Gentleman's remarks.

Mr. McLeish rose——

Mr. Jackson: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman wishes to make a correction.

Mr. McLeish: There is no need for correction. The Minister has raised issues which were not discussed. No one suggested the imposition of a bigger levy. The important feature was that a Labour Government would conduct a positive review—not a political review. There is a significant difference between that, as a statement, and the logical development—as in the mind of the Minister—to the position that the Government have reached.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): A positive review results in a tax increase.

Mr. Jackson: As my hon. Friend says, a positive review results in a tax increase.

The hon. Gentleman cannot attack the Government for having fixed the levy at too low a rate and then attempt to deny the perfectly logical implication that it is his intention to increase the levy.

The hon. Gentleman made great play of the reduction in levy income. That was the other aspect of his argument, but he now seeks to imply that he does not believe that that income should be made up by increasing the levy, having made the point that levy income has been reduced. In fact, the reduction in the income is due to the reduction in the size of the coverage of the board due, for example, to the removal of various sectors. My hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton recognised that the industry has many different sectors and aspects to it. That has been reflected in the changes in the scope and coverage of the CITB that we have developed. The board's total coverage has been reduced by 25 per cent., and that is what the reduction in income reflects.

It is ironic that the hon. Gentleman recognised the strength of the CITB's reserve position but did not seem to draw any conclusions from that about what would be an appropriate levy.

Mr. McLeish: The implication was that if the CITB continues to use up its reserves as it is doing at the moment, within a few years those reserves will have disappeared. The first question to ask the Minister is whether that makes sense for a board which has substantial assets and wishes to retain them. Secondly, if there are cuts in youth training funding and in the income generated by the levy, will that not result in both the volume and quality of training being drastically cut in the next two or three years?

Mr. Jackson: The hon. Gentleman has a lot of explaining to do to the building industry. He wants to increase the levy—that is a reasonable implication of his remarks about its being too low—but he now says that the reserves should not be spent. It would be difficult to say to the building industry, especially in the present economic downturn, that a board with substantial reserves should maintain them—and possibly even increase them—while raising the levy that it imposes upon the companies in the sector. That is an unreasonable suggestion to make to the building industry at the present juncture, and the hon. Gentleman should reflect on that.

The hon. Gentleman's other main point related to the exemption of small firms. It was interesting that although the hon. Gentleman affected to be a friend of the small firms—"Give them a chance to contribute to the levy" seemed to be the tone of his argument—he wants to increase the burden on them. That is the logical implication of the proposition that the level for the exclusion of small firms has been set too high.

When we consider the small firms' exclusion from something like a statutory levy, we must ask whether the game is worth the candle. That was precisely the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton. The construction industry contains an impressive number of small firms. The most recent census of production shows 160,000 such firms, many of which are very small, as my hon. Friend knows the industry so well can testify. Indeed, 14,801 firms have payrolls of £15,000 or less, and 23,022 have payrolls of £45,000 or less according to the most recent census of production.

If the scope of the levy is extended as the hon. Gentleman would like, many thousands of small firms will be brought into the requirements. Policing them will be extremely complex, difficult and burdensome, and what would be achieved as a result? Although there are many small firms in the industry, the vast majority of its employees work for the larger companies. In fact, 10 per cent. of the firms employ 76 per cent. of the employees —and pay 73 per cent. of the levy. Those circumstances are reflected in the fact that the loss of income to the CITB from raising the small firms exclusion level from £15,000 to £45,000 is only £1·8 million.

The hon. Gentleman talked about stresses and strains on the budget as a result of the change in the exclusion level, but £1·8 million out of an annual total levy income of nearly £60 million does not strike me as being a major stress or strain. The House is obliged to set against that £1·8 million the savings in hassle and bureaucracy affecting many thousands of small firms which we shall achieve by raising the small firms exclusion level. The hon. Gentleman should reflect on that point.

This is a very interesting illustration of the dangers of the statutory approach that the hon. Gentleman favours. The danger implicit in any statutory approach is the extension of law-making, rule-making and bureaucracy. There is inevitably a tendency to focus on the statutory arrangements for their own sake, rather than to keep one's eye on the ball in terms of more and better training. The way to keep one's eye on the ball in that respect is to win the co-operation of employers rather than to proceed as the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Industrial Training Levy (Construction Board) Order 1991, which was laid before this House on 29th January, be approved.

Mr. Peter Newman

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Chapman.]

11.45 pm

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): I want to bring to the attention of the House the sad case of my constituent Mr. Peter Newman, and to the hopelessness of that gentleman's situation. I do so with a view to drawing attention to what I think is a gap in the provision for people suffering from the mental illness of which Peter Newman is a victim. Let me begin by referring to some points in Peter Newman's recent history. Because of the shortage of time, I shall leave out quite a lot of detail.

I am glad to see the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State in his place. I have received from him many sensitive, generous and kind letters about this difficult case. I know very well that he will treat it with great seriousness and will try to find an answer. I am glad to see my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) also in his place. My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) wished to be mentioned in the context of this case, as it involves a person who, in layman's language, is suffering from schizophrenia. Mr. Peter Newman has never been positively diagnosed as schizophrenic, although a social worker once admitted to his mother, quietly and without commitment, that he had been diagnosed as paranoid with psychotic phases.

One of the key points that I want to draw to the attention of the House is that psychiatrists cannot truly identify, and will not designate, Peter Newman as suffering from any real or recognisable mental illness that could be treated under the Mental Health Acts of 1959 and 1983. In my view, that is one of the gaps in the provision.

Peter Newman has made two attempts to commit suicide. One of these occurred in July 1986, when he was a patient at Long Grove long-stay hospital. The fact that he had been sectioned to be there shows that he suffers from a very serious mental illness. He threw himself from a top-floor window and suffered very serious brain damage. His mother and family took a great deal of time to bring him round and restore him to some kind of normal health. In 1987, he was transferred to a hospital nearer his home—the Princess Alexandra—but he escaped and threw himself from the multi-storey car park, inflicting very serious physical damage on himself. Peter Newman is clearly very determined to commit suicide, and is thus a serious danger to himself.

It is not that many of the authorities have not made some provision for Peter. It is not that they have not been very worried indeed about him and have not tried to diagnose the problem and treat it in some way. Indeed, he spent a year, at the expense of the North East Thames regional health authority, in an extremely costly and excellent hospital—St. Andrews in Northampton. The authorities have done a great deal to try to treat him. Peter Newman released himself from St. Andrews and had to be brought back, after which he finally released himself into society. That was only to pick a fight with his brother when he returned to Hertford, and the Hertford magistrates committed him to Pentonville prison, just before Christmas 1990. All of us concerned with the case were relieved that he was there, because at least he was safe there. The prison authorities put him straight into the hospital wing, where he remained for the whole of his three months' confinement.

On his release, in January this year, there was no place for him to go. Therefore, I made arrangements with my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young), the Minister for Housing and Planning, for him to be given addresses of hostels in London. The prison had given him a list of hostels dated 1988, so it was well out of date. He found hostel accommodation. A few weeks later, he broke into Buckingham palace and was arrested by the police. They did not charge him, because they recognised that he was suffering from a mental illness, but instead they took him back to the hostel.

He was then found riding on the outside of trains in the Southern region, arrested again and taken back to the hostel. He was last seen walking among fast-moving traffic in Edmonton, arrested, not charged, and taken by the police to where he is now, Hackney hospital. Two doctors sectioned him under section 2 of the Mental Health Act 1983, to be detained for a 28-day assessment order. He cannot release himself from that hospital.

I fear that, when he is released, Peter Newman will be released into a world in which there is no provision for him, and he cannot be treated or taken care of. During the time that he was in Northampton, all of us concerned in the case were worried about what would happen to him when he came out. I wrote to the district health authority and to the social services department of the Hertfordshire county council. It is worth reading their replies to me, because they are supposed to take care of him.

The chairman of the health authority said:

"The latest information I have had is that Peter Newman is due to be released at the end of next week and I have to confirm that following the Forensic Psychiatrist's report, Peter Newman will not be the responsibility of the Health Service.

I understand that he would therefore be the responsibility of the Social Services who, as you know, had provided a place for him in one of their homes but he walked out from it. They have no authority to force him to stay. I am sure that Mr. Laming"—

the director of social services in Hertfordshire county council—

"has replied to you in a similar manner and that due to his history, the Local Council representatives will be visiting him prior to his discharge concerning his housing. This action is in line with the recommendations made in the Case Conference held on 15 November 1990."

The social services director, Mr. Herbert Laming, said:

"By all means, take up the case of Peter Newman, since it illustrates extremely well the difficulties which are being faced by Social Services Departments when they are being asked to provide services for people who either refuse to accept what is offered to them, or behave in ways that ensure failure of the placement, or need services which can only be provided by other agencies.

In Peter Newman's case, we have had the experience in the past that we have found residential homes which were prepared to offer him a place, only for him to refuse to accept. We have tried to accommodate him in the residential homes run by the County Council for people with mental health problems, but his behaviour could not be contained in this setting. More recently, his propensity for violent behaviour resulted in the prison sentence he is currently serving.

Of the residential resources approached on Peter's behalf by our staff, only two expressed a willingness to consider him. One is Knoesworth House, which is a private hospital, and if they were to admit him, his place would have to be paid for by the local Health Authority (as they have done on a previous occasion when Peter was admitted to St. Andrews, a similar hospital). The second offer to consider Peter came from a residential home in Devon, whose charges are in the region of £20,000 to £40,000 per annum . . . The sponsorship budget available to the Department is fully committed and I regret that we are therefore unable to provide funding for such a placement."

Therefore, neither the health nor the social services authorities in Hertfordshire provide a place for Peter to go. I sought a place for him from those responsible for the homeless, but found that there was no local authority provision for people in his position, so there was no question of his being offered such accommodation.

That means that Peter is left to wander aimlessly and hopelessly in London without treatment. Authorities cannot detain him to provide him with the 24-hour care that he needs or prevent him from releasing himself. He needs to be restrained and to have his liberty curtailed, yet there is no way to do so under the current Mental Health Acts.

Care can be provided by the health and social services and by homelessness offices as well as by the police and the prison service. Indeed, many mentally ill people, like Peter, are accustomed to being accommodated in their hospitals, which are the only places where they can be put. Great responsibility lies with the psychiatric services and the mental health commissioners.

At the suggestion of my hon. Friend the Minister, I went to see the mental health commissioner, Professor Evelyn Murphy. At present, it is the fashion to try not to keep anyone in detention if one can possibly avoid it. Although that is laudable and I understand it, it has resulted in a grey area. People are not positively identified as suffering from a mental illness under the definition of the Act, yet by any normal person's judgment, and certainly in the judgment of their family, they are clearly not acting in their own interests. They are vulnerable and a danger to themselves as well as to their community and family.

Mrs. Newman has concluded that her son is lost. He will either kill himself or somebody else. Only in the latter case will his problem be solved by a long-term prison sentence, which he will probably serve in the mental hospital wing of a prison. That is unacceptable, and we cannot allow this to continue.

I call on my hon. Friend the Minister to set up urgently a committee of experts to make recommendations on how people in Peter's condition can be detained, treated and given long-term security under restraint. If necessary, the committee should make recommendations to alter the Mental Health Acts 1959 and 1983 to permit that to happen.

Secondly, I ask my hon. Friend to provide suitable accommodation as a halfway house. Perhaps such people could be identified not as mentally ill under the 1983 Act, but as sufficiently mentally ill that they cannot look after themselves and need to be looked after. I also call on my hon. Friend to meet with me psychiatric consultants and to ask them to examine the position and to make recommendations for alternatives to current practice and definitions of mental illness, so that people in Peter's position can be treated and detained, as I am sure the whole community would wish them to be.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) for allowing me the opportunity to contribute to this important, albeit short, debate. I do so for a number of reasons—not least Mrs. Newman, my hon. Friend's constituent, who wrote to me about her son's case. I am particularly interested because of my membership of the Select Committee on Health.

I fully endorse what my hon. Friend has said. He has represented his constituent and his family positively and sensitively in a difficult area. He has highlighted one of the grave gaps in our policy on community care, with particular reference to the mentally ill—the category into which Peter Newman falls. Those people are dealt with inadequately under the current legislation, and the available accommodation is inadequate to deal with a case such as that of Peter Newman. He has spent a limited time in prison, but that is not the place for someone suffering from a mental illness.

My hon. Friend has asked for certain assurances and commitments from the Government. Those requests are in line with the views of the Select Committee on Social Services, which produced a report on mental illness and community care in the previous Session of Parliament. When my hon. Friend the Minister replies, I hope that he can tell me when his Department intend to reply to that report, which has an important bearing on the serious case that my hon. Friend has raised.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): As my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) said, the case raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) illustrates the difficulties in the law and practice in the treatment of, and facilities for, mentally ill people. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford on raising this matter.

My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield asked when the Government expect to respond to the Select Committee on Social Services report on arrangements for provision for the mentally ill. That response will be given shortly—it is reasonably imminent.

My hon. Friends will appreciate that I have some difficulty in responding to the specifics of the case raised tonight. My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford has argued about the specific nature of the provisions and services available to his constituent. He will understand that those issues relate to an individual case and are bound by the normal duty of confidentiality which govern the relationship between a national health service patient and his clinical advisers.

My hon. Friend disagreed with the clinical assessment of Peter Newman, but I cannot enter into an argument about that. I am not a clinician and therefore I am unable to argue about whether the psychiatrist's clinical assessment was right or wrong. Even if I were able to decide on that assessment, it would be a confidential matter between the psychiatrist and the patient and not one that should be properly traded across the Floor of the House. I do not believe that it would be right for me to get involved in the specifics of the Peter Newman case. I can, however, talk about the arrangements which are made to treat that type of patient in general, and the Government's approach to that.

My hon. Friend said that Peter Newman "needs his liberty curtailed". That goes to the heart of the matter. The House must recognise—I know that my hon. Friend does—that to deny any citizen his liberty is a grade A civil rights issue. The subject does not lend itself to administrative finesse. Parliament has rightly insisted that it should be laid down in detail in statute law. If the suspicion grew that a clinician was playing fast and loose with the statutory definition of the circumstances in which liberty can be denied, he would be hauled up not merely for his clinical judgment but also on legal grounds. It is for Parliament alone to describe the circumstances in which any citizen of this country can be compulsorily denied his liberty or be subjected to compulsory clinical investigation.

The mere fact of mental illness does not remove from the citizen in all circumstances the right and ability to take decisions about his own life. Mental illness removes that right in some instances, but those circumstances are defined in the Mental Health Act 1983. If my hon. Friend wishes to argue that the statutory definition of the circumstances in which freedom can be removed needs to be extended or redefined, it is incumbent on him to propose draft amendments to the Mental Health Act to that end. Such amendments would prescribe the circumstances in which he thinks that liberty should be curtailed and which are not covered by the definitions to be found, most importantly, in section 3 of the Mental Health Act.

I put the ball back in the court of my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford not merely as a debating point but because the issue has been regularly raised by those concerned about and interested in the subject. The Government have said that they are always open to proposals on how the law can be amended or refined, but we have not yet received detailed proposals showing precisely how the law is inadequate and how the grade A civil rights issue can be advanced.

It is not enough to take a particular case. There is an old saying that hard cases make bad law, so we need to define the circumstances——

Mr. Wells: It was precisely because the definitions in the Mental Health Act needed redefining that I asked my hon. Friend the Minister to help me and everyone concerned by establishing a committee of experts or a group to determine how we can alter the law to meet the gap in provision and in definition. Of course the liberty of the individual must be preserved, but not to the point of making vulnerable people walk the streets of London, without treatment, help or housing.

I need my hon. Friend's help. I do not have a research assistant to do the work. Neither I nor any hon. Member has the resources to do it. We need experts, and I am certainly no expert.

Mr. Dorrell: Indeed, but the difficulty with establishing a committee is that its terms of reference need to be clearly defined. Our minds are not closed on the subject, but the onus is on those who argue that the law is inadequate to describe the circumstances which they believe should be covered by the law——

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Will the Minister accept that my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford also requested that, pending any such committee being set up, he might seek to find appropriate accommodation for

Peter Newman? It will need to be accommodation with 24-hour care, treatment and supervision, because the man is mentally ill and requires such care, treatment and supervision. As my hon. Friend said, at present there is no suitable accommodation, there are no resources and there are no facilities to provide the necessary care for this vulnerable person.

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend has neatly pre-empted my next remark.

I have dealt with the definition of circumstances in which we deny someone his liberty under the Mental Health Act. If an individual does not come within the terms of the Act as written—or even as amended, as a result of my hon. Friend's initiative—we must conclude that he has precisely the same right to refuse treatment for mental or any other illness as any of my hon. Friends, or any other citizen. We all have that important right to discharge ourselves from an NHS hospital, although it may not be in our best clinical interests. I would not wish to finesse or blur Mr. Newman's right to discharge himself from facilities that may indeed be in his best clinical interest, if he is not covered by the Act.

That, of course, increases the onus on us to ensure that provision is adequate, and that mentally ill people who are not subject to the section power accept that the available treatment meets their needs. It is to that aim that the major enhancement of the mental illness programme on which we have embarked is directed. The date of 1 April 1991 marks not only the general implementation of the NHS reforms, but the beginning of the implementation of a major programme of enhancement of mental health facilities within the NHS, initiated by my predecessor, my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman).

On 1 April, five points in our mental illness programme begin to take effect. First, each health authority has been charged with the introduction of the care-programme approach to treatment provision for the mentally ill. For those who are under the care of a health authority, the authority is required to ensure an individually tailored care programme for each patient, which must name a key person who is responsible for ensuring that the health and social facilities described in the programme are made available to the individual who benefits. That is a major enhancement of the management of mental illness services.

Secondly, from 1 April we shall implement the mental illness specific grant, which will provide for total additional expenditure by social service departments of £30 million in the first year. Thirdly, we have announced the approval of capital allocations through the local government finance system, so that local authority social services departments not only have the specific grant to support their revenue expenditure, but have access to capital funds to ensure that the facilities are there on which the expenditure can be made.

Fourthly, we are continuing with the capital loans fund, which is designed to ensure that inappropriate, old-fashioned mental illness facilities are taken out of commission more quickly, and that the capital released thereby is used to provide more appropriate, effective care facilities within the community. Fifthly—perhaps as important as any other proposal, in the context of cases such as Peter Newman's—the next financial year will see physical expression of our programme for the homeless mentally ill in London, to ensure that, for those who slip through one net—and, to be honest, if we are providing for the majority of mentally ill people in the community, some will slip through—there is also a safety net to give them a staircase back into mainstream provision.

That programme adds up to £155 million of new money for mental illness services over the next three years. I do not think that anyone can doubt the Government's commitment to enhancing provision, precisely to meet the test that I described: that those who are not detained compulsorily under the Mental Health Act must have access to a range of provision that will cause them not to wish to discharge themselves voluntarily from provision that the law does not allow us to provide compulsorily.

I hope that my hon. Friends accept that we have clearly defined the circumstances in which provision should be compulsory. Those are very tightly drawn, properly in my view. If someone is not covered by such provision, it is incumbent on us to ensure that there is adequate voluntary provision, and to address that priority as well.

Oral Answers to Questions

EMPLOYMENT

Employment Training

1. Mr. Jack Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures he will introduce to improve employment training.

12. Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures he is taking to increase the level of employment training; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Michael Howard): I announced in November additional flexibilities to enable training and enterprise councils to increase the effectiveness of employment training. I am announcing today that an extra £120 million will be made available to training and enterprise councils in England and Wales and to Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise in Scotland to ensure that employment training can continue to play its full part in helping unemployed people back to work.

Mr. Thompson: That announcement does not compensate for the fact that since 1988 £1 billion has been taken out of the training bill. Is it not a national disgrace that quality training, which is one of the cornerstones of the improvements that we might expect to see in the British economy, has been greatly damaged by the fact that so much funding for training has been removed? Is the Secretary of State aware that we are going through a catastrophic time for training and that after the present crisis the British economy will be seriously damaged due to the lack of investment in training not just in the past year or two but for the past 10 years?

Mr. Howard: One thing is absolutely clear about these additional resources. In the debate on the autumn statement, the shadow Chancellor reaffirmed that training would not be one of the two immediate priorities for a Labour Government—so what we are devoting to employment training is at least £120 million more than the Labour party would make available.

Mr. Cryer: Can the Secretary of State explain how the sale of 51 skillcentres, accompanied by a gift from the Government of £70 million, has improved the availability of training in this country when the activity of the three insider dealers who bought most of the skillcentres has been concerned principally with sacking instructors, selling off freehold sites and selling the valuable machinery and equipment used by the skillcentres to train people? When will the right hon. and learned Gentleman explain what value this audacious taxpayers rip-off is to the people who want employment training?

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman persists in making entirely unfounded allegations about the sale of skillcentres. The skillcentres were making a substantial loss. It is clear that they can now provide training much more effectively in the private sector, and that is exactly what they are doing.

Mr. Nicholls: Does my right hon. and learned Friend not find it bizarre to be accused by Labour Members of underfunding employment training when that and every other major training initiative introduced by the Government has been attacked and opposed by them from the beginning? Does he agree that it would be more appropriate for them to support employment training instead of trying to supplant our training schemes by calling for the reintroduction of a training levy on employers, bearing in mind how that failed to produce the goods in years gone by?

Mr. Howard: I agree with my hon. Friend. Nothing remotely comparable with employment training was available when Labour Members were last in office. They have consistently opposed every training initiative that we have introduced, which makes their claim to be the guardians of training entirely laughable.

Mr. Madel: As there is a shortage of people trained in electronics and electronic engineering, will my right hon. and learned Friend ask the training and enterprise councils to make training in that sector of industry a priority, especially as they now have welcome new money?

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend will appreciate that the essence of training and enterprise councils is that they should be able to tailor training programmes to local circumstances in order to equip local people with the skills that they need to fill local jobs. I am sure that, in carrying out that remit, the councils will bear in mind the needs of the sector to which my hon. Friend refers.

Mr. Blair: Will the Secretary of State confirm that the £120 million that he has announced is less than a third of the amount that he is cutting from the Department of Employment budget for next year alone? Will he guarantee to save the thousands of training places at risk, the training providers who are going out of business and the training programmes that are being closed? If he will not give that guarantee, are we not justified in saying that the Government, having created unemployment, are now abandoning the unemployed?

Mr. Howard: Why does the hon. Gentleman not recognise that his colleague the shadow Chancellor has made it plain that training is not one of the two priorities on which the Opposition would immediately increase spending if they were ever to form a Government? Until we get a commitment about that from the shadow Chancellor, Opposition complaints about funding are entirely unjustified.

Sir Anthony Meyer: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that the welcome improvement in training that he has worked out during his period of office is none the less deficient for those with special training needs, many of whose training schemes will be imperilled by the new system of organisation? Has he any word of comfort for those people?

Mr. Howard: I announced some months ago that for the first time those with disabilities would be included in the aim group, which has a high priority in employment training. Those with disabilities now have a higher priority in training than ever before.

Labour Statistics

2. Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has on the number of job losses in the period 1 June 1990 to 1 February 1991 in (a) the Yorkshire and Humberside region and (b) for the rest of the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Eric Forth): During the seven months June to December 1990, it is provisionally estimated that there were 8,000 confirmed redundancies in the Yorkshire and Humberside region and 62,500 in Great Britain. The estimates are based on the number of redundancies confirmed as having occurred following receipt of a notification under the Employment Protection Act 1975.

Mr. O'Brien: Those figures show that the Government's policy of high interest rates is crippling output and investment and creating unemployment throughout the country. In the Yorkshire and Humberside region over the past few months, bankruptcies have been increasing monthly. There have been more unemployment and more redundancies than ever before, all because of the Government's high interest rates and unified business rate policies. When will the Minister's colleague the Secretary of State create facilities to increase employment and not create further unemployment?

Mr. Forth: I am disappointed but not surprised that the hon. Gentleman should talk his region down. His region has been one of the more robust during this period of economic difficulty. I remind the hon. Gentleman that when he was elected to the House in 1983 there were 3,139 unemployed people in his constituency. The figure is now 2,261. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be grateful for the fact that his constituency has seen such a dramatic fall in unemployment since he was elected. In the Yorkshire and Humberside region, unemployment is down by nearly 100,000 since 1987.

Mr. Riddick: Does my hon. Friend agree that, because of recent investment and productivity improvements, Yorkshire firms are in a much better position to take advantage of the economic upturn when it takes place than they were in the last recession 10 years ago? Does my hon. Friend not find it rather sickening that Opposition Members talk about unemployment only when it is going up and not when it is coming down?

Mr. Forth: Yes. Typically, my hon. Friend has pointed to the strength and dynamism of his region and is rightly showing a pride in the performance of his constituents and the firms in his constituency. What a contrast that is with Opposition Members.

3. Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people are unemployed at present and how many people were unemployed 12 months ago.

Mr. Howard: In January 1991 unemployment in the United Kingdom on the seasonally adjusted, consistent, basis was 1,888,500 compared with 1,615,800 a year earlier.

Mr. Taylor: Does the Secretary of State expect unemployment to increase next year at the same rate as during the past year? As the Government have surrendered their freedom to assist industry by reducing interest rates as a result of their membership of the exchange rate mechanism, will the Government now consider assisting employment figures in the kingdom by reducing the taxation burden on business?

Mr. Howard: The key to the long-term performance of the United Kingdom economy is the rooting out of inflation from that economy. Our membership of the ERM has an important part to play in reinforcing anti-inflationary disciplines. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will recognise that unemployment in his constituency, which was 4,206 at the last election, is now down by nearly 1,000 to 3,306.

Mr. Gregory: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that unemployment would be considerably higher if it were not for tourism, for which he has departmental responsibility? In view of the growth in tourism since 1979 and the present crisis, will he look sympathetically at the possibility of increasing the British Tourist Authority's budget so that unemployment figures do not rise in that growth sector?

Mr. Howard: I agree with my hon. Friend about the importance of the tourist industry, which has made a conspicuous contribution to the reduction in unemployment that we have seen in recent years. My noble Friend the Minister with responsibility for tourism is making an announcement today which will enable the British Tourist Authority and the English Tourist Board to make more funds available for an advertising campaign which will help them to ensure that the industry continues to play an important part in reducing unemployment in Britain.

Mr. Leighton: Is not the present explosion in unemployment the final proof of the Government's failure? Is it not true that in each of the 11 years the Government have been in office unemployment has been higher than it was under Labour? As the economy requires at least 2 per cent. growth to remain stable, and as unemployment is a lagging indicator, is it not true that unemployment will rise for as far ahead as we can see? Will the Secretary of State have the grace to admit in plain English that that is a major failure on the part of the Government?

Mr. Howard: If the hon. Gentleman is making comparisons between what has happened under this Government and what happened under the Labour Government, he should give credit for the fact that there are some 2 million more jobs in Britain now than there were in 1979, that we have one of the lowest rates of unemployment in Europe, and that more than half the people who become unemployed leave unemployment within three months.

Training and Enterprise Councils

4. Mr. Stevens: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many training and enterprise councils are now operational.

Mr. Howard: Excellent progress is being made in setting up training and enterprise councils. All 82 TECs in England and Wales are now in place, with 51 fully operational. By the summer, the full network will be up and running—a full two years ahead of schedule.

Mr. Stevens: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the enterprise function of the TECs is of great importance and will aid the creation and survival of many small firms in future? But does not he find it regrettable that the Opposition are silent on the TECs' enterprise role?

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend is right. The TECs' enterprise role is crucial. They attach enormous importance to it. All we hear from the Opposition is that they attach importance to the enterprise role of local authorities.

Mr. Steinberg: Is the Secretary of State aware that since the introduction of the TECs in the northern region many schemes have been cut by between 40 and 50 per cent. and some schemes have had to finish? Is it not a disgrace that many of the trainees who have been made redundant and are now on the scrapheap are the less able ones? When will the right hon. and learned Gentleman do something about it?

Mr. Howard: Trainees have not been put on the scrap heap and the hon. Gentleman should not make allegations of that sort. The interests of trainees are being safeguarded and alternative arrangements made when it is necessary for providers to cease operating. Training and enterprise councils ensure that effective training is provided, which sometimes means that existing providers are no longer able to carry on.

Training Credits

5. Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement about the progress of the training credit pilots.

Mr. Howard: I was delighted to present the first training credits to young people in Suffolk on 14 February. In the coming months some 45,000 young school leavers throughout the pilot areas will have the opportunity to use training credits to obtain approved training of their choice.

Mr. Mitchell: Are not training credits an innovative and extremely individual approach towards training and very welcome because of that? Do they not mark an enormous contrast with the tired and outdated policies rewrapped by the Labour party which depend, as ever, on compulsion and coercion?

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The Labour party has learnt nothing. Its reaction is always the same—reach for a quango, impose a new tax and introduce a dose of compulsion.

Ms. Armstrong: Does the Minister not realise that training credit money is coming out of other money for training, which has been so savagely cut that many people —certainly those served by the Durham TEC—will lose any chance of training and that the opportunity to link training with employers is diminishing due to rising unemployment? In areas such as north-west Durham the position is critical. It is estimated that the cuts will mean up to 1,000 more people unemployed by the end of March.

Can the Minister tell us how the additional money that he has announced today will save the opportunities for those people to continue in training?

Mr. Howard: The hon. Lady is entirely wrong about the funding of training credits, which included a substantial element of new money. I am sure that she will find that the additional £120 million that I announced today will go a long way towards increasing the resources that the Durham training and enterprise council will have available to meet the training needs of the county.

Mr. Favell: Does my right hon. and learned Friend recall how the Labour party objected when the Government introduced the requirement for young people to report for training if they wished to claim income support—in other words, income support was to be reduced if they did not train? Is he therefore disturbed by the present proposals that the youth training scheme should be abolished?

Mr. Howard: I never know quite what to make of the various suggestions that come from the Labour party about their proposals. Yesterday a new document was produced, which represented yet another change in their proposals. It is such a moving picture that I find it quite bewildering.

Labour Statistics

6. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the number of people registered at the Bermondsey unemployment benefit office for each month from January 1990 until February 1991, inclusive.

Mr. Forth: The information requested for January 1990 to January 1991 can be obtained from the NOMIS—national on-line manpower information system—database in the House of Commons Library. February 1991 figures will be available on 14 March.

Mr. Hughes: The Minister must be too embarrassed to give the figures. Does he concede that there was a 21 per cent. increase in unemployment in the past six months in one of the four docklands constituencies, that there was a 25 per cent. increase in female unemployment, that there is one job vacancy in the local office for every 40 people unemployed and that that is the clearest evidence of the growing recession which is sweeping the south-east, let alone the rest of the country? In a part of the world where the housing service is grossly overstretched, where the health service is pushed to its limits and where the social services cannot cope, is it a sign of success when the Government now tell people that they will lose their jobs as well? Is that a successful economic record?

Mr. Forth: The hon. Gentleman is entitled to put that sort of interpretation upon what is happening if he so wishes, but I should have thought that it would be more realistic to point out that since he was elected in 1983 unemployment has dropped dramatically in his constituency, there are 100,000 fewer unemployed in London than in 1987 and unemployment in this country is lower than the average in the European Community, which I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman supports with great fervour. I might also mention the large number of imaginative programmes that my Department is making available to the hon. Gentleman's constituents and others to help them over a difficult period if they should lose their jobs. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has already pointed out, more than a quarter of those who lose their jobs come off the register within the first month, more than half leave it within three months and two thirds of those who lose their jobs are off the register within six months. That is a much more positive way of looking at it.

Perivale Skillcentre

7. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to replace the training undertaken at the Perivale skillcentre; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Robert Jackson): The Perivale skill centre ceased to provide training in mid-1989 because there was ample alternative provision in the west London area. I am satisfied that the position is unchanged and that training is available, as required, under my Department's schemes.

Mr. Greenway: Is my hon. Friend aware that the nearest skillcentre to Perivale is now in Twickenham, which is a long way from Ealing, where skill training has been provided for many years? Does he realise that there are many manufacturing jobs in Ealing, and that training is urgently required—on the spot, in Ealing?

Mr. Jackson: I shall look into what my hon. Friend has said. West London is, however, served by ample public transport networks and there are many providers of training in the west London area. There are 11 major providers of employment training there, with 1,055 trainees contracted locally, and a further 95 with national providers. There are no fewer than 57 major providers of youth training in the area, with some 2,700 young people receiving it. That, surely, is a considerable concentration of effort in west London.

Training

8. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total number of young people undergoing training on Government programmes in (a) 1978 and (b) 1990.

Mr. Jackson: In 1978 there were about 6,000 young people on Government training programmes, and in November 1990 there were about 350,000.

Mr. Thompson: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply. Will he remind hon. Members, especially Opposition Members, that the youth training scheme introduced by the Government, which guarantees training for every 16 and 17-year-old who needs it, has been an outstanding success and has helped many young people in Norwich? Will he confirm that extra money will be available in the coming year?

Mr. Jackson: The figures that I gave in my earlier answer speak for themselves—there has been a vast increase in youth training under the present Government. I will, however, give a few more figures. Since 1983, 2·7 million young people have benefited from YTS and YT. Currently some 350,000 are receiving training, of whom 88 per cent. then go into jobs, further education or further training. According to the latest figures, 67 per cent. of those who complete the course acquire vocational qualifications. That is a considerable achievement on the part of the Government.

Mrs. Mahon: What advice would the Minister give Jason Hanson, a 17-year-old in my constituency who has become so desperate that he has written to the local press saying, "I have been made redundant twice and I am only 17"? The reason for those redundancies is the high interest rate imposed by the Government. Jason has tried to get on to a Government training scheme, but has been turned down because of his age; he is also unable to draw any income.

Mr. Jackson: I am, of course, concerned about the individual case that the hon. Lady has raised, but the young man to whom she refers falls fairly within the guarantee of places on youth training that the Government offer.

Mr. Simon Coombs: Does my hon. Friend agree that far too many young people are still being put off youth training by Labour party propaganda? Will he take this opportunity to ensure that all young people are made well aware of what they will be missing if they do not grab the opportunity offered by this successful programme?

Mr. Jackson: My hon. Friend is quite right. We must repeatedly draw attention to the availability and advantages of YT. My hon. Friend is also absolutely right about the Opposition's attitude. They like to talk big about their commitment to training, but when they were in power they were useless at it, with only 6,000 on Government training programmes. No doubt it is that bad record that lies behind the continuing refusal of Opposition spokesmen to give any commitment to funding priorities for training, as compared with increases in consumption expenditure.

Mr. Fatchett: If the new training scheme is as successful as the Minister claims, will he explain to the House why he is prepared to preside over cuts that will reduce the amount of money spent per trainee and reduce the overall budget by more than £130 million over the next two years?

Mr. Jackson: The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that the Government are increasing expenditure on YT in the coming year by £38 million over the plan. We are the first Government in British history to provide a guarantee of training to any young person under the age of 18 who is not in full-time education or in work. With the training credits scheme, which is now being piloted, we shall be extending those facilities to young people who are in jobs.

Labour Statistics

9. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement about trends in unemployment in Barnet since 1983.

Mr. Forth: In June 1983 unemployment in the Barnet local authority district was 9,477; in June 1987, when my hon. Friend was elected to this House it was 9,633; but in January 1991 it was down to 7,144.

Mr. Marshall: Does my hon. Friend agree that that dramatic improvement is due to the fact that, since 1983, there has been an increase of 500,000 in the number of people in jobs in Greater London? Does he agree that that illustrates how the social market economy creates jobs? Does he further agree that minimum wage legislation would destroy all those jobs?

Mr. Forth: Yes. I add to what my hon. Friend has rightly said by pointing out that there are now 100,000 fewer people out of work in Greater London than there were in 1987. My hon. Friend is right to point out that some of the proposals that we believe may be emanating from the Opposition Benches—although we can never be quite sure—such as a minimum wage, levies, taxes and compulsion, would all conspire to increase the level of unemployment. The Opposition would be disgraced if they admitted to that.

10. Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on current levels of unemployment and the projections of future unemployment made by economic forecasters.

Mr. Howard: In January 1991 the level of unemployment, seasonally adjusted, in the United Kingdom was 1,888,500. In line with the practice of previous Governments, we do not forecast the level of unemployment.

Ms. Short: Will the Secretary of State admit that unemployment is rising rapidly—particularly in the south-east, where people face the tragedy of losing their job and then losing their house, which is a terrible experience for any family? Is the Secretary of State aware that many people in this country still have not recovered from the enormous growth in unemployment in the early 1980s? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman now apologise for the incompetence of his Government which has damaged the British economy and so many people's lives so badly?

Mr. Howard: I should have thought that the hon. Lady would point out that, in her constituency of Birmingham, Ladywood, unemployment was 10,319 when she was elected in June 1983; it was 8,892 in June 1987; last month it had come down to 5,940.

Mr. Ashby: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that, in 1983, unemployment in my constituency was 16 per cent. whereas today it is 4·6 per cent. and that the number of jobs becoming available is increasing?

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend's experience is characteristic of what has happened to the United Kingdom economy: we have 2 million more jobs now than when Labour left office in 1979.

Mr. McLeish: Does the Secretary of State agree that the £120 million announced for the unemployed is woefully inadequate when measured against the forecast of 2·5 million unemployed this year—the fastest rising unemployment rate in Europe—and a cut of £360 million in the ET budget? Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman intend to introduce a temporary work programme for the unemployed?

Mr. Howard: It is no use Opposition spokesmen coming to the Dispatch Box and complaining about funding for training when the shadow Chancellor consistently refuses to make training one of the two immediate priorities on which Labour would increase spending. Opposition Members should have a word with the shadow Chancellor.

Mr. Simon Hughes: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Points of order take up time. I have not heard anything out of order. What is it?

Mr. Hughes: There have been five questions about unemployment. In the answers to four of those, Ministers gave figures. Why were no figures at all given in reply to the question about inner London? Is that in order?

Mr. Speaker: I am not responsible for the answers that are given.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: The Secretary of State is now to be informed for the third time that the sector of the unemployed who need urgent help are those with special needs. He must be aware that training and enterprise councils are reducing the numbers of places for such people as a result of substantial cuts in their funding. Will he now reply to the question that was put to him from the Labour Front Bench by stating that the funds lost as a result of those cuts will be restored following the announcement that he made today?

Mr. Howard: I repeat that, as a result of their inclusion in the aim group, people with disabilities have higher priority for employment training than they have ever had. I hope very much that the additional £120 million that I announced today will help training and enterprise councils to make more provision for those with special needs.

Mrs. Maureen Hicks: Many unemployed people are hopeful that they will gain places in training schemes, or will secure jobs, as a result of attendance at the very successful Government-sponsored job clubs. Those who attend these clubs testify to their success. Will the Secretary of State consider providing, in addition to the benefits that are already available, assistance with the travelling expenses of those attending interviews?

Mr. Howard: I shall certainly consider my hon. Friend's request. She is quite right to draw attention to the success of job clubs. We plan to create up to 100,000 extra opportunities in job clubs and through the job interview guarantee scheme next year.

Training

11. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has made any recent comparison of facilities available and the percentage of people trained in the United Kingdom and in Germany and France.

Mr. Howard: I visited France last month, and Germany last year, to look at their training arrangements. Despite the differences in approach, which make accurate statistical comparisons difficult, I found general agreement that successful competition in the 1990s will depend on employers' improving significantly the level of skill in their labour force.

Mr. Hughes: Does the Secretary of State recognise that Britain has an annual trading deficit of £15 billion to £16 billion and that many shrewd economic observers put this down to poor training facilities and the lack of skilled people? In these circumstances, and despite the sweetener that he has handed out today, is it not the economics of the lunatic asylum to contemplate the provision of £500 million for training over the next two years?

Mr. Howard: If the hon. Gentleman is so concerned about the funding of our training programme, I am surprised that he did not welcome the very substantial additional funds that I announced today. We have in place the right training framework to ensure that our people will have the skills they need to compete effectively in the markets of the 1990s, and there is abundant evidence that our policies are working extremely effectively.

Mr. Butterfill: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that even more facilities for employment training would be required if we were to adopt the Labour party's policies and introduce statutory minimum wages and impose restrictions on part-time workers?

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend is, of course, entirely right. The policies of the Labour party would lead to a very substantial loss of jobs. Labour Members show no recognition of the fact that there is no point in talking about training if one is not prepared to have adequate differentials to reward those who acquire the skills that training makes possible.

Labour Statistics

13. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the latest figures for unemployment in the United Kingdom and what were the figures for June 1979.

Mr. Howard: The level of unemployment in the United Kingdom on the seasonally adjusted, consistent, basis was 1,888,500 in January 1991 compared with 1,067,500 in June 1979.

Mr. Skinner: After more than 11 years, the Government have managed to push up their fiddled employment figures by more than 800,000. The chances are that, in the course of this year, unemployment will worsen. In the past few months, we have seen a further demonstration that it is possible to organise a war economy. Why, then, do not the Government use the same expertise to get rid of the dole queue?

Mr. Howard: Why does not the hon. Gentleman recognise that 2 million more people are in work now than in 1979 when his party last left office? This country has more people in work than ever before and one of the lowest unemployment rates in the whole of the European Community.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, if one wants to increase employment, one should not increase the cost of labour to employers? Therefore, are not proposals to impose a compulsory training tax or a statutory minimum wage fatuously inappropriate and potentially destructive?

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend is entirely right. The statutory minimum wage proposal alone would destroy 750,000 jobs and the Opposition's policies would combine to ensure that unemployment rose to record levels.

Mr. Graham: Is the Secretary of State aware that, in Scotland, every time we hear an announcement that unemployment is rising we call it the Tory fiddlers' rally, because we do not believe the figures. Just last week, there were savage cuts in training—[Interruption.]—so much so that it was like the new Secretary of State sending the bride to the wedding without her wedding dress. That is the extent of the problem that the Government have created. There is a lack of funding to ensure that people can find jobs—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Did the Secretary of State hear that?

Mr. Howard: I think, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Gentleman was telling us how exceptionally well the Scottish economy is doing, and I entirely agree with him.

Industrial Disputes

14. Mr. Waller: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the number of working days lost because of industrial disputes in the six months to (a) December 1978 and (b) December 1990.

Mr. Forth: There were 6 million working days lost in the six months to December 1978; in the six months to December 1990, just 300,000 days were lost. That is less than one twentieth of the 1978 figure.

Mr. Waller: Does my hon. Friend detect a link between the sharp reduction in the number of strikes and the Government's industrial relations reforms? Does he recall that the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) called ballots an irrelevant effrontery? Do not the consequences since that time prove that his verdict is entirely wrong?

Mr. Forth: Yes, my hon. Friend is right to say that the Government's steady but consistent policy of reform of industrial relations has brought the trade unions into a proper relationship with their members and society at large. A vital by-product of that process is the dramatic fall in industrial strikes, which has been a major factor in attracting inward investment to this country and in increasing employment.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Will the Minister confirm that, every year since 1978, the number of days lost through injury and health problems at work has vastly dominated losses in every other sphere? Why are there ministerial tantrums when the issue of industrial disputes is raised, but complacency and inaction when people are injured or die at work?

Mr. Forth: I am disappointed that the hon. Gentleman should criticise the excellent work of the independent Health and Safety Executive and Health and Safety Commission, which discharge fully and effectively their responsibilities under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974. They have our full support. I am sorry to see that they do not have the Opposition's support.

Company Closures

15. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many mill and company closures and redundancies have been notified to his Department in each of the last six months by the textile and clothing industry and the paper and board industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: As the reply consists of a table of figures, I shall, with permission, arrange for the information to be printed in the Official Report.

Mr. Winterton: Does my hon. Friend accept that the textile and clothing and the paper and board industries are vital to many regions of this country, are essential to this country's economy, that many people are employed in them and that they have made many investments? Will he use the best expertise of his Department to ensure that other Departments of State, particularly the Treasury, realise that high interest rates are killing those industries, which are not operating on a level playing field? Those industries are essential if this country is to play its part in the future of the European Community and the world at large.

Mr. Jackson: I agree that those industries are important. I shall draw my hon. Friend's remarks to the attention of my right hon. and hon. Friends in the relevant Departments.

Mr. Beggs: The textile and clothing and paper and board industries are of great importance to us in Northern Ireland. Will the Minister seek the co-operation of his Government colleagues to ensure that, in future GATT negotiations, as much protection as possible will be afforded to our textile and clothing industry in Northern Ireland and throughout the United Kingdom?

Mr. Jackson: We all understand in the House that the only sure basis on which industry can succeed is to be competitive. That is why it is Government policy to phase out the protection arrangements in the textile industry, although we shall do so over a long period. That is a matter for the Department of Trade and Industry. The GATT negotiations are about to resume and they will provide an opportunity to further pursue such matters.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Andrew MacKay: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 26 February.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall have further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

Mr. MacKay: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that there can be no ceasefire in the Gulf war until all relevant United Nations resolutions have been fully implemented, prisoners of war and Kuwaiti hostages held in Iraq have been released and all Iraqi troops have laid down their arms?

The Prime Minister: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend, but unfortunately the conditions that he so succinctly set out have not yet been met. As my hon. Friend will know, Saddam Hussein spoke again this morning, but without giving any indication whatsoever that Iraq will comply with all the Security Council resolutions. Instead, this morning Saddam Hussein reiterated his untrue claim that Kuwait was part of Iraq and threatened implicitly to return. He must know that meeting the Security Council resolutions is an essential step, and he must publicly and explicitly do so.

I believe that we are now in a new situation with the beginning of the ground war. Our first concern has to be with the safety and security of our forces—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] That means that we require all Iraqi forces in the theatre of operations—those occupying and those supporting the occupation of Kuwait—to abandon their weapons and equipment, and withdraw. Until they do so, they will be treated as hostile.

Saddam Hussein started this war on his terms. He must end it on the terms set out by the United Nations.

Mr. Kinnock: May I take this opportunity strongly to commend our forces for the bravery and professionalism that they are showing in the liberation of Kuwait? Does the Prime Minister share my view that Saddam Hussein could halt the war instantly if he were personally to announce his complete compliance with all relevant United Nations resolutions and, in addition, immediately release all the prisoners of war and civilians he is holding against their will in both Kuwait and Iraq?

Finally, is it not clear that if Iraqi forces leave their military vehicles and lay down their arms, they will be safe from attack, our forces will know that they are also safe from attack, and all hostilities can end?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is entirely right and I agree with him without reservation. He will know that, even this morning, Saddam Hussein said —I shall quote him because there was an implicit threat in what he said:

"the Gates of Constantinople were not opened before the Muslims in the first struggling attempt."

That is the clearest threat that he will yet again return. We have a duty and an obligation to remove that threat using all necessary means.

Dame Janet Fookes: As Saddam Hussein, like the devil, is the father of lies, would my right hon. Friend ensure that all in authority take not the slightest notice of what he says, but only of what he does?

The Prime Minister: I can certainly give my hon. Friend that assurance. There have been many occasions in recent months when Saddam Hussein expressly told untruths. At one stage, his Foreign Minister was negotiating on one tack while he was speaking and acting on another. We simply cannot and do not trust him.

Mr. Ashdown: Does the Prime Minister agree that, despite today's welcome news, there is still much hard and potentially costly work to be done before Kuwait is made secure? He is entirely right to say that the safety of our troops and the long-term security of Kuwait mean that any Iraqi troops who wish to return home may do so, but only after they have surrendered their weapons. If they do so, will he say that, once Kuwait is at last liberated, secure and free from threat, Desert Storm will end?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is quite right. Those are the circumstances in which Desert Storm can end. He is right to emphasise yet again the safety and security of our troops. Frankly, I do not believe that either they or world opinion would forgive us if, at this stage of the conflict, we permitted the Iraqis to withdraw with their weapons, perhaps with risk to our troops and the risk that they would return later.

Q2. Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 26 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hughes: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that the Government have established 12 regional technology centres to aid technology transfer? Can he also confirm that under this Government, the number of science parks has increased from two to 39 with 22 more planned and that spending on civil research and development is higher, as a percentage of the gross national product, in this country than in Japan or in the United States? Does he agree that calls for the establishment of such policies, when they are already in train, merely demonstrates that those who call for them show muddle and ignorance, which dominate Labour party thinking?

The Prime Minister: I cannot immediately imagine to what document my hon. Friend is referring. If, perchance, he is referring to the document on industrial and manufacturing matters that was released yesterday by the Labour party, he is a little unkind. There were some good ideas in that document. Unfortunately, the good ideas are already being implemented and the bad ideas are being recycled.

Mr. Allen McKay: Does the Prime Minister agree with the Secretary of State for the Environment who wants to do away with the poll tax or with the Minister of State for the Environment who has gone on record in the Ribble Valley by-election as saying that he wishes to keep it?

The Prime Minister: The next Member of Parliament for Ribble Valley, who I hope will soon be on the Conservative Benches, will be here in time to hear the result of our review of the community charge.

Q3. Mr. French: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 26 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. French: Does my right hon. Friend agree that an industrial policy that is based on the creation of quangos, subsidies and inadequately costed tax breaks is, as the Financial Times called it this morning, a "recipe for . . . economic distortion"?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend, but, again, I fear that he is being too charitable. He has forgotten the reinvention of the son of National Enterprise Board, an enterprise which took money away from viable businesses to pick winners which, alas, went bust.

Mr. Alfred Morris: What emphasis will the Government put on reparations from Iraq and to what extent will they be demanded? Moreover, what is the attitude of other Governments in the coalition?

The Prime Minister: The attitude is set out in the Security Council's resolutions. All Governments in the coalition subscribe to them and that remains the position.

Q4. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 26 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Taylor: This House has been powerfully united against the terrorism practised by Saddam Hussein in Kuwait. Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is important that the House is also united against the evil acts of terrorism in this country and that it supports all measures, including the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989? Will he have a word with the Leader of the Opposition to encourage him to be more robust on the issue?

The Prime Minister: No one doubts the commitment of the whole House to deal effectively with terrorism and not to give way to it. In my judgment, the widest possible support for the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act would be a welcome event and would help to that end.

Q5. Mr. Ron Brown: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 26 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Brown: I know that the Prime Minister is involved in many important duties. However, will he understand one thing? The real enemy is at home; the enemy is the capitalist system and the Tory Government. They are responsible for the problems of the British people.

We have an example of a state-owned British company wishing to take over the fertiliser business, presently owned by ICI. That is blocked because of the Government's blind party dogma. If we want investment in this country, is not that unfair to workers who may lose their jobs, especially in Leith, where there is a subsidiary owned by ICI called Scottish Agricultural Industries? Is not that wrong?

The Prime Minister: It is a rum occasion when I have to take lessons in dogma from the hon. Gentleman.

Q7. Sir Hugh Rossi: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 26 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Sir Hugh Rossi: As a successful end to the hostilities in the Gulf is happily within reach, will my right hon. Friend now ensure that the allies will combat, with the same vigour and single-mindedness of purpose, the premeditated ecological vandalism perpetrated by Saddam Hussein? It places at risk the worldwide environment from acid deposition, from accelerated global warming and from desertification, and it also pollutes and poisons the waters of the Gulf.

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right and he touches on an important point. The United Kingdom has already made a substantial contribution to help to deal with the pollution caused by the Iraqis in recent weeks. I am sure that my hon. Friend is right. An international effort will be needed and we will be part of that.

Q8. Mr. Battle: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 26 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Battle: As it is clear that some of the right hon. Gentleman's Social Security Ministers want to continue the freeze on child benefit and that some do not, will he tell us which ones he will back? Will he pledge now to make good the four-year cut in child benefit or will people have to rely on his one-off, occasional piecemeal statements at the Dispatch Box for their basic benefits?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman knows very well that there are occasions when we make statements on public expenditure matters such as child benefit. This is not one of them.

Mr. Dunn: When accounts are rendered for the Gulf war, will the Prime Minister seek to obtain an explanation of the extraordinary behaviour of the Soviet Union in recent days? Will he make it plain to the Soviet Government that they can play ball either with the west or with Iraq, but not with both?

The Prime Minister: I shall have the opportunity to discuss all those matters with Mr. Gorbachev early next week.

Q9. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 26 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. McAllion: Is the Prime Minister aware that hundreds of young Scots, half of them aged under 18, pass through London's night shelters every year and that research has shown that on average each of those youngsters has less than £2? Why does the Prime Minister continue to deny to the 16 and 17-year-olds among them the right to benefit? Is the fate of those youngsters who have been thrown on to the streets and are vulnerable to drugs and prostitution a matter of complete indifference to the Prime Minister and his Government?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is entirely wrong, as he knows. We have provided unprecedented training opportunities for young people of that age. There is no necessity whatsoever for any of them to be sleeping rough on the streets of London.

Q10. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 26 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Thurnham: Does my right hon. Friend agree that just as the world recognises the strength and discipline of our armed forces, so it should recognise the strength and discipline of our economy? Is not our pound sterling as strong as Chobham armour?

The Prime Minister: I agree. My hon. Friend will know that there has been a remarkable series of events in recent months and he will also know that sterling has remained remarkably stable despite those events.

Mr. Hume: During his visit to Northern Ireland last week, did anyone raise with the Prime Minister the security value of fixed military checkpoints? Did anyone point out that over the past 20 years nothing of security value has been found at such checkpoints, and that they have become security risks providing targets in the form of the young soldiers and policemen who man them? Is the Prime Minister considering reviewing the use of such checkpoints?

The Prime Minister: I discussed a raft of security matters during my meetings in Northern Ireland last week. However, the hon. Gentleman is aware that it would be unwise to discuss them.

The Gulf

3.31 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (by private notice): To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the report that Iraqi troops have been ordered to withdraw from Kuwait.

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Tom King): In the absence of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, I have been asked to reply.

Last night, there was a report on Baghdad radio that Iraqi forces had been ordered to withdraw from Kuwait. In a broadcast this morning, Saddam Hussein appeared to confirm this. At the same time as this order was apparently given, however, two further Scud attacks were launched, one of which caused a large number of casualties among United States forces in Dhahran. At this time, we have no reliable information and evidence of a general Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait. In many areas in southern Iraq and Kuwait, Iraqi forces are retreating, but as a result of allied military action. British and allied troops are still in contact with Iraqi forces.

As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said a few minutes ago, what we require now is that Saddam Hussein publicly and explicitly accepts all the Security Council resolutions. To ensure the safety and security of our forces, we require all Iraqi forces in the theatre of operations, both those occupying Kuwait and those supporting the occupation, to abandon their weapons and equipment and withdraw. Otherwise, they will continue to be treated as hostile.

Mr. Kaufman: Will the right hon. Gentleman agree with me that, if Saddam Hussein had, on 2 August, made the announcement that he has belatedly made today, he would have prevented loss of life and suffering among Kuwaitis, in the coalition forces, and, not least, among the people of Iraq whom he has victimised? Does he also agree that the sooner the war ends the better for everyone, and that the war can end as soon as necessary conditions have been fulfilled?

Those conditions include full and unequivocal acceptance by Saddam Hussein of all 12 United Nations Security Council resolutions; proper supervision arrangements for the Iraqi withdrawal, with Iraqis leaving behind arms and equipment that could enable attacks to be made on coalition forces and possession of which might lead members of the coalition forces, in the interests of their own safety, to fire upon retreating Iraqis; full disclosure on the spot to coalition forces of all minefields and other defence systems that could cause loss of life to our service men and women; a clear and verifiable commitment not to launch any further Scud missile attacks on Saudi Arabia, Israel or any other neighbouring countries; release of all coalition prisoners of war and of Kuwaiti detainees, and immediate access to our prisoners of war by the International Red Cross.

Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that the coalition war aims have not changed and remain as stated in the House last Thursday by the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, when he said that our objectives are

"the full and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait, the restoration of the legitimate Government of that country and the restoration of peace and security in the region."—[Official Report, 21 February 1991; Vol. 186, c. 455.]—

but that we do not intend to occupy Iraq, we do not intend to change the borders, and we do not wish the destruction of its economy?

Will the right hon. Gentleman join me in paying tribute to our armed forces, whose courage and professionalism have brought about this precipitate collapse of Saddam Hussein? Does he agree that, now that Saddam Hussein has been forced to abandon his hypocritical attempt to link the Kuwait issue with the Palestine issue, the path is open to deal with the Palestine issue? Does he also agree that the best way to build on what our forces have achieved is now to turn our hand to a comprehensive settlement, under United Nations auspices, of all the problems of the middle east?

Mr. King: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman, and I am sure that the whole House will strongly support what he has said. I can confirm his first point straight away —that, if Saddam Hussein had been prepared on 2 August to fulfil the assurances that he appears to be giving now, an awful lot of pain, grief and suffering would have been avoided. In his supplementary questions the right hon. Gentleman correctly drew out the fact that, having involved Kuwait, the coalition and the world in all the pain and suffering, the terms now for Saddam Hussein's successful withdrawal from Kuwait and for the successful ending of the conflict are not the same as they would have been on 2 August if he had had the sense to accept them then.

I am grateful for what the right hon. Gentleman said about our armed forces. Before coming to the House, I spoke to General de la Billiere, who confirmed to me the excellent spirit and commitment with which our forces are carrying forward the campaign. I was especially struck by one of his comments, that many of the prisoners who are now being taken have not had any food for six days. He commented on their pleasure at being captured and at having some prospect of reasonable treatment in captivity, which they have certainly never had under the oppressive regime of Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Could my right hon. Friend pass on to our armed forces the indebtedness of the whole House for their courage, effectiveness and efficiency over the last few weeks, without which we would not have arrived at the present relatively improved position? Now that we are looking from Kuwait to peace and security within the region, can we also look to other United Nations resolutions, as the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) said, and see to it also, now that we are ending the occupation of Kuwait, that other occupations in the region are likewise addressed?

Mr. King: I appreciate what my hon. Friend has said about the courage and commitment of our forces and about seeking a solution for other territories. Perhaps I could now clarify the point raised by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) about any change in the war aims. I apologise for not addressing that in my reply to him. There is no change in the war aims, and I can confirm to the House that we have no territorial ambitions. The hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) also addressed that point to me yesterday. I should like to make it absolutely clear that we do not seek to acquire the territory of Iraq. It is a military necessity that we have to proceed through Iraq for the liberation of Kuwait. It may well be that, in the initial aftermath of this activity, we shall need to ensure the security of Kuwait in some way, but we have no long-term territorial ambitions. We seek no change in borders. I give the House that assurance.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Is the Secretary of State aware that, as the Prime Minister and others have said in the House, time and again, that, if Iraq withdrew from Kuwait, the war would end and, as an order to the Iraqi troops to withdraw has now been given, it is wrong to continue the brutal savagery of warfare on both sides——

Hon. Members: Disgraceful.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman has the absolute right to express his view.

Mr. Benn: —including air raids on Baghdad this morning? Does he agree that millions of people in the world——

Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. As the House well knows, this is a place where every hon. Member has freedom of speech.

Mr. Benn: Millions of people in the world want the killing to stop now, and there is no United Nations authority for the terms which the Secretary of State announced today. Indeed, the Security Council was not even allowed to discuss the Soviet peace proposals before the American ultimatum was issued last Friday.

Mr. King: One of the tragic things about the past months of this awful conflict has been the total inability of the right hon. Gentleman to see things in any balanced way. As he knows perfectly well, the allied campaign for the liberation of Kuwait has been conducted at all times with the greatest commitment to minimising civilian casualties. He will know that, for such a degree of conflict, that has been achieved in a remarkable way. He will know, because he can see it if he looks at any of the pictures, the readiness and happiness of the Iraqi soldiers to surrender, give themselves up and have some prospect of decent treatment. He knows perfectly well that the place where the conflict, suffering, killing and murdering is taking place is not at the front line, where Iraqi forces are surrendering readily, but in Kuwait, against the defenceless citizens who have been so disgracefully treated.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): When my right hon. Friend mentions those appalling atrocities committed in Kuwait, does he also agree that it must be an aim of the United Nations forces that any Iraqi individuals or units which have been responsible for barbarous behaviour must be captured and brought to trial, or at least have their crimes thoroughly investigated, before they are allowed to return to Iraq? Will my right hon. Friend endorse that?

Mr. King: I can assure my right hon. Friend that that point is very much in the minds of the military commanders in the area. We have already warned every Iraqi by leaflets and other methods of the personal responsibility that he bears under international law. We are making every effort to ensure that evidence will be collected about any atrocity or outrage committed. I can say, without disclosing any military secret or operations, that there is a major effort to ensure that those who have committed atrocities in Kuwait City have the least chance of getting away before evidence can be gathered against them.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): Does the Secretary of State agree that the natural desire both inside and outside the House for an early end to hostilities should not be allowed to obscure the unsatisfactory nature of the offer to withdraw which Saddam Hussein has made? Does he further agree that, if any offer were accepted which constituted less than the full implementation of all the United Nations resolutions, the likelihood of a further outbreak of hostilities in due course would be considerable?

Mr. King: I very much agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman. Those who can see this in any balanced way would think it absolutely incredible, after the aggression that has been committed and the outrages and behaviour that we have seen, if we merely stood back and allowed Iraqi forces and all their equipments and armaments to pass in review order down the road so that they could regroup and possibly commit exactly the same aggression again.

Mr. Churchill (Davyhulme): Bearing in mind the suffering, the torture, the rape and the murder for which Saddam Hussein and his army of occupation have been responsible, as well as the casualties that he has inflicted on Israel and the allied forces, is it not wholly unacceptable even to consider any possibility of his army of occupation, including the Republican Guard, in the Kuwaiti theatre of operations being allowed to leave before they have fully surrendered to the allies?

Mr. King: The words of my hon. Friend are, I am afraid, all too accurate about all the evidence that we have of what has been happening in Kuwait and in Kuwait City. The news that we are receiving about what has been happening to Kuwaitis at the hands of Iraqi soldiers and the Iraqi military is extremely distressing. It is for that reason that we have taken such a strong view. We have found it necessary to conduct a campaign which we did not seek. We are not now going to leave it unfinished. We will see Kuwait liberated; we will see that Kuwait stays liberated.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): Although I agree with everything that my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) said, will the Secretary of State assure us that, if the Security Council requests it or, from Baghdad, Saddam Hussein accepts entirely the 12 United Nations resolutions, the coalition forces will immediately give access to the international organisations which would be the most appropriate bodies to carry out the functions that will be required? For instance, the International Committee of the Red Cross is the most appropriate organisation to deal with prisoners of war. Will the Secretary of State confirm that the emphasis placed by the Government on the United Nations resolutions will continue, so that young lives and the civilian lives will not have been lost for nothing and that we will soon see the United Nations Security Council sitting down to discuss a meaningful set of proposals that would result in a comprehensive middle east peace?

Mr. King: On the first point, in relation to the International Committee of the Red Cross, we will honour our obligations entirely. Right hon. and hon. Members have seen pictures of the way in which we are trying to deal humanely with prisoners. We have seen pathetic pictures on television of the gratitude clearly shown by the Iraqis for the treatment, which is not what they would have expected to get from their own punishment squads who lay behind them. We will give full access to the International Committee of the Red Cross.

If Saddam Hussein wishes to see an end to the conflict, one of our requirements is that we have immediate access through the Red Cross to our prisoners of war. We want their names; we want to know who they are. We want to give reassurance to their families that they are still alive —knowledge which, sadly, is still lacking for many of them. On the further point that the hon. Gentleman has raised, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has made our position very clear; we wish to see the conflict settled and the aggression ended, so that we may address the other serious issues that need to be addressed in the area.

Mr. James Kilfedder (North Down): Does the Secretary of State agree that the violent, bellicose and lying language used by President Saddam in his broadcast to the people of Iraq negates and rebuts his alleged acceptance of the Soviet peace proposals, and sows the seeds of further aggression in the Gulf? Will he convey to the relatives of the American soldiers killed in the Scud attack yesterday, at the time that President Saddam was supposed to be making peace offers, the sympathy of the people of the United Kingdom, bearing in mind the heavy burden that the American forces are bearing in the Gulf?

Mr. King: On the latter point, I know that the whole House will share the feelings that the hon. Member has expressed about the tragic, unlucky accident with the Scud warhead last night and the severe suffering of the American forces. He is right to draw attention to the unreliability of Saddam Hussein. I would not dream of recommending to the House or to anybody else that they accept any speech of Saddam Hussein's at face value. From their experience of dealing with him, there are not many Iranians or many other Arabs either who would do that. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the reason we are in a difficult position now is that Saddam Hussein lied directly to the King of Saudi Arabia and to the President of Egypt.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): In paying tribute to all the allied troops and ancillary services, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman to agree that we have a responsibility to ensure that no allied lives will have been, or may be, lost in vain? In that context, can he confirm that a detailed analysis of the speech by Saddam Hussein shows that it was his clear intention to regroup and return to the battle at a future date? Will he assure the House that no settlement will allow that facility, bearing in mind the fact that the long-term hopes for peace in the region are based on him never being given that opportunity?

Mr. King: I am grateful for what the hon. Lady says. She is precisely right in her reading of that speech. We shall not expose any of our forces—as she knows, many young Scots are among the British forces in the Gulf—to unnecessary risk.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): Is my right hon. Friend aware that last week, on behalf of the all-party human rights group in the House, I took evidence from witnesses from Kuwait who detailed the most horrific crimes, starting with the invasion at the beginning and apparently continuing now? Is any effort being made by our people on the spot to record those details, in conjunction possibly with the Kuwaiti authorities, so that those responsible can be brought to account at the appropriate time?

Mr. King: I do indeed know of the evidence on the occasion to which my right hon. Friend refers, and I understand that much of the evidence was extremely distressing. I assure him that there is great determination among the allies, the Kuwaiti authorities and the Kuwaiti resistance to try to ensure that any evidence that can be brought is brought and that those who may have been responsible for perpetrating those crimes are not able in the next few hours to slip away.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): May I draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to early-day motion 533 entitled "The Tory Party and Saddam Hussein"? It points out that, of the 31 motions on the Order Paper critical of Saddam Hussein and what he has done to his own people and others in the region, only one motion was tabled by a Conservative.

Under those circumstances, Labour Members need no lectures about the evil of Saddam Hussein from incompetent unimaginative and hypocritical Ministers. When the war is over, will the British Government be announcing an arms embargo to the middle east to make sure that we do not create another Saddam Hussein whom our brave troops will then have to move on and disarm?

Mr. King: My understanding—I will withdraw if I have it wrong—

Mr. Banks: The right hon. Gentleman gets most things wrong.

Mr. King: —is that the hon. Gentleman voted against every motion in support of resolute action against Saddam Hussein. The one voice that we need to go from this House at this time to our forces engaged in the challenging task to which we have asked them to put their hand is the voice of support from us all for the importance of the work that they are doing.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Will my right hon. Friend take every step to ensure that first the prisoners, for whom we all feel extremely sorry, and then the whole population of Iraq, are made aware of the foul nature of the bestial crimes committed by this tyrant against their Arab brethren?

Mr. King: We have our suspicions, but in the days ahead we may well discover a good deal more—even worse than some of the things to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) referred. I do not want to say more now, but some of the information coming through to us is very grave indeed.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): The whole House should be grateful to the service men of all the nations of the coalition who have achieved the liberation of the small country of Kuwait. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that we now owe it, as politicians, to those service men to ensure that we achieve a lasting peace, which must mean a fair settlement for the Iraqi people and —this is of extreme importance—include the settlement of the other outstanding United Nations resolutions concerning the region and affecting Palestine?

Mr. King: The first thing that we need to do, having asked our forces to risk their lives in this conflict, is to ensure the right outcome. That is why my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and President Bush today issued a statement about the basis on which the conflict can be settled. Nobody wants the conflict to go on for any longer than necessary, but we have a duty to our forces to see that the terms on which it is settled are fair and safe for them. As soon as we have settled this conflict, we can address other issues.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): The Government's and the coalition's planning and handling of the war effort have been superb, largely due to the courage, brilliance and professionalism of our troops. Does the coalition have a plan for the immediate handling of the peace and, if so, could someone tell us what it is?

Mr. King: Considerable work is being done. If the peace to which my hon. and learned Friend refers is peace in Kuwait, that of course has very much concerned the Government of Kuwait. It will be a challenging task, and while much preparatory work has been done, there is no question but that the task has been made even more difficult by the increasing reports of damage. My hon. and learned Friend may have heard this morning one reporter who said that it is quite clear that the main activity in the last days of the Iraqi forces has been to do as much damage as they can to Kuwait and very little to conduct a proper defence.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Does the Secretary of State accept that, if civilian and military lives, including the lives of young British service personnel, are to be saved, the war must be brought to an early and orderly end, with the best possible lines of communication between politicians of many countries and military commanders on the ground? In that context, can the Secretary of State say how and when the United Nations will be given direct responsibility for arranging an orderly withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait, monitoring and supervising the ceasefire that will follow, and setting about the awesome agenda for bringing durable peace and stability to the region?

Mr. King: Everybody wants to see the earliest possible resolution of this conflict and an end to fighting. That is why my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has set out as clearly as he could, and why I have repeated, the basis on which that can be achieved. The hon. Gentleman may know that, just a few minutes ago, the President of the United States spelled out exactly the same conditions as part of the coalition agreement. The United Nations is not in Kuwait or in the theatre of operations, but we are acting under its authority. It is against that background that we have to find the earliest and safest basis on which this conflict can be ended.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about saving the lives of young men. We have a duty to those young men to see that we conclude this matter on a safe, sound and secure basis for the future. The biggest betrayal would be to launch these young men into the conflict and ask them to risk their lives and then to let it end in some premature or fudged way which meant that the job had not been properly done.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): My right hon. Friend mentioned the pathetic state of the Iraqi prisoners of war. Does he consider that the dignity, humanity and restraint being shown by allied troops towards those prisoners, which is in direct contrast to the way in which allied prisoners have been treated, not only is right in itself but will be an important and useful factor in winning the peace when the war is over?

Mr. King: I very much agree with my hon. Friend, who mentions one of the matters that may be of lasting benefit to relationships in the area. There has been much propaganda, and anyone who knows anything about the regime of Saddam Hussein over the years knows the power of state propaganda. A considerable number of his Iraqi forces now recognise for what they are the many lies that have been told about the allied forces.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): The Secretary of State will recall that, some weeks ago, he paid tribute to the Territorial Army—in particular, the Royal Army Medical Corps, one of whose young nurses is a constituent of mine. Her mother informs me that the electricity board has said that, despite the fact that because her daughter is in the Gulf and her house is unoccupied, standing charges will still be included on her account. If that nurse remains in the Gulf for long enough, her electricity could be cut off. Surely that is a shameful way for a national utility to treat people who were the first to volunteer in response to this country's call.

Mr. King: I do not think that there is the slightest risk of such people having their electricity cut off in their absence. However, I take note of the hon. Gentleman's point. The whole country has shown its support for our forces. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman mentioned the reserve forces and the way in which so many of them—every one of them, I think that I am right in saying, a volunteer—have willingly gone to serve in the Gulf in support of our forces.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Hon. Members: Soames.

Mr. Speaker: Not yet.

This is a private notice question. There are 23 groups of amendments in the following Bill but, in view of the importance of the matter, I will allow three more questions from each side. I call first Mr. Soames.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): In view of the great difficulties in dealing with someone as dishonest and irrational as Saddam Hussein, may I suggest that General Schwarzkopf should offer the senior Iraqi commander in the field a full instrument of unconditional surrender, appended to which should be full details of the mining and booby-trapping of Kuwait? Does my right hon. Friend agree that, if that were to be accepted, it would spare a great deal of anxiety and further loss of life?

Mr. King: My hon. Friend raises serious points. There are real difficulties about the trustworthiness of Saddam Hussein and his powers to communicate with his forces. We are giving close attention to what might be the right vehicle for such communications. I shall bear in mind by hon. Friend's suggestion.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I welcome the fair tone of the Secretary of State's statement, but does he agree that those who talk about trusting Saddam Hussein's words about returning to Iraq would not have many friends in Kuwait or Saudi Arabia, where the people are aware of a similar statement when Saddam Hussein said that he would not be invading Kuwait?

What plans are afoot for the future? People talk about the middle east settlement, but, if Saddam Hussein regroups with his forces in Iraq, what about the Gulf settlement? When the Prime Minister meets President Gorbachev next week, will he ask what terms and conditions have been reached with the Russians for the future stability of the area and for reparations to Kuwait after the ravages of the war?

Mr. King: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will have heard the hon. Gentleman's comments and will no doubt bear them in mind. The basis on which we can ensure security and stability in the area will depend on how the conflict ends, but the success of the coalition forces has given the area a much better prospect of a more stable and less aggressive approach from Iraq in future.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): No doubt history will show for how much the humane world has to thank Britain, and in particular my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, for the resolve that he has been shown in dealing with this dictator. In view of what Saddam Hussein was saying to his people last night, is it not important that he should in no way be able to show any kind of victory?

Mr. King: When Kuwait is liberated and evidence of what has been authorised in Kuwait by Saddam Hussein becomes apparent, the world will realise the force of what my hon. Friend says. The situation is not yet finalised, but we have all seen enough to know the rightness of the decision to stand firm, to work as a coalition, to seek the widest possible international support for the action and not to find some way out, some deal of some sort, some negotiation halfway through this terrible business that has lasted for all these months.

Mr. Ian McCartney (Makerfield): Now that you have called me and the hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames), Mr. Speaker, it has become the "Little and Large" show. Before 2 August last year, a number of British children were illegally abducted and taken to Kuwait, and they have remained there during the hostilities. Can the right hon. Gentleman give us an assurance that we shall try to identify and locate these British children as soon as possible, so that their mothers in this country will hopefully learn that they are okay and have not been damaged in any way by the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait?

Secondly, having located the children, will the right hon. Gentleman make every possible effort to have them returned to their mothers in Britain, because they were illegally abducted from the United Kingdom by Kuwaiti citizens, who had no right to take them there in the first place? Given that we have made so many sacrifices to free the people of Kuwait, the least that they can do is send back our children who have been illegally abducted.

Mr. King: Obviously I cannot comment on the detail, but I have heard what the hon. Gentleman has said. Once Kuwait is liberated, there will be a chance for the normal processes of international law to reassert themselves upon such matters.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): As further evidence that the so-called Iraqi pull-out may be nothing more than a cynical manoeuvre in bad faith, will my right hon. Friend take careful note of today's reports that the Iraqi army has been rounding up significant numbers of young Kuwaitis, presumably to take them as hostages or, even worse, for the sort of atrocities that my right hon. Friend hinted at? Is it not out of the question that we should discuss a ceasefire as long as such bestial actions continue?

Mr. King: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, because I know that he knows the area well and will have his own sources, which tend to confirm the extremely distressing information which is coming through about that behaviour. That is why, as he rightly says, "withdrawal" is another word for regrouping in certain circumstances and is a technique and a trick that Saddam Hussein used against the Iranians to considerable effect. He took advantage of prolonging discussions on a possible ceasefire to launch a new attack and to capture thousands of Iranian prisoners of war during the Iran-Iraq war, and we shall not fall into that trap.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): Will the Secretary of State make it clear—I am sure that it was inadvertent—that Saddam Hussein did not unequivocally accept the United Nations resolutions in the speech that was broadcast this morning? Will he further make it clear, in the absence of access by the International Committee of the Red Cross to our prisoners of war who are being held by Iraq, that Saddam Hussein will be held personally responsible for their safety?

Mr. King: In case I gave any impression that I thought that Saddam Hussein had unequivocally accepted, I am glad to take this opportunity to make it clear that he did no such thing; I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. It is a pretty depressing experience trying to read Saddam Hussein's speeches and to work our what on earth they do mean, but it is quite clear that they do not mean that. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made clear, implied within the speech is a very sinister threat indeed —to regroup and to seek to have another go.

On the wider issue, we have made our position very clear. People are individually responsible for their actions. There is a worrying and increasing roll of evidence of some of the things that have happened, and they will need to be given careful attention.

Veterans

4.8 pm

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to establish a Department of Veterans' Affairs with responsibility for resettlement of veterans, care and rehabilitation of disabled veterans, support for veterans' families, and related matters; and for connected purposes.

The Bill—which is supported by the Royal British Legion, the Soldiers, Sailors and Airmen's Families Association and several other ex-service organisations—also enjoys wide support in the House, as I hope to demonstrate when I give the names of its sponsors.

I pay tribute to the Royal British Legion and other organisations for their work on behalf of veterans. The Bill's purpose is to help that work by making the Government more accountable in the way in which it deals with the concerns of veterans. Currently, some 18 million veterans and their dependants are in this country; compared to those in the United States, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and other countries, only a small proportion have any special status in terms of either pension provision or specialised welfare services. Responsibility for dealing with the needs of veterans lies with 16 different Government Departments: most right-minded people would agree that that is a recipe for red tape and confusion, which indeed result from the present system.

The scope and nature of the problems caused to individuals can be illustrated by the case of Corporal Blackburn, which has been raised before in the House. Corporal Blackburn is a young soldier who was injured in service and consequently became paralysed, which necessitated long hospitalisation and confinement to a wheelchair for life. Quite apart from his disabilities, which were traumatic enough in themselves, the man had to cope almost entirely on his own with resettlement and rehabilitation. Paradoxically, there was no Ministry of Defence social worker in the military hospital to which he was confined, although such a facility was available to NHS intake patients.

Corporal Blackburn eventually managed to leave hospital, but his departure was delayed because of the problem of finding accommodation that had been suitably adapted for his severe disablement. The whole process of rehabilitation involved several agencies and Government Departments, and, while that would have been difficult enough for an able-bodied person to deal with, it was much more of a problem for someone who was virtually paralysed and trying to come to terms with his condition. The corporal was single; had he been married, that might have solved some of the problems, but it would obviously have created many others.

Corporal Blackburn has spent some two and a half years trying to get his problems solved, and they are not all solved yet. That case highlights the difficulties that many people experience.

The Bill seeks to streamline the service and the support given in such a way as to minimise the stress and hardship that confront ex-service personnel and their families, particularly in cases such as that of Corporal Blackburn. It will ensure that they receive all the help with resettlement, care and rehabilitation, and all the support for their families, that is necessary. It will also co-ordinate responses, which at present are scattered and confusing.

Soon we shall have a new generation of veterans, as service people return from the Gulf—people who joined the services and, lately, have fought for the United Nations resolutions and other Gulf causes, and who carry out the tough and often bloody work that is necessary from time to time. During such conflicts, however, our support should not be confined to fine words. We must also turn our minds to setting up a system that will help such people to adjust to leading lives that are as normal as possible. So far, we have failed in that task; the Bill provides a framework within which we can remedy that failure and recognise our responsibilities.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. George Howarth, Mr. Rupert Allason, Sir Rhodes Boyson, Mr. Don Dixon, Mrs. Margaret Ewing, Mr. Michael Foot, Sir Marcus Fox, Mrs. Llin Golding, Mr. James Molyneaux, Mr. Merlyn Rees, Sir David Steel and Mr. Brian Wilson.

VETERANS

Mr. George Howarth accordingly presented a Bill to establish a Department of Veterans' Affairs with responsibility for resettlement of veterans, care and rehabilitation of disabled veterans, support for veterans' families, and related matters; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 26 April and to be printed. [Bill 94.]

Orders of the Day

Road Traffic Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 4

SUPPLY OF UNROADWORTHY VEHICLES ETC.

'.—(1) Section 75 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 (vehicles not to be sold in unroadworthy condition or altered so as to be unroadworthy) shall be amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (3), sub-paragraph (iii) of paragraph (a) shall be omitted and for paragraph (b) there shall be substituted—

"(b) it is in such a condition that its use on a road would involve a danger of injury to any person".

(3) In subsection (4), after the words "that condition" there shall be inserted—

"(a)",

and at the end there shall be added the words "or

(b) would involve a danger of injury to any person."

(4) In subsection (6), paragraph (c) shall be omitted.

(5) After subsection (6) there shall be inserted—

"(6A) Paragraph (b) of subsection (6) above shall not apply in relation to a person who, in the course of a trade or business—

(a) exposes a vehicle or trailer for sale, unless he also proves that he took all reasonable steps to ensure that any prospective purchaser would be aware that its use in its current condition on a road in Great Britain would be unlawful, or

(b) offers to sell a vehicle or trailer, unless he also proves that he took all reasonable steps to ensure that the person to whom the offer was made was aware of that fact.".'.

Brought up, and read the First time.

4.15 pm

The Minister for Roads and Traffic (Mr. Christopher Chope): I beg to move, That the clause be read a second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 37 and 38.

Mr. Chope: The new clause arises out of concerns expressed in Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) about the sale of unroadworthy vehicles. At present, the existing provisions which are designed to prevent the sale of unroadworthy vehicles do not operate satisfactorily because when confronted with the fact that a vehicle on the forecourt is unroadworthy traders often claim that they would have repaired the vehicle or warned the customer about its condition before a sale was made. That is clearly unsatisfactory, and I believe that the new clause will help to remedy that problem.

The new clause provides that, where an unroadworthy vehicle is exposed for sale—for example, on a garage forecourt—the trader must prove that he has taken all reasonable steps to make potential purchasers aware that its use in its current condition on a road in Great Britain would be unlawful. One way of doing that would be for the trader to put warnings, in the form of notices, on each vehicle. However, we do not intend to prescribe exactly how that requirement should be satisfied; it will be for the courts to determine on the facts of each case.

In the case of an offer for sale, which is directed at an individual rather than at the world at large, the trader would have to prove that he has taken all reasonable steps to make that person aware of the facts. The new requirements will apply only to those who deal in vehicles in the course of a trade or business, which is where the major problem lies.

Ms. Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford): As with much of the Bill, Opposition Members are happy to support the Government in introducing measures that are clearly designed to help with the safety of people driving on our roads and the standard of vehicles.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 5

DISAPPLICATION OF RTA SECTIONS 1 to 3 FOR AUTHORISED MOTORING EVENTS

'.After section 13 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 there shall be inserted—

"Disapplication of sections 1 to 3 for authorised motoring events.

13A.—(1) A person shall not be guilty of an offence under sections 1, 2 or 3 of this Act by virtue of driving a vehicle in a public place other than a road if he shows that he was driving in accordance with an authorisation for a motoring event given under regulations made by the Secretary of State.

(2) Regulations under this section may in particular—

(a) prescribe the persons by whom, and limit the circumstances in which and the places in respect of which, authorisations may be given under the regulations;

(b) specify conditions which must be incorporated in authorisations;

(c) provide for authorisations to cease to have effect in prescribed circumstances;

(d) provide for the procedure to be followed, the particulars to be given, and the amount of any fees to be paid, in connection with applications for authorisations;

(e) make different provisions for different cases.".'.

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Chope: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take amendment No. 72, in page 2, line 19, at end insert—

'( ) Any competitor in or official of a motor sport event licensed by an appropriate body approved by the Secretary of State shall not be treated as being in a public place whilst taking part in such an event.'.

Mr. Chope: The new clause was tabled in response to concern about the possible consequences for motor sports events of extending the scope of the bad driving offences in the Bill to public places other than roads.

It is desirable in principle that the laws relating to dangerous driving should be extended to public places, but motor sports events give rise to several questions. Where motor sports events such as rallies take place on the road, the Road Traffic Acts do and should apply. Nothing in the Bill affects race tracks such as Silverstone or Brands Hatch, to which the Road Traffic Acts have never applied. The events with which we are concerned are time trials and similar rally stages organised in areas such as Forestry Commission land, where spectators can move freely throughout the area in which the rally is taking place. The tracks on which the events take place are likely, in such circumstances, to come within the definition of "public place".

No one is suggesting that it is right for rally drivers to drive irresponsibly but the manner of driving and the state of the vehicles being driven in off-road events is such that they cannot properly be judged by the same criteria as driving on the public highway. It is right, therefore, that such events should be treated differently and that the provisions of sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 should not apply.

I hope that the House will accept the new clause and that my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley will seek to withdraw his amendment, as the present proposal goes rather wider.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): I thank my hon. Friend for listening so carefully to what was said in Committee. The Royal Automobile Club and many of my hon. Friends were concerned at the risk that would have been posed to motor sports had the Bill remained unamended. We warmly appreciate the change that my hon. Friend has brought about, and I thank him for it.

Question put and agreed to

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 12

VARIABLE SPEED LIMITS

' . In section 84 of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 (speed limits on roads other than restricted roads), for subsection (1) there shall be substituted—

"(1) An order made under this subsection as respects any road may prohibit—

(a) the driving of motor vehicles on that road at a speed exceeding that specified in the order,

(b) the driving of motor vehicles on that road at a speed exceeding that specified in the order during periods specified in the order, or

(c) the driving of motor vehicles on that road at a speed exceeding the speed for the time being indicated by traffic signs in accordance with the order.

(1A) An order made by virtue of subsection (1)(c) above may—

(a) make provision restricting the speeds that may be indicated by traffic signs or the periods during which the indications may be given, and

(b) provide for the indications to be given only in such circumstances as may be determined by or under the order;

but any such order must comply with regulations made under subsection (1B) below, except where the Secretary of State authorises otherwise in a particular case.

(1B) The Secretary of State may make regulations governing the provision which may be made by orders of local authorities under subsection (1)(c) above, and any such regulations may—

(a) prescribe the circumstances in which speed limits may be imposed by or under an order,

(b) prescribe the speed limits which may be specified in an order, and

(c) make transitional provision and different provision for different cases."'.—[Mr. Chope]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Chope: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 92, 93 and 95.

Mr. Chope: As I said in Committee, we have been considering the possibility of taking powers to enable a more flexible approach to speed limits. This new clause is intended to give mandatory force to variable speed limits that are indicated by traffic signs. It will provide both the Secretary of State and local authorities with a new, additional power to enable them to introduce variable speed limits.

The idea arose from the Department's M25 review, and was originally recommended by the consultants as a means of improving traffic flow at peak periods. However, I believe that there may well be much wider benefits to be gained from having enforceable variable speed limits in other circumstances. It would be reasonable to enforce lower speed limits on motorways when there were adverse weather conditions or when a major accident had occurred. That would, however, require signs that complied with existing requirements—that is, with a red outer ring—and these could be introduced only when the technology had been developed and was in place.

Another, equally important, area of application is local roads, where lower speed limits may be beneficial at certain times of the day to protect vulnerable road users, such as children or pedestrians. A good example is outside a school on a busy road, where it might be appropriate, depending on local conditions, to introduce a lower speed limit, which would apply when children were entering or leaving school. We would need to design and to implement such schemes carefully, to ensure that they operated satisfactorily and were cost-effective in reducing casualties.

This new power would, I believe, give us the opportunity to develop a more flexible approach to speed limits, so that they might more closely reflect actual driving conditions.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): Does this new clause relate solely to the reduction of speed limits on a variable basis, or would it enable the Secretary of State to increase speed limits?

Mr. Chope: The new clause is drafted very widely. It is not envisaged that my right hon. and learned Friend would use the power to have speed limits higher than those that would normally apply.

I hope that the taking of this new power will be welcomed by the public at large. It would be a very useful additional tool in the range of measures that we have for improving road safety, particularly in relation to the more vulnerable road users.

Ms. Ruddock: There is grave anxiety among Opposition Members that the measure could be used to allow increased speed limits. I do not think that the Minister's answer was absolutely clear. My understanding of what he said is that an increase would be possible. I think the Government share our concern that higher speed leads, if not to more accidents, certainly to more severe injuries resulting from collision. I hope that the Minister will assure the House that it is not the Government's intention to use a measure of this kind, which could very sensibly be used to lower speed limits, to take account, say, of roadworks or of accidents, for the purpose of increasing speed limits. It would be quite inappropriate to increase speed limits by the back door.

Mr. Ronnie Fearn (Southport): The Minister has mentioned the part that could be played by parents. I think that schools were mentioned. In Committee, I referred very briefly to a case in which, following an increase in the speed limit outside a school from 30 mph to 40 mph at certain times of the day, a child who stepped out from behind a tree was killed. I wonder whether road signs that specify 30 or 40 mph will cause confusion among parents. Would it not be possible to stick to 30 mph on roads outside schools?

Mr. Chope: At present, the standard procedure is to have speed limits that apply at all hours of the day and night. The hon. Gentleman will be aware, however, that in certain circumstances—especially when children are going to or coming from school—extra care should be exercised by drivers, and that there is a case for having a lower speed limit then than at other times of the day or night. We are including the new power in the Bill to make available the necessary flexibility.

Mr. Fearn: At present, local authorities install flashing lights outside every school to let drivers know that they should slow down. The warning continues during the period in which the children are on their way to and from school, and seems to be quite effective. If we introduce a different system which varies the speed limit between 30 and 40 mph, it could lead to confusion.

Mr. Chope: I am sorry that the hon.Gentleman thinks that there will be confusion. I hope that most hon. Members will consider that this important new power will increase the ability to be flexible. I am not prescribing the circumstances in which the power should be used.

As for the question of the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock), the power cannot be used to override existing speed limits. We do not need primary legislation to do that. As I shall say during a later debate to be initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King), the power already exists through secondary legislation to alter speed limits.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 1

DESIGNATION OF PRINCIPAL ROUTES

'(1) The Metropolitan Police may apply to the Secretary of State to make regulations to designate a trunk road or a designated road as a principal route.

(2) Before making an application to the Secretary of State the Metropolitan Police shall consult—

(a) the London authorities through which the road passes; and

(b) London Regional Transport.'—[Mr. Tracey.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Tracey: I beg to move, That the new clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments. No. 1, in clause 56, page 50, line 27, after 'it', insert

'makes any regulations as to waiting or loading (except where these are on a priority route as designated under section 35 of this Act or are on a road designated as a Principal Route) or'.

No. 2, in line 33, after 'it', insert

'makes any regulations as to waiting or loading (except where these are on a priority route as designated under section 35 of this Act or are on a road designated as a Principal Route) or'.

No. 3, in clause 57, line 35, after 'vehicle', insert

'in a road subject to waiting and loading regulations (except where these are on a road designated as a priority route under section 35 of this Act or are on a road designated as a Principal Route) or is'.

No. 4, in line 45, after 'to', insert

'waiting or loading or to'.

Mr. Tracey: The new clause represents a further stage of the discussions that took place in Committee. Both sides of the Committee were in total agreement and I assume that, this afternoon, both sides of the House will agree that the question of parking enforcement—particularly on single and double yellow lines—has raised many problems in London. The London boroughs, represented by the London Boroughs Association and the Association of London Authorities, feel that enforcement is not being adequately carried out.

The Bill makes various changes and proposes new powers of enforcement in areas covered by parking meters and residents' parking permits. As we said in Committee, Londoners are concerned about the further issue of enforcing parking restrictions on yellow lines. At present, enforcement is dealt with by the Metropolitan police and traffic wardens. It is widely accepted—not only by local authorities and Members of the House but also by many police officers, from the rank of superintendent downwards—that an inadequate job is being done.

Police officers and those who control traffic wardens recognise that their numbers are inadequate. They enforce the law and protect the citizen in relation to matters that are certainly much graver and weightier than the infringement of parking regulations. It is to the benefit of all of us—whether we work in commerce or transport authorities or are private citizens—that parking should be controlled and enforced. We do not want people to park illegally or illicitly in our streets, preventing buses and private cars from passing freely through the streets.

4.30 pm

In Committee, my hon. Friend the Minister for Roads and Traffic began to say that the Government would be prepared to accept some amendments to the proposed legislation in relation to London. Following that undertaking a number of us thought that it would be sensible to seek further amendments. The new clause specifically calls for the Metropolitan police to apply to the Secretary of State for regulations allowing them to enforce parking on the main trunk roads and those which, under the Bill, will be designated as principal, or red, routes.

We understand perfectly well that the police require the power to enforce regulations on main roads, so that they retain major powers over the movement of traffic in the capital city, but we believe, and we made it clear in Committee, that on side roads and more minor roads it makes sense for the enforcement powers of the police to be transferred to local authorities. The local authority associations have told the Government that they are prepared to take on enforcement powers across the board for parking on yellow lines and parking meters and where residents' parking permits apply.

The new clause meets the desire of the police to retain powers on main roads, but provides the sensible solution of transferring the rest of the enforcement powers to local authorities. That would also remove the frustration felt by London borough authorities and the public's inevitable confusion. It is ridiculous that districts in our capital should be controlled by double or single yellow lines yet we all see that those regulations are constantly not enforced, whether for good reasons or not.

Will my hon. Friend the Minister give further consideration to the new clause, and the amendments associated with it? Will he agree to the sensible suggestion of allowing reason to prevail, so that the powers for controlling most of the capital's roads are transferred to local authorities?

Mr. John Bowis (Battersea): I support the spirit of the new clause, but shall wait to see whether its exact wording is the best way forward. I am sure that the intention behind it is right. I entirely agree on the need for the Metropolitan police to have responsibility for enforcing red routes and strategic routes. Equally, I entirely agree that something has gone sadly astray in the enforcing of other parking regulations, both permitted parking and illegal parking.

My constituents are frustrated for two reasons—first, because cars wrongly parked outside their homes are not moved. Secondly, they become frustrated when they are penalised, because their own cars, which are perhaps illegally but not obstructively parked, are towed away. The new clause seeks to put right such inadequacies of enforcement and promote greater sensitivity among the enforcers. When I received many complaints from my constituents about the way in which parking regulations and tow-away vehicles were operated, I went out with my tow-away crew. While I was with the crew that was organised by the local police station, I saw a degree of sensitivity and understanding in the way that parking was enforced. But we soon started to receive calls asking why we had towed away vehicles from outside, for example, the doctor's surgery. The crew were immediately able to say, "That was not us. It was the team that came out, on spec, from Scotland Yard."

That was an example of the police operating without local knowledge and causing aggravation to local residents. The new clause would put that right and would stop the nonsense that occurs when one authority enforces parking regulations on a parking bay, on a parking meter or on residents' parking places, which are next to yellow lines that are enforced by a different authority. In such circumstances, the vehicle can move from one to the other and escape whichever authority happens to be monitoring that strip of road at the time.

I hope that the Minister will accept the new clause, which would put some sense onto the parking regulations in London. That idea is supported by just about every London borough, and certainly by Wandsworth.

Sir Philip Goodhart (Beckenham): At the moment, there are a mere 1,400 traffic wardens in London, and they will be needed to concentrate on the red routes and on the main routes. The London boroughs must be given powers to enforce yellow line and parking restrictions. I am sure that the Government will respond to that issue but, when they do, we may be left in a curious position. The London boroughs will be responsible for yellow lines, but local authorities outside London will not be responsible for parking issues. It would be sensible to include in the Bill powers to give local authorities outside London the power to handle parking.

Dr. Ian Twinn (Edmonton): I agree with the suggestion made by my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart), and I add my support to that given by other hon. Friends who represent London boroughs. I have no doubt that the Minister has listened carefully. He and his officials also listened carefully in Committee and gave us some encouragement to believe that the proposals which are all-party proposals, would be seriously considered. We shall look forward to what he has to say.

If the Bill were passed unamended, we should be in the ludicrous position of having traffic wardens to police yellow lines, the police to police moving traffic offences and local authority traffic attendants to look after parking bays. That would increase the cost of regulating traffic and parking in London, which would be foolish. The new clause would overcome that and would provide local control of parking which was sensitive to local needs but still allowed the police to keep traffic moving on our major roads.

Careful thought must be given to what is a major road and to whether, in the future, boroughs should also be allowed to control parking on the principal red routes. In view of the way in which the boroughs operate, it may be worth while for the Government to consider adding powers to the Bill when it goes to another place to enable Ministers to make changes in the future without having to introduce primary legislation.

There is also concern about who should police parking on the pavements in London. Perhaps the Minister could consider that issue as well as the problem of parking on cycleways. As an occasional cyclist, I find that it is a problem when cars are parked there and one has to pull out into the main carriageway. There is some confusion about who should be enforcing the cycleways.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): In principle, many people in London will see merit in the new clause. I may be the only hon. Member present who was not a member of the Committee, so I was not entirely privy to the discussions there.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): That applies to me as well.

Mr. Spearing: Yes, that may be true of other colleagues.

I hope that the hon. Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) will ensure that the proposals are comprehensive and complete when he—or the Minister—replies. In principle, all London boroughs favour the proposal. However, I am not clear about some points, and it may be as well to make clear, in the few columns of Hansard that this short debate will fill, any changes in the responsibility for the funding and running of traffic wardens.

Local authorities deal with meters and with residential parking. I know that traffic wardens are centrally organised, as a sub-organisation, by the Metropolitan police and that the Metropolitan police operate the tow-aways in some areas. That has recently been extended. It would be ridiculous to have a triple-tiered structure. Perhaps we shall hear more about cost, and about the recruitment and running of traffic wardens. Although there would be some merit in the control of and discretion given to traffic wardens being in the hands of the boroughs, the central organisation, making available the training and organising, might not be a Londonwide service under borough control.

The hon. Member for Edmonton (Dr. Twinn) made a suggestion about the control of red routes. I do not want to trespass on further debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I must say that there may be some merit in that. The red routes will be controversial, as are some of the restrictions on the principal roads. Newham way in my constituency is at least a three-lane fast road in each direction. In one place, there is a fourth lane with a single yellow line. There is a doctor's surgery there, and residents have also been in the habit of parking there. They do not cause an obstruction or any change in the flow of traffic, they do not provide a hazard for most of the length, yet they are subject to raids by traffic wardens or by the police. I get letters about that. It is nonsense.

There is one power for operating enforcement and another for the designation of a yellow line, a double yellow line or a red route. We shall discuss the designation of red routes later. Under the new clause, would the responsibility for the designation and distinction between single and double yellow lines be in the hands of the borough or of a wider authority?

Mr. Chope: It is obvious that there is much common sense behind the contributions in this short debate. I pay tribute to my hon. Friends for the constructive way in which they addressed the issues in Committee and for the way in which they have carried forward the debate. As I said in Committee, I have considerable sympathy with the principles underlying the new clause and the associated amendments. I told the Committee that the Government were considering what provisions would be needed to allow for a wider measure of local authority responsibility for enforcing parking controls beyond those already provided for in the Bill. I also said that I had it in mind that local authority parking attendants could be responsible for enforcing almost all parking regulations within particular designated areas within controlled parking zones. I am able to tell the House that we have developed the outline of a suitable scheme and will be bringing forward Government amendments in the other place.

The principles of the scheme are that there will be a further rationalisation of the distinction between illegal or "prohibited" parking controls and "permitted" parking controls and the arrangements for enforcing them. This further rationalisation acknowledges the strategic importance of traffic flow on main roads and the responsibilities of the local authorities to their residents.

The fundamental underlying point is that, in London, the police are responsible for the day-to-day management of traffic flow and have specific responsibilities for security control, emergencies and ceremonial occasions. To fulfil those responsibilities, it is important that they are able to control strategic traffic flows on the main arteries and certain roads serving them. It is, therefore, proposed that illegal parking on and adjacent to those arteries will continue to attract criminal sanctions and will be enforced by the police and their traffic wardens. Off the main arteries, traffic and parking has fewer strategic implications, but raises heightened environmental and residential issues, so it is proposed that most illegal parking in those areas—except for endorsable offences—will be decriminalised and enforced by the local authorities.

It will be for the local authorities to apply to the Secretary of State for Transport to establish "designated" parking areas in their boroughs. In those areas, most non-endorsable illegal parking offences will be decriminalised. The offences to be decriminalised will include waiting, loading, unloading and delivery prohibitions and restrictions, parking controls at bus stops, pavement parking and breaches of the commercial vehicle overnight waiting ban. The new system of penalty charges will be applied to those breaches and they will be enforced by the local authorities, which will have extended powers to wheel-clamp and remove vehicles contravening the new controls.

It will also be for the local authorities to propose the extent of the "designated" parking areas. The areas might begin in controlled parking zones, but they could also cover other areas. The Secretary of State will need to be satisfied with the proposals because there will be traffic and safety implications. He will need to be sure that local authorities are able to take on the new responsibilities and to arrange a smooth transition to avoid any major problems or disruption. He will consult the police about the proposals. When he is satisfied with them, he will make orders bringing the "designated" parking areas into force and subsequently extending them as required. In practice, there will be a link between the introduction of the new system of "permitted" parking and the designation of "designated" parking areas.

Further consideration will be given to the way in which the former illegal parking controls are marked and signed in the "designated" parking areas. For example, yellow lines have a specific force in law under the Traffic Signs Regulations 1981, and it may be necessary for the waiting and loading prohibitions to be marked in a different colour where the offences are decriminalised.

The police will retain overriding powers for use against parked vehicles anywhere in London where security or other policing issues are involved. They will be responsible for enforcing all parking controls on the main arteries other than those associated with "permitted" parking. Contravention of those controls will remain criminal offences. The main arteries will include priority routes and some other roads as well. The precise selection of roads will be a matter for discussion between the local authorities, the police and the Secretary of State.

In "designated" parking areas off the main arteries, the police will continue to enforce endorsable parking offences, such as parking on a pedestrian crossing and dangerous parking, and will retain the power to deal with vehicles causing an obstruction.

The aim of the scheme is to improve the arrangements for enforcing parking controls in London in a way which reflects the prime nature of the controls and the primary traffic interests of the police and the local authorities. I hope that that will satisfy my hon. Friends and, indeed, the whole House to the extent that my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) will feel able to withdraw the new clause, which puts the onus on the police to apply to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I have said that, in the Government's view, the presumption should be that the police would be responsible for enforcement on main routes and that local authorities will be able to apply if they wish to take over the burden of enforcement on the other routes. Our open debate on the issue shows the value of a constructive Committee.

Mr. Spearing: Will the Minister clarify the matters of cost and of traffic wardens? Do I take it that the cost of policing the new local authority-controlled areas will be borne by the local authorities in a manner that they can best achieve? Obviously the cost cannot be met from parking meters. Will the Metropolitan police traffic warden service be confined to the functions of the Metropolitan police, or will that service be made available —with or without a fee—to the local authorities?

Mr. Chope: The cost of enforcing the local authority-controlled areas will be borne by the local authorities. The local authorities have assured us that they can generate sufficient income from the penalties associated with enforcement to cover their costs. The zeal with which local authority parking attendants in Westminster carry out their responsibilities is clear. Westminster has a healthy surplus on its account.

The traffic warden service will continue to be the responsibility of, and funded by, the Metropolitan police. I have heard no suggestion that local authorities want to use traffic wardens on a contractual basis. There is more than enough work for traffic wardens on the main routes under the control of the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Fearn: The new clause is welcome, although I hope that we can have some clarification in another place if the new clause is withdrawn. Although the local authority and the police are involved, will the Secretary of State take the ultimate decision?

Mr. Chope: Yes indeed—my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will take the ultimate decision on applications.

Ms. Ruddock: We tabled amendments in Standing Committee to give boroughs powers to enforce yellow lines. We also tabled a new clause to create permitted parking zones. Therefore, we believe that we have contributed to the constructive discussion to which the Minister has referred.

We referred in Committee to the duplication of powers that would have to exist if the local authorities are to be responsible, as is made possible in the Bill, for the parking bays and meters, but cannot enforce the areas with yellow lines which so frequently occur between those bays.

We also referred to the fact that decriminalisation of certain offences already occurs in the Bill, and we therefore thought that the argument that those yellow lines had to be enforced by the police did not hold up. The Minister said in response to our argument in Committee that enforcement of prohibited parking offences must, as a matter of policy, remain with the police and the traffic warden service. However, he raised our hopes when he said that he would try to find some way to bring forward controlled parking zones and the designation of special parking areas.

We are more than delighted by the fact that the Minister seems to have listened to our pleas. The Association of London Authorities will also be delighted that at last the measure for which it has pressed for so long will, one hopes, find its way on to the statute book.

In Committee we referred to the fact that there are considerable problems of enforcement due primarily to attitudes within the police and to the scarcity of traffic wardens. We recorded that although traffic flows had increased dramatically in the past five years, the traffic warden service had decreased by 15 per cent. We are more than aware that effective enforcement requires transfer to the local authorities, which have such vested interests in enforcement that they will do it well. The Minister said that the authorities would propose the extent of designated areas within the control zones under their influence and I am sure that those designated areas will be extensive.

We agree with the Minister and hope very much that there will be no proposal to reduce the present level of person power within the traffic warden service. We believe that much stricter enforcement is necessary. A reduction in numbers in the traffic warden service would have a deleterious effect on enforcement on the major routes and main arteries.

We are cheered by the fact that the measure will make progress. We support it and we congratulate the Minister on being so co-operative. However, it has been suggested that the yellow lines should adopt another hue—I believe that purple and blue have been suggested. I hope that the Minister will not make up his mind about that. Such a change might appear to be an unnecessary concession to opinions expressed by the police and the idea that they must hold on to control of yellow lines. Perhaps it would be more helpful to maintain yellow lines for all purposes so as to give a clear message to the public that yellow lines mean that they may not park at certain times in particular areas. I urge the Minister not to have a set mind about the colour of those lines under the new arrangements.

Mr. Tracey: My hon. Friend the Minister must surely believe that he has got off to rather a good start in terms of the unanimous approval of the new clause.

Ms. Ruddock: Not for long.

Mr. Tracey: Well, he has it at this stage anyway.

My hon. Friend the Minister has closely met the spirit of the new clause and the associated amendments. We will read my hon. Friend's detailed comments when we receive the Official Report tomorrow. The Association of London Authorities and the London Boroughs Association will also examine his comments closely before the Bill moves to another place. Naturally we want to consider the details that my hon. Friend has given us today and other details that presumably we will be given in another place. Obviously, the details of the amendment to the legislation will have to be scrutinised closely.

I am particularly interested in the definition of a main road or route that will still be controlled by the police and traffic wardens. I will also be interested to examine my hon. Friend the Minister's wording with regard to enforcement in relation to parking on footways. A number of my colleagues and I raised in Committee the serious problem of inadequate enforcement of controls on parking on footways which can be very dangerous. There is an additional anomaly in that, until now, only the police have been able properly to enforce controls on heavy vehicles parked on footways—a practice that is completely unacceptable to all citizens in London.

I will be very interested to learn how far the Government are prepared to develop the idea of orders giving the local London authorities the power to enforce things other than yellow line parking and parking bays. My hon. Friends the Members for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart) and for Battersea (Mr. Bowis), also referred to boroughs enforcing rules on parking on red routes.

We have made considerable progress today towards good reason and common sense prevailing over what was previously apparent bureaucratic intransigence. That spirit has been welcomed by hon. Members of all parties. I give thanks for the co-operation that we and the London authorities have received from officials at the Department of Transport and at the Home Office as this issue also involves the police.

I look forward to the Government's proposals being introduced in another place. In the light of all that we have heard, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the new clause.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 2

RANDOM BREATH TESTING AT ROADSIDE CHECKPOINTS

'In subsection 6 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 there shall be inserted after subsection (2) the following subsections:—

"(2A) The Secretary of State may make provisions, by regulations which shall be subject to approval by each House of Parliament, for roadside checks at which either all vehicles or a sample of vehicles may be stopped by a constable in uniform under section 163 of this Act for the purpose of administering breath tests to their drivers at or near the place where such vehicles are stopped to ascertain whether any offence has been committed under section 4 or 5 of this Act.

(2B) Regulations under subsection (2A) above shall provide for any roadside check under subsection (2A) above to be authorised in writing by a senior police officer and for the display of signs making the purpose of the check clear to road users and for the maintenance of records of the authorisation and of the location, date and time of such checks.

(2C) Regulations under subsection (2A) shall be made by the Secretary of State for the Home Department in relation to England and Wales and by the Secretary of State for Scotland in relation to Scotland.

(2D) The Secretary of State shall consult chief officers of police and other organisations on a Code of Practice for the detailed operation of roadside checks carried out in accordance with the Regulations under subsection (2A)."'.—[Ms. Ruddock.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

5 pm

Ms. Ruddock: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

As hon. Members have said, we began this afternoon's debate in considerable harmony, but I fear that I am about to change the mood somewhat. However, I rise to move the Second Reading of the new clause, conscious of the fact that the majority of hon. Members support its provisions. They and I believe that introducing random breath testing should be one of our highest priorities for road safety in this country. The new clause commands all-party support.

However, sadly for all those who are affected by the actions of drunk drivers, I fear that the new clause may not succeed. I understand that the Government have imposed a three-line Whip despite the strong support for the new clause among their own Back Benchers, and despite the many requests that a free vote should be allowed to enable hon. Members to vote according to their consciences. I can assure the House that a free vote has been granted for Labour Members. We cannot help but suspect that the Government knew that they would be defeated on a free vote.

Tonight, hon. Members could act in concert to introduce a measure that is supported by over 70 per cent. of the population but, because of the Government's intransigence, I suspect that they will be prevented from doing so. I hope that many Conservative Members will feel able to show the Government by their votes tonight that they are not to be bullied into rejecting this important measure.

The list of organisations that support random breath testing is impressively long. It includes not only the Parliamentary Advisory Committee on Transport Safety, to which I pay tribute for its persistent and excellent work in this area, but the British Medical Association, the Consumers Association, the Campaign against Drinking and Driving, Alcohol Concern, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the National Council for Civil Liberties, the Association of Police Surgeons of Great Britain, and the County Road Safety Officers Association, to name but a few.

Public support for random breath testing has been consistently strong.

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): The hon. Lady is making a good and telling point early in the debate. Does she know of any agency that supports the Minister's view?

Ms. Ruddock: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention and confirm what I suspect he thinks—I know of no agency that supports the Government's view——

Mr. Chope: What about the Royal Automobile Club?

Ms. Ruddock: The Minister will have an opportunity to list his own supporters when he makes his speech.

Mr. Chope: Will the hon. Lady confirm that the RAC is in favour of the Government's view on this matter?

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): What about the police?

Ms. Ruddock: I have not received any communication from the RAC to suggest that position. If the Minister has such a testimony, I am sure that he will use it in support of his own case when he makes it.

I repeat that public support for random breath testing has been consistently strong. Over the past three years, seven surveys have shown more than 70 per cent. public support for it, including a survey conducted last November by the Government's own transport and road research laboratory. A survey last March by the Harris research centre showed that drinking and driving is among the top three offences that people felt should be given priority by the police. By contrast, fewer than 50 per cent. of the police who were interviewed thought that it deserved priority attention.

In Committee, when we were discussing a similar amendment, the Minister suggested that random breath testing would involve too much police time and too many resources when the incidence of criminal behaviour in other areas is increasing. However, about 800 deaths a year are caused by drink driving. Surely, that number is serious enough to make this issue a priority for police resources. If those 800 drink-drive deaths were perceived as 800 murders, as they frequently are by the bereaved, surely they would be a police priority.

Mr. Ashton: Does that figure of 800 deaths represent deaths caused by drivers who have been drinking, or drink-related accidents which, in many cases, mean that perfectly sober drivers have knocked down a drunk who was coming out of a pub and who stood in front of their car? There is a difference in those statistics. Will my hon. Friend make the statistics clear?

Ms. Ruddock: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making his point, but I see from frantic signs on the Conservative Front Bench below the Gangway that another hon. Member wishes to enlighten him on that point.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): I do not know whether it will enlighten hon. Members, but a casualty report has shown that, in 1988, there were 840 deaths where the driver or motor cycle rider had an illegal level of alcohol in his blood. The dead drunk pedestrians come on top of that.

Ms. Ruddock: I am grateful for the help that I am being given, but I am under no illusion that that assistance will continue.

Like the whole House, I am deeply concerned by the fact that 800 deaths per year arise from drink-drive offences. The public understand that that should be a major priority for our police forces. I suggest that they will not understand any rejection of these provisions today, especially given the fact that on the last occasion when a similar proposal was tested in the House, on a ten-minute Bill that was presented by my hon. Friend the Member for Worsley (Mr. Lewis), it was supported by 165 votes to 49. Does the House really want to give an entirely contradictory message today?

Mr. Ashton: Yes.

Ms. Ruddock: Returning to the new clause, its purpose is to insert into the Bill a clear and straightforward procedure to enable the police to carry out random breath testing. It would authorise the Secretary of State to make regulations for roadside checks to be carried out by the police at which either all vehicles or a sample may be stopped for the purpose of administering a breath test to the driver. The new clause states that the purpose of the checkpoint must be clearly signposted and authorised in writing by a senior police officer. The proposed subsection (2D) authorises the Secretary of State to issue a code of practice for the operation of the roadside checks.

The Minister suggested in Committee that such provisions would still require the police to suspect that a driver had been drinking before they could breath-test him. I am happy to assure the House that I have taken further expert advice and feel sure that the Minister was mistaken.

Mr. Paul Channon (Southend, West): The hon. Lady mentioned sampling a moment ago. What does she mean by "sampling"? Under her new clause, would the police be entitled to stop all young people, for example, or all women or all men? How does sampling work? I had thought that random breath testing would have to involve everyone.

Ms. Ruddock: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for posing those questions, because we are very clear in our minds about what we mean. I believe that there is a scientific definiton of "random". It has to be proved that it is truly random. Testing can be random if every passing car is stopped for the obvious reason that no-one knows into which category the driver of that vehicle may fall. Testing can also be shown to be random if, for example, every 10th vehicle is stopped because, by the same token, the person stopping that vehicle could not have anticipated whether its driver was young, old, female or black. That is random. That, indeed, is the purpose behind this new clause. We are clear and we have checked extremely carefully with several authorities that our new clause truly offers the opportunity for random, accountable and controlled breath testing.

The case for random testing has been made many times, and undoubtedly it will be made many times again today. I make no apology for repeating some of the arguments. It is true that there has already been a gradual reduction in the number of accidents resulting from drinking and driving. That can be attributed to several factors, including publicity campaigns and changing the public's perception. But we cannot afford to be complacent about our rate of progress. Research suggests that one in 50 drivers at any one time is over the prescribed limit.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Is not that one in 50 at pub closing time on Thursday, Friday and Saturday night, not at any one time?

Ms. Ruddock: I shall look into that. I have taken on trust the information that I have been given. [Interruption.] If hon. Members will allow me, the information comes from an expert source. I have no reason to question it. If the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) is certain of his facts, I am prepared to accept that. It does not alter in any significant way the case that I make. It is obvious that a substantial number of people in Britain are prepared to say when questioned that they have driven when they believed that they were over the limit.

Mr. Bowis: Does the hon. Lady agree that, where recent campaigns against drinking and driving have been successful, it appears that it was because the public perception that there was already a degree of random testing? When I talk to my local police they say, not that they do not want to enforce the law against drinking and driving but that they already have adequate laws to enforce. Will the hon. Lady explain what is lacking in the law that persuades her that we need to strengthen it through the measure that she proposes?

Ms. Ruddock: I am happy to do that. I shall come to those arguments in a moment. The hon. Gentleman suggests that the public perceive that there is already a degree of random testing. He will also acknowledge that the public have become aware through reports that such testing is carried out by certain police forces but that in other areas it does not happen. Therefore, if there is any deterrent value in random testing, as I believe that there is, it is not available uniformly, even through the present system. As I shall explain in a moment, the present system is not the same as random breath testing, as proposed in the new clause.

Mr. Andrew Bowden (Brighton, Kemptown): I have great sympathy with the idea of random breath testing, not least because anything that can be done to stop drinking and driving must be done. But the hon. Lady implied in her answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) that she would want directly to interfere with the operational decisions of individual police forces by compelling them to operate random breath testing on the basis that she suggests. My police force in Sussex has advised me that it has all the powers that it needs in practice to stop motorists whenever it wishes.

5.15 pm

Ms. Ruddock: If the measure became law, it would be apparent to police forces everywhere that the procedure was better in that it was clearer. It provides one power that could be used to establish random breath testing whereas at present, as I have promised to describe, the police rely on two powers and seek to combine them to create a type of random testing which we believe is inadequate.

We do not suggest that police throughout the country will have to undertake testing. We seek to provide powers for them to do so. We believe that there is such tremendous public support for the measure that police forces will wish uniformly to use the new powers made available by the House.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): There is public support for hanging, but we do not have hanging.

Ms. Ruddock: Let me continue with my argument. We are talking about what we believe are the preventable deaths of up to 800 people per year. The hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Allason) does himself and the House no favours by bringing hanging into the debate.

Lest hon. Members fail to keep figures in their minds, let me repeat that about 800 deaths and up to 22,000 injuries per annum are caused by drinking and driving.

Mr. Ashton: How many deaths occur on the roads which are not drink-related?

Ms. Ruddock: My hon. Friend asks a fair question. There are about 5,000 deaths in road accidents per year in Britain. That figure is far too high, and the deaths occur through a variety of causes. However, I remind my hon. Friend that a single cause accounts for 800 deaths and 22,000 accidents resulting in casualties. That is the subject of our debate tonight. I believe that the House treats the subject with great seriousness and that, if there is anything that we can do to reduce the figure by 15 per cent., 5 per cent. or even 0·5 per cent. we should carefully consider it.

Sir Ian Lloyd (Havant): I have been following the hon. Lady with great care and great interest. She used the words, "if there is anything that we can do" and "if there is something that we can do". I have argued on the Floor of the House on many occasions that modern technology provides a complete solution to drinking and driving. There is something and there is anything. If the Government so chose, every motor vehicle could be required by law to be equipped with a device which made it impossible to drive it if the driver was over the prescribed limit, whatever that might be.

Does the Labour party support that? If so, we are at one in our objective and at one on the method. New clause 2 takes an entirely vindictive approach, but we should seek a solution. The solution is available. There is a variety of methods. The technology is available. If, as my new clause suggests, we encouraged the public to be fully aware of whether they were near the limit, drinking and driving would be reduced. Experience in Australia shows that the massive reductions achieved were largely attributable to that approach.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. One intervention at a time, please.

Ms. Ruddock: I fear that I am in great danger of being distracted from my speech, but I am willing to give way to the Father of the House.

Sir B. Braine: Is there not a device for overcoming the dreadful problem of deaths and injuries on the roads which is much simpler than that suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Sir I. Lloyd), whose knowledge of modern technology no one would dispute? The solution is that people must be deterred to the point where it becomes the natural thing not to get into a car when one has been drinking. Either one does not drink or one does not drive.

Ms. Ruddock: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Havant (Sir I. Lloyd) and the right hon. Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) for their interventions. I assume that they will seek to catch your eye later in the debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker. They will make their own speeches which, of course, will contribute greatly to our discussions.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): They should vote in the Lobby with us.

Ms. Ruddock: Indeed, as my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) says, hopefully they will vote in the Lobby with us tonight.

We need to do more work to reduce the level of deaths and injuries caused by drinking and driving. Those of us who are in favour of random breath testing believe that efforts must be directed at changing the perception of drivers of the risk of being caught. In Britain that perception is still low; 42 per cent. of drivers admitting to drink-driving believe that the risk of getting caught is small. Clearly, we need to increase the deterrent as well as continue to detect offenders.

Countries which have introduced random breath testing believe that it has been successful in heightening drivers' perception of the risk of being caught, and that it has made a major contribution to reducing the number of deaths and accidents on the road. I acknowledge that overseas comparisons are difficult because of different systems, legal alcohol limits and procedures. Nevertheless, experience in New South Wales, which still has a higher accident rate due to drink-driving that we do, and in Sweden and Finland, which have lower rates at 7 per cent. and 11 per cent. respectively of all deaths, shows that random breath testing works.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The last time I looked at the Swedish figures, they were counting only the accidents on which they had done an analysis; they estimated that there were twice as many as those whom they caught. Therefore, the Swedish figure may be the same as that for Britain. That needs checking, but that is my research.

My question may be technical. Over the years, we have had estimates of the number of lives that would be saved if we had random breath testing or what is proposed in the new clause, which is not what the Association of Chief Police Officers wants. Has the hon. Lady any estimate of how many lives might be saved if we introduced the new clause, gave unfettered discretion or introduced the mass random testing which they have in New South Wales?

Mr. Spearing: Fewer deaths.

Ms. Ruddock: I am grateful for the assistance of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr.

[Ms. Ruddock]

Spearing). If the public perceive the provision as a considerable deterrent, and if people are prepared to admit that they are drinking and driving because they feel that they will get away with it and not be detected, we have every reason in logic and in our knowledge of human behaviour to expect that they are more likely to curb their habit if they think that they are likely to be detected in a criminal offence. That being the case, we believe that there would be a fall in the number of accidents associated with drink driving if the provision were introduced.

Before I began this part of my speech, I acknowledged that it was difficult to make international comparisons, but we know from the subjective evidence, at least of those which have brought in such measures, that a fall in deaths and casualties due to drink driving has resulted from their introduction. That is good enough for me, and I believe that it is good enough for the majority of hon. Members. The research which would follow the introduction of the measure would show whether our case was proved. There is no evidence in this country—and there cannot be until the provision is introduced—but there is every reason in logic to believe that it would be effective. That is what the public at large—the people who would be affected—themselves believe.

I cannot give figures, but let me put it on record that I believe there would be a reduction in road deaths. That is what matters—that there should be a reduction of any kind and at any level, because any life saved as a consequence of new legislation is a life worth saving.

In Britain the current procedures are cumbersome and inefficient. When we discussed the matter in Committee, the provision was thought by the Minister to involve too much police time and resources. Chief police officers, who seek a form of randomised testing, have to use two procedures. That cannot in itself be helpful to their administration. It is not true to suggest that the police already have the power for random breath testing. Only by the use of two existing powers can the police do anything that corresponds to random testing. The police have the power to stop any vehicle at random. Under section 6 of the Road Traffic Act 1988, a constable may administer a breath test only if there is reasonable cause for suspicion that alcohol has been consumed.

We are seeking to give the police new powers to complement the existing powers. We are not seeking to remove any powers. The police could still stop any vehicle and, having stopped that vehicle, conduct a test if they had reasonable grounds for suspicion. In addition, the new clause would enable them to establish roadside check-points where they could administer truly random breath tests.

We must ensure that breath testing is conducted on a truly random basis to avoid any potential problems of the infringement of civil liberties.

Mr. Ashton: In 1986, Nottinghamshire police, who at Christmas have always breathalysed four or five times more drivers than police in any other county, got to the stage where they were breathalysing people who were queueing for petrol. The police were stopping long queues of cars at the side of the road to do, they said, checks on windscreen wipers, and then they breathalysed the drivers. There were strong rumours that policemen had been told that they had a quota of 35 breathalyser tests a day. At the end of that tremendous purge in 1986, they did not catch any more motorists than they had ever done.

Ms. Ruddock: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention, because it absolutely proves my case. My hon. Friend has given an example of an area which, in his view, was over-zealous in trying to introduce random testing. He acknowledges that it caused consternation among the public because the police were stopping people on one pretext, when he suggests that they were endeavouring to test them for drink-driving. It is clear to me that, because of what he says rather than in spite of it, we need the new clause.

We must ensure that breath testing is conducted on a truly random basis to avoid potential problems of the infringement of civil liberties or of any one group being singled out for testing. We do not support giving the police unfettered powers such as they have requested. Such discretion might lead to abuse or might be perceived to be discriminatory, thus undermining relations between police and public. Roadside checks are a guarantee of objectivity.

If my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) is disappointed that there was no detection of drink-driving as a result of a roadside check such as he described, that is not necessarily a problem to us. We are concerned about providing a deterrent. If the majority of people going through a roadside check are found on random breath testing not to be over the limit, it suggests to us that the deterrent of random breath testing is working.

Mr. Tracey: May I raise with the hon. Lady a question which I asked in Committee and which presumably she may now be able to answer? In order to carry out what she is suggesting, on behalf of the Labour party, how many extra tests and how many extra police officers or other officers of enforcement would be required, and what would be the cost of that operation? The House and the country should know those facts.

Ms. Ruddock: The hon. Gentleman knows that, neither in Committee nor here, have I had the resources to prepare the answer to that question. If the authorities decided to adopt the proposal, they would have the ability to make the appropriate resources available. I have said repeatedly that the provision is not designed dramatically to increase detection rates but dramatically to increase deterrence.

Sir Bernard Braine rose——

Ms. Ruddock: I will not give way to the right hon. Gentleman, having already delayed the House for a considerable time, and I am nearing the end of my remarks.

I am convinced that it is such a worthy proposal—I repeat, we are talking of the loss of 800 lives a year—that it would be appropriate to allocate the resources necessary to introduce the new deterrent element in an effort to persuade people to change habits that are still causing a significant loss of life through drink driving.

If the Government defeat the new clause and continue to set their face against what is clearly a majority view in the country, their road safety campaign will lose much of its force. We believe that random breath testing should be introduced without delay. In any event, we make the commitment to introduce it as a priority when we are in government, if the present Government fail to introduce it.

Sir Bernard Braine: The hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) has an engaging manner, and in her closing words she came to the heart of the matter. On one side of the balance sheet is the question whether there is a case for a further deterrent. On the other side are 800 lives, fewer than the number killed some years ago, but still a considerable number.

I begin where the hon. Lady finished. I firmly believe that the new clause would greatly strengthen the capacity of part I of the Bill to deal with the still serious problem of drinking and driving and would thereby help to achieve the objective—with which I hope Members in all parts of the House agree—of reducing the toll of deaths and injuries on our roads.

The debate about random breath testing has gone on for many years. During that time, the figures have fluctuated, but more and more people, including children, have been killed and injured on our roads for various reasons, but one cause has clearly been the behaviour of drunken and irresponsible drivers. I guarantee that there is not a Member in the House who has not in the last year had an example—perhaps two or three—in his constituency of a child being killed wantonly by somebody out of control of the machine he was driving because he was under the influence of drink. I wonder how many Members have escaped the procession of relatives coming to one's constituency office asking for something to be done about this scandalous state of affairs.

As the hon. Member for Deptford said, the overwhelming majority of road safety organisations and the British public support the purpose of the new clause, and they, like many hon. Members, have become impatient with the Government's obdurate refusal to take the necessary action.

The arguments for random breath testing are well known, and I need not repeat them at length today. I shall make three points that go to the heart of the matter. The first concerns the confused and unsatisfactory nature of the existing law. Ministers often claim that random breath testing is unnecessary, because the police already have power to stop drivers at random, including stopping them at roadside check points and breath testing those whom they suspect of having imbibed alcohol. Basically, that means the police officer engaging the driver in conversation so that he can form an opinion about whether he may have been drinking. This elaborate rigmarole takes time and is more likely to irritate the driver than the blow-and-go procedure of random testing proper.

The whole argument about random stopping seems odd for Ministers to employ, because it surrenders the main point at issue, which is the appropriateness and desirability of roadside checkpoints, the sole purpose of which is the breath-testing of motorists. The perversity of the existing law, and of Minister's arguments, is precisely that these concede the principle of random breath testing, but then allow it to be carried out only in a cumbersome and unsatisfactory way which is less effective than random breath testing proper and is more likely to alienate the travelling public.

That factor may help to explain why—as the House knows, I have had some connection for many years with senior police officers—some chief constables seem reluctant to use these powers. Moreover, what I would describe as this poor man's version of random breath testing is made possible only by the use of two different sections of the Road Traffic Act, the combined use of which has never been explicitly affirmed or approved by the House. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler), who has had considerable experience of transport and road safety matters, said on Second Reading, this kind of equivocation is simply not good enough. As he said, if we want random tests, there should be clear provision for them in legislation, and that should be clear to the police and the public.

I shall not delay the House, because many hon. Members wish to speak. My second point concerns what appears to be one of the principal, though one of the silliest, arguments against random breath testing employed by its opponents. We have been told many times that random breath testing would not work because the number of over-the-limit drivers detected at roadside checkpoints would be so low that, to achieve the present level of convictions, the police would have to carry out millions of tests, which would represent a clear waste of resources. That argument was used by my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley), in an article entitled "Why random testing won't work", in the Evening Standard of 30 June 1988.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It appeared only in the racing edition. It was subsequently thrown out in favour of an article to save Elstree.

Sir Bernard Braine: Does my hon. Friend accept the statement made in the article:

"With 300,000 tests a year, random breath testing might catch between 1,500 and 9,000 over-the-limit offenders. That figure compares badly with the 120,000 convictions secured by the police using their existing powers"?

Mr. Bottomley: If the article said that, it contained a misprint. In simple terms, to catch as many people by random breath testing against target testing, there would have to be as many tests in a week as there are now in a year.

Sir Bernard Braine: As we know, the figures have declined, partly as a result of campaigns that some of us have waged over the years about irresponsible drinking, in regard not only to driving but to everything else. One can make two statements, the first being that alcohol taken in moderation is a pleasant adjunct to living, makes for conviviality and friendliness, encourages conversation and so on. The second is that alcohol taken to excess shortens life, undermines health, is a potent cause of marital break-up, non-accidental injury to children, road deaths and injuries, and is found in practically every category of violent crime. If there has been an improvement in recent years it has been largely due to the campaign that some of us have waged to try to change public attitudes to drink. I am still engaged in that campaign.

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): I am almost the Father of the House, and I take my hat off to the right hon. Gentleman for his lifelong campaign on this matter. However, I think he got hold of the wrong end of the stick when he alluded to alcohol making people feel pleasant. Alcoholics suffer from a major disease, and some such people fall to the floor and break limbs. That is not too pleasant.

Sir Bernard Braine: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. He and I have been friends for many years. However, people who drive a motor car or any vehicle should not drink. The new clause seeks to increase the power of deterrence and to make people think twice or even three times before getting into a vehicle when they are under the influence of liquor.

The argument against the new clause is absurd, because it is based entirely on the bogus assumption that random breath-testing checkpoints would replace existing police activities rather than being an additional power used precisely for its deterrent effect. The hon. Member for Deptford spoke about that. Of course only a small proportion of drivers who are tested at roadside checkpoints are over the limit. Checkpoints are designed to be deterrents to drinking and driving, and if they did catch a large number of drinking drivers that would indicate not success but failure.

Thirdly, some hon. Members have spoken about the cost of random breath testing. In Committee, my hon. Friend the Minister for Roads and Traffic estimated that the police costs of carrying out random breath testing would be about £12 million per annum. He added:

"In essence, that would be money invested in abortive work because it would not result in more people being charged with drink-driving offences."—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 22 January 1991; c. 167.]

Once again, the argument is confused. Despite the objective of deterrence, the failure of random breath testing in the Minister's eyes seems to be that it does not catch enough offenders. If my hon. Friend is to be consistent, he must presumably regard random breath testing as a failure, even in New South Wales. I understand that people in Australia have a great propensity to consume alcohol. Perhaps it is due to the climate.

The Federal Office of Road Safety reported in 1989, and stated:

"Following the introduction of random breath testing there was . . . a sharp fall of about 30 per cent. from 1982 to 1983 in the number of proven drink driving offences, suggesting that ther may have been a very real drop in the incidence of drink driving."

My hon. Friend the Minister has his own view, but I think that most of us would welcome a reduction in the incidence of drinking and driving as a sign of success rather than failure. We would also welcome economic savings commensurate with those produced by random breath testing in New South Wales.

The same report also stated:

"Federal Office of Road Safety data suggest an estimated net economic saving to the community of $169 million over the first three years of the operation of random breath testing in New South Wales."

I am not suggesting that it is possible to make simple comparisons between one country and another, and the hon. Member for Deptford did not fall into that trap either. We cannot expect savings directly proportional to those enjoyed by New South Wales. However, the Minister should not estimate the cost of random breath testing in this country without taking into account the likely economic benefits, because experience elsewhere suggests that one of the main advantages of random breath testing is precisely its cost-effectiveness. Even if it were to transpire that random breath testing costs us some money, it would still be worth the price. Indeed, what price should be placed on a human life wantonly destroyed by a drunken driver?

5.45 pm

Sir Ian Lloyd: My right hon. Friend speaks about price and mentions New South Wales. He will have seen most of the reports and figures that I have. Does he agree that the most significant cost saving occurred where self-breathalysers were introduced to all the service messes? In that case, the reduction, which may have been coupled with random breath testing outside, was about 80 per cent. A large percentage of that figure was considered to be due entirely to the fact that giving people the opportunity to find out whether they would be dangerous on the road in itself made a large contribution to the results.

Sir Bernard Braine: I always listen to my hon. Friend with the greatest attention, because he is careful about the facts that he adduces. He seeks to reinforce my argument. Any device or propaganda or legislation which increases deterrence and makes it less likely that somebody will get into a car and behave in a way that will destroy life or injure somebody must be right.

The intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Sir I. Lloyd) during the speech of the hon. Member for Deptford is worthy of study, although I do not think that the hon. Lady took up his suggestion. It is not the first time that my hon. Friend has imparted wisdom to the House, and I hope that everyone will listen to him more carefully in future. The first person to whom he should talk is the Minister.

Like other hon. Members, I have received a letter from a Mr. John Knight, co-founder of the Campaign Against Drinking and Driving. He enclosed photographs of some of the innocent victims of drinking drivers, and I wish that every hon. Member could see those photographs before entering the Division Lobby tonight. Some of them depict the happy, bright-eyed faces of young children who are full of the joy of life, a life that was shortly to be extinguished by an accident that could have been prevented, at a cost, we are told, of a mere £12 million a year.

For those children it will be too late, but it is not too late for the House to take a step that would save many other lives. The great majority of our constituents—perhaps I should say the great majority of our constituents, because I cannot speak for other hon. Members—wish us to take that step. I hope that the Government will look carefully at the arguments and let those of us who have a conscience on this matter vote freely.

Mr. Ashton: Unfortunately, all too often in debates such as this we hear arguments from hon. Members who are not so much against drink-driving as against drink. Hon. Members who feel that way should be honest and say so. There is nothing wrong with people saying that they are against drink or that they are abstainers who believe that drink should be abolished. If people did that, at least we would know where we stand. I am against smoking and I am a member of the Committee examining the Children and Young Persons (Protection from Tobacco) Bill. I do not try to stop people smoking cigarettes. I use statistics in my arguments, and they show that 100,000 people die every year from smoking. Perhaps 1 per cent. of them die from secondary inhalation. That is 1,000 people—more than the 800 we are debating—but I am not aware of any big campaign against it.

I do not propose to blind the House with statistics, but I should like to examine some of the facts and figures.

Ms. Ruddock: I hope that my hon. Friend is not implying that those of us who are so enthusiastically moving the new clause—this is certainly true in my case—are abstainers or would seek to ban all alcohol or dissuade people in a general sense from taking alcohol with it is safe to do so. It would also be wrong to imply that I am not concerned about the hazards of smoking and that we have not done our best to campaign against that as well.

Mr. Ashton: That is not the case that I am making. I was trying to weigh one campaign against another.

Last week, the EC reported on the annual cost of road accidents. It said:

"The UK death rate from road accidents is just under half the EC average."

It is about time that we started giving drivers some credit for the fact that, year after year, our roads become safer and safer. If my hon. Friend were to compare the number of vehicles on the roads in the 1960s and the number of deaths from drinking compared with the situation now, she would see that the percentage rate has declined. Nobody gives drivers the credit for that. I accept that too many are still killed, but the numbers are declining all the time. The system is working.

Ms. Ruddock: If my hon. Friend had been present for any of the road safety debates in the House he would have heard Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen acknowledge on every occasion the great efforts and achievements of the Government in reducing the number of deaths and injuries due to road accidents. Nevertheless, 5,000 deaths are not acceptable.

Mr. Ashton: We might have one of the best accident rates in Europe, but we have the second worst accident rate when it comes to children on their way to school. Why do we not have a campaign to stop people killing children going to school? Hardly any of those drivers have been drinking. [Interruption.] That is a valid point. All these arguments are often put together by people who are against drink, full stop.

The greatest number of deaths from drink-driving occur not at Christmas but in May when the nights become lighter and people start driving into the countryside. But it is always at Christmas that the Government announce big expensive campaigns with television advertisements and the police go on to the streets with their breathalysers. Such campaigns often have the wrong emphasis.

My part of the world has experienced exactly the type of system that my hon. Friend wants to introduce. I am a member of the Select Committee on Home Affairs. Britain has 43 different police forces and the chief constable of each is a law unto himself. He decides, often on a whim or a fancy, what sort of breathalyser campaign he will launch.

For five years, Nottinghamshire had a chief constable—he has now passed on and I shall not denigrate him in any way—who was vehemently against drink in any way, shape or form. Those five Christmases were a nightmare. On one side of the River Trent, about 200 people would be breathalysed; on the other side of the River Trent, 200 yards away, 4,000 would be breathalysed. In the other direction, in Derbyshire, about 200 were breathalysed, while in Nottinghamshire there were 4,000. That created an atmosphere which almost killed off Christmas for many people. In places such as Worksop in my area, nothing moved—people were frightened to go to parties, dances would be half empty and the pubs and Christmas entertainments lost thousands because of the police campaign. In the end, the campaign proved nothing.

The police were stopping traffic to test windscreen wipers or lights. People were stopped on their way home from work at 4 o'clock in the afternoon. God knows what it cost in police manpower. Many of the drivers were very annoyed. They had not had a drink, they were being delayed on their way home from work and in the end the campaign produced next to nothing.

Sir Ian Lloyd: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that if someone is stopped for a windscreen wiper check but has not been involved in a moving traffic accident and does not give obvious signs of drinking, the police are acting illegally in asking such persons to take a random breath test?

Mr. Ashton: The hon. Gentleman is right, but who will challenge the police? What brave man or woman in the street will refuse to take a breath test and be prepared to go to court? It does not work that way. Most people just blow in the bag to get it over with and obey what they think is the law.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I may eventually come to the same conclusion as the hon. Gentleman, but on this point I think that he is wrong. It is not the public perception of testing that matters. The person who never drinks and drives looks on himself as a potential innocent victim; the person who does some drinking says, "Thank heavens I wasn't above the limit"; and the person above the limit is caught bang to rights. That is not the objection. The objection is whether it will do much good.

Mr. Ashton: The hon. Gentleman can make his case when he makes his own speech.

I represent a rural area. Many of my hon. Friends on the Front Bench represent cities. Labour Members tend to represent city constituencies. My constituents cannot get a bus down to the pub, and there is no tube, as there is in Deptford.

Ms. Ruddock: There is no tube in Deptford.

Mr. Ashton: There is public transport in London. If I lived in London, I would not even have a car—it would be a waste of money—but in rural areas people cannot work without a car. They cannot get their kids to school or go shopping—they cannot do anything without a car. Without a car, the quality of life is vastly different.

If one of my constituents went to the village pub in his car and had a couple of pints, the only thing that he might knock down would be a rabbit. The roads are deserted in rural areas. People do not speed down to the pub for a couple of pints on Saturday night. It does not happen. My hon. Friend is trying to make one law which will apply throughout the country and it will not work. Closing hours are not as rigid in rural areas as they tend to be in cities. There is a much more relaxed attitude. It is a different life.

Mr. Andrew Bowden: I have listened with interest to the hon. Gentleman, but he is going over the top. He is not treating the matter as seriously as he should. He is virtually saying that his constituents in Bassetlaw are exceptional and should be excluded from drink-driving laws. It is crazy to say that they should have a special dispensation.

Mr. Ashton: The hon. Gentleman has not been listening. There are 43 different police forces, representing a wide range of areas—from inner cities with high crime rates to rural areas where there is little crime. To say that this is the law for 43 different police forces to administer as they like will result in the shambles that we have seen in Nottinghamshire.

Dr. Godman: I have been here since the start of the debate. Debates such as this, and drink-driving legislation passed by the House, may well be upstaged and overruled by the EC. Is it not the case that at this moment the European Commission is anxious to bring about a dramatic reduction in the permissible level of alcohol in a drivers' bloodstream?

Mr. Ashton: I did not mention the European Community, so I do not know how the hon. Gentleman's intervention is applicable. I mentioned our rate of accidents and said that we have half the number of deaths that they have in Europe, but I shall let that pass.

To return to my argument, my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) said that random breath testing is Labour party policy. I do not remember that being debated at any of our conferences. I do not remember anyone, anywhere, saying anything of the sort. The Labour party prides itself on its grass-roots democracy. Resolutions come from the constituencies, from the ordinary rank and file members who pay their £10 a year, make the policies and send resolutions to Blackpool or Brighton where we have a long debate about them. I have never read one line of debate about random breath testing in Tribune or anywhere else.

Ms. Ruddock: It is in that document there.

Mr. Ashton: I have no doubt that my hon. Friend may have a fat document on transport in which she has smuggled something through on the bottom of page 419, chapter 21, without anyone knowing about it, and she is now saying that it is Labour policy.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): The hon. Member—I shall not call him my hon. Friend—has taken as long on this argument as on everything else that he has mentioned in his speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member should not turn his back on the Chair.

Mr. Prescott: You need not look so serious about it, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is not such a major crime.

At the party conference, we debated a document entitled "Moving into the Nineties", which made policy absolutely clear. After major discussions in the movement, after resolutions, discussion at the executive council and at the conference—whether the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) chose to debate it at the conference is a matter for him—the whole document passed through the democratic process through which Labour party policy has to pass. Therefore, I am entitled to say that he should withdraw his remark because there was debate, the policy was clearly defined and was a matter for amendment and discussion in the executive council, which came to the view that we are putting forward today.

Mr. Ashton: If the hon. Member can show me the report of the Labour party conference at which it was debated in Brighton, Blackpool or wherever—I have been to every conference for the past 28 years—I shall certainly withdraw my remark.

Mr. Allason: I do not wish to intrude into other people's grief, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but is it appropriate for the Labour party to discuss what is or is not party policy when we are supposed to be discussing the Bill?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) will keep a little closer to the amendments and the new clause.

Mr. Ashton: I pursued that argument because my hon. Friends the Members for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) and for Deptford, have been saying what they would do if we were in power. So far as I am concerned this matter has not been debated at our conferences and my hon. Friends the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East has not taken up my offer to show me the report of the Labour party conference where it was debated.

Mr. Prescott: Where the document was debated?

Mr. Ashton: No, where the policy was debated.

Mr. Prescott: If you did not raise it, you twit, it may not have been debated.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): Is it in order for the hon. Gentleman to call his hon. Friend a "twit"?

Mr. Ashton: The trouble with my hon. Friend is that when he loses in debate he loses his temper.

I shall move on to my next argument. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East will listen to me, as I have been in the House longer than he has and I can tell him what happened. There was a by-election in Leicester when Barbara Castle was Secretary of State for Transport—she could not even drive, but we made her Secretary of State. She introduced the breathalyser and Labour lost a safe seat at the by-election because of it. The former Labour Chief Whip, Mr. Bert Bowden, whom you may remember, Mr. Deputy Speaker, fought that by-election and lost the seat for Labour. He retired, went to the Lords and became chairman of the Independent Broadcasting Association. The Tories went around every working men's club and miners' institute in Leicester before the by-election—they would do it again now—to tell them that the breathalyser was to be introduced. It cost us hundreds of votes. There was no question about it.

The same is true in many of our constituencies today. We represent miners' institutes in rural areas and areas where there has been a lot of slum clearance, where working mens' clubs are trying to hang on. [Interruption.] I wish that my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East would listen instead of rabbiting all the time.

Mr. Prescott: I am trying to counteract some of the reactionary elements in the hon. Member's argument.

Mr. Ashton: I am not reactionary—I am speaking for the working-class Labour voter.

Mr. Spearing: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Ashton: No.

Mr. Spearing: I speak for those voters, too.

Mr. Ashton: I have given way about 15 times and I am trying to make a speech.

Many working men's clubs are hanging on by a thread because the houses around them have been pulled down, and because members are getting older and dying off. This is true of any large city. It must be the same in Hull as it is in Sheffield, where there used to be 65 working men's clubs but the number is now down to about 30. It is probably the same in Doncaster, which you represent, Mr. Deputy Speaker. What is killing them off most is fear—people are afraid of going out at night and of taking the wife out on a Friday or Saturday and getting breathalysed. Members of working men's clubs will tell hon. Members that. Why do members not bother to come? Why can they not even get enough people for a game of bingo? Club members do not want to get breathalysed; they would sooner buy a six-pack, sit at home and watch television.

Mr. Spearing: I understand many of my hon. Friend's arguments, but in his catalogue of what may be justifiable crimes, is he telling the House that we should not be worried if people drive around having had not just two pints but sufficient alcohol to be above the limit? If my hon. Friend analyses what he has been saying—apart from some of the justifiable criticisms that he has made—he will surely realise that he has not tackled the proposals made in the new clause.

Mr. Ashton: Yes, I have. I am trying to get across the message that every person and every area is different.

Mr. Spearing: Even if they are over the limit?

Mr. Ashton: Let me finish putting my case.

Everyone I know who drinks and drives occasionally is in favour of tougher sentences for drunk-driving. They think that a drunken driver who kills someone should go to prison for 10 or 15 years. Everyone I know who is against random testing is in favour of tougher sentences. To say that because one likes a drink one is in favour of drunken driving is like saying that because one likes sex one is in favour of rape. It is not true. It is nonsense.

It is not true to say that, because people like to drink a pint of beer and then drive home from the pub, they are in favour of killing people on the roads or that they support drunken drivers who are a menace to society. However, they object strenuously to people who do not drink but who assume that because they would feel woozy and unfit to drive a car after one pint of beer everyone else is the same. People who do not drink make far too many generalisations, and assume that, because drink has a powerful effect upon them, the bloke sitting next to them who has drunk a pint is not fit to drive either. That is not true.

Mr. Spearing: I cannot have expressed myself sufficiently clearly. My hon. Friend may be justified in making some of those remarks, but is he saying that a person who agrees with the legal limit—I think that we all do, even those who drink two pints and then drive home—thinks that people who go above that limit should not be subject to some sort of check? He must realise that someone who has had more than the legal limit is a dangerous driver—whether that limit is too high or too low is another argument.

Mr. Ashton: The average person would accept it if the existing check prevailed. If someone drives a car which is swerving or if there appears to be something wrong with the car or the way it is being driven, it is perfectly acceptable for the police to stop them. No one is arguing about that. The average bloke, who might drink one pint and then drive home, is saying that it is monstrous if testing becomes a lottery, depending on where one lives, the time of day and whether one takes a chance and has a pint. That is too much of a lottery.

As always, the King Herod principle is in operation—because a handful of football hooligans cause a riot at Tottenham, away supporters are banned from every ground in the country, or because there is a problem with Leeds football supporters, one does not let them go to Hull. That is not what policing and justice are all about. Justice is about punishing criminals.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): Is not the crux of the hon. Gentleman's argument simply the fact that the random breath test will not work? Is it not a fact that the police do not want to be pinned down at a road block, stopping motorists and breathalysing people who have probably not been drinking, while all manner of mayhem is going on just around the corner? They would much sooner go out on patrol to do the job that they have been trained to do.

Mr. Ashton: The hon. Member is absolutely right. There will be a lottery, depending on where one lives. In Nottinghamshire, they are red hot on breathalysers. In Derbyshire, they are red hot on speeding. If you happen to live in Sheffield, then for God's sake don't park on a yellow line. Every police force has its foibles and whims. The public know that if they do certain things in certain areas they will get the chop.

Mr. Spearing: That is a criticism of the police.

Mr. Ashton: Yes, it is. Let me tell my hon. Friend, however, that elected councillors have no say in these matters. I would not mind if it was the county councillors who told the chief constable, "We want you to crack down," but it is not—the chief constable himself decides. It is for him to say, "This is operational—you cannot tell me that I can or cannot implement it."

The public have no way of protesting democratically. If they think that the chief constable is being too tough with the breathalysers, there is not a damn thing that they can do. They cannot vote against it; they cannot complain about it; they cannot raise it in the House by putting down a question asking the Secretary of State for Transport to go and see the chief constable. We have been through this before, although when the issue last came before the House—two years ago—it was not even raised during a transport debate; it was raised during discussion of the Criminal Justice Bill, and it was beaten then, but now it is trying to surface again.

Although I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Deptford that the number who are killed by drunken drivers—800 out of 5,000—is far too high, she gave us no figures to show how many people are killed, for instance, by lorries on the motorway which are carrying too much weight and cannot brake in time, or by fog, or by speeding. All those are killers, and all need seeing to, but we never debate them or vote on them. This is the campaign that has been adopted, perhaps because it is considered a vote winner, with the result that a section of the motoring public are continually driving in fear.

If the new clause is passed, many towns and villages will find that Saturday nights become drastically and traumatically different. Social life will be affected, and employment will suddenly vanish for those who rely on catering and the pubs and clubs for their living—waitresses, for instance, and other working-class people who may have part-time Saturday night pub jobs.

Mr. Stephen Day (Cheadle): I do not wish to be unfair to the hon. Gentleman, so I am giving him an opportunity to clarify his position. He seems to be trying to excuse drink-driving.

Mr. Ashton: I am putting a case for the status quo. The present system is working—the number of drink-related deaths is falling every year. The hon. Gentleman may think that, if drink had been abolished, those 800 lives could have been saved, but 400 of them would probably have been lost in other circumstances. Accidents happen.

Random breath testing would have a major impact on Nottinghamshire life at Christmas. The average person wants tougher penalties to be imposed on those who cause accidents when they have been drinking and driving. The other day, someone who had killed a young man did not even lose his licence; he was simply fined £250. A famous television star was involved—I mention no names, but hon. Members will know who I mean. That caused tremendous anger—understandably so—but no drink was involved. There are massive inconsistencies in the penalties handed out by the courts. The alternative is mandatory confiscation for 12 months for those 2 per cent. in excess of the breathalyser limit.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Unless speeches are briefer and interventions fewer, we shall be here until very late.

Mr. Channon: Let me bring the debate back to the point at which the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) said that we must address the matter very seriously. It is indeed a serious issue, and I congratulate her on bringing it to the attention of the House.

The debate has shown that views differ strongly across the parties. The feeling of the House is not monolithic; many Conservative Members agree with the new clause, and I suspect that some Opposition Members apart from the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) oppose it. Surely we can all agree, however—indeed, the hon. Member for Bassetlaw just said as much—that we want a continual reduction in drink-driving.

Admittedly, the figures have fallen substantially. I believe that they have halved over the past 12 or 13 years, from about 1,790 to about 840. That is a great success, but it is not good enough. My right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) and others are quite right to say that we should do all that we can to reduce the number who are killed or maimed in accidents caused by drink—or, indeed, by any other factor. The question that the House must decide is whether random breath tests will achieve the desired effect, and I do not think they will.

I readily concede that many people outside, and masses of well-meaning organisations of high calibre, think that random testing is the answer, and those who argue against it may sometimes feel that they are in the minority. Nevertheless, I strongly disagree. Unlike the hon. Member for Bassetlaw, I do not think that it will make an enormous difference, nor do I think that the way in which the House decides tonight will have the dramatic effect anticipated by either the hon. Gentleman—as an extreme opponent of the new clause—or its extreme proponents. As we have been told time and again, the police already have the necessary powers.

Mr. Day: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Channon: This is the one and only time that I shall do so. I am sure that hon. Members want me to get on with my speech.

Mr. Day: Again, I seek clarification. My right hon. Friend has referred to extremist viewpoints; will he identify those viewpoints in the well respected organisations that have supported the measure?

Mr. Channon: I am not trying to criticise any organisation. I am merely saying that there are those who are enthusiastically in favour of the new clause, and those who are enthusiastically against it; and that, whatever the outcome, they will find that it does not make as much difference as they feared or hoped.

The present law has been cited several times. My hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Mr. Bowden) has explained what goes on in Sussex; as we all know, in effect, random testing already exists. I have read the persuasive speech made in Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart), who rightly said that the police already have the requisite powers. Over the years, there have been many instances of police forces stopping people in such circumstances.

The powers already exist; do we need to increase them? There may be a case for clarifying the law, but I think that it is already fairly clear. It has been explained again many times this evening: it is well understood that the police have the power to stop drivers and, if they have reasonable cause to believe that they have been drinking, to apply the breathalyser. Well, once he has stopped someone, it is not very difficult for a constable to decide that he has reasonable cause: he may not like the way in which the driver answers him, or the driver's breath may smell of drink.

What is the attitude of the police to the proposals? Some years ago, when my hon. Friend the Minister and I dealt with the issue, the police were altogether against random breath tests, but they changed their minds with remarkable speed over 24 hours: having been violently anti, they became violently pro. They have now made it clear, however, that they are not in favour of the random roadside checks recommended by the hon. Member for Deptford. The want unfettered discretion: they want to be able to stop any driver, regardless of whether he has committed an offence. I wonder how much they will use the measure if it is enacted. I have read an article in which the chief constable of Warwickshire, who I believe was president of the Association of Chief Police Officers and who is very concerned about the matter, explains that the police want unfettered discretion rather than what the Government propose.

The new clause will force drivers to pass through a check; the police will stop every car, or one in 10—as suggested by the hon. Member for Deptford—or one in five, or one in 20. I do not think that that will add much to the number of people who are caught. According to a parliamentary answer given the other day to my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley), some 100,000 tests would have to be carried out to establish that 1,000 extra drivers were over the limit.

There are many other better ways of using police resources to prevent drink-driving, and that is my point. If the police want to increase their efforts in that regard, as they clearly did in Nottinghamshire—and I certainly would not oppose such a move—they can target tests and are much more likely to get convictions than under a system of random breath testing. What the police want is either to have unfettered discretion or to target people—to say that all young people, for example, must go through the checks. That is what some Opposition Members and the National Council for Civil Liberties and others find objectionable; they think that young people or people in their thirties are most likely to fail the breath test.

Even the most jaundiced observer must agree that this country's record of road accidents is better than that achieved elsewhere in the Community. No wonder the European Commissioner is worried about traffic accidents. Elsewhere in the Community, the record is very bad; Britain's is much better. That is not to say that we should be complacent. We should try to find ways of reducing the number of accidents still further. We have had campaigns to protect children—I have been involved in them myself—and on other important issues.

What is the best way forward? The efforts made over the years by successive Ministers at the Department of Transport to increase publicity and deal with the treatment of offenders and the whole question of breath tests—I pay tribute in particular to my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham, who did much during his period of office to increase public awareness of the issues—have ensured that the public are now much more aware of the risks of drink-driving, and people feel far more strongly about the subject than they did five years ago.

Would random breath testing change the situation? The police already have powers, and they do not want the powers that the hon. Member for Deptford would thrust upon them. Moreover, if the police increased their efforts in a more targeted way, they would be more likely to be effective and to catch drunken drivers, which is our whole purpose. I shall be voting against the new clause, and I hope that a great many hon. Members will join me.

Mr. Fearn: I added my name to the new clause because, in Committee, I was adamant that something needed to be done to restrict drink-driving. We need a deterrent. We have all met the person who thinks that accidents never happen to him or who believes that he will be all right because he knows—or thinks that he knows—his limit and feels that his ability will not be impaired. We have all met people who think that they will never be caught; there are many of them.

As we have already heard, a recent survey by the transport and road research laboratory showed that 42 per cent. of those who admitted to drinking and driving did not think that there was any great chance of detection under existing practice. Until drivers are convinced that there is a good chance that they will be stopped, tested and charged, drink-driving will continue to cause death and destruction on our roads.

Before I deal with civil liberties—the subject on which I wish to concentrate today—I must express my disappointment that, on a matter such as this, Conservative Members are not to be allowed a free vote. I do not understand why. Clearly there are many arguments for and against the new clause, and hon. Members ought to be able to express their views and beliefs through a free vote. The Liberal Democrats are to have that opportunity. It was evident from the vote on the Road Traffic (Random Breath Testing) Bill 1987, introduced by the hon. Member for Worsley (Mr. Lewis) and sponsored by myself and others, that, given the opportunity, hon. Members would overwhelmingly support the new clause. I am sorry that they are not to have that opportunity.

We have heard the cry that random breath testing will infringe a person's civil liberties. That may be true, but the claim can be refuted. As I have pointed out both in the House and in Committee, anybody who gets behind the wheel of a car while under the influence of alcohol automatically and immediately infringes the liberty of others. Random breath testing will protect the liberties of the majority of road users.

The roadside checks that the new clause advocates will be conducted in controlled conditions, with authorisation in writing from senior police officers. In some respects, such checks would represent less of an infringement of individual liberty than the present system, because all drivers would be treated equally. At the moment, individual police officers or traffic patrols can pull a car over when they want to test for drink-driving or when they suspect that the driver may have been drinking, if the car has any defects, no matter how minor—it could be inadequate lighting over the licence plate. They have discretion at that level to make a random breath test.

That has often led to the accusations that the police target certain individuals, especially the young. The statistics tend to back that up, although surveys show that those most likely to be guilty of drink driving are in the older age groups. Unnecessary ill feeling and friction often arise as a result of present practice. That would not happen if motorists knew that any driver was likely to be pulled over and we have heard how, in New South Wales, random roadside testing is believed to have improved public relations between motorists and the police.

As I said, I do not want the discretionary powers of the police to be reduced, but I believe that they would become less necessary if we introduced roadside checks. Such checks would certainly be less of an infringement of people's civil liberties than certain measures advocated by the anti-random breath testing lobby. I refer in particular to the measure in early-day motion 495, which suggests that one method to be used as a deterrent should be "inquiry by police and courts as to the drinking locations and companions of the illegal driver".

Surely such measures would lead to greater infringement of the liberties of innocent persons. I do not think that the clientele of public houses, wine bars, or other drinking establishments would greatly appreciate the courts or the police making inquiries into how they spent their leisure time.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: If the hon. Gentleman and I were drinking and I knew that he would be driving afterwards, I would say to him, "You should not be taking alcohol." My right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) would also insist on that. If people continue to believe that they have no responsibility for those with whom they are drinking, and if those with whom they are drinking then kill someone, it is perfectly reasonable for the police and the courts to make inquiries.

Mr. Fearn: I wish that everyone were like the hon. Gentleman and me. Perhaps he and I would do and say that, but not everybody would, and irresponsible people do go out and kill people—we know that the figure is at least 800.

Random breath testing is supported by many organisations, including the NCC and the Consumers Association. Some 3,000 of the 3,400 responses to the Home Office consultation paper on changes to breath testing legislation favoured additional powers for the police. Surveys conducted on behalf of the Consumers Association and others show that the public at large would support more random breath testing and are willing to surrender part of their individual liberty in the interests of the liberty of the majority.

The House is representative of the people. It has the power to do something on their behalf. I hope that, in the interests of preventing the carnage on our roads, hon. Members will break ranks tonight and support the new clause, which is a most worthy proposal.

6.30 pm

Mr. Day: Before coming to the points that I want to make in support of the new clause, I should like to thank the Minister for his forebearance in the meeting that he had this morning with my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) and myself. We are very grateful to him for listening to our views.

I wish to make it clear that, in my remarks on the new clause, I speak not just as an individual but in my capacity as co-chairman of the Parliamentary Advisory Council for Transport Safety. Also in that capacity, I wish to put on record the disappointment of the council that our amendments on retesting for alcohol-related offences—amendments that had all-party sponsorship—were not called. We feel that those are central to the potential of the Bill. Indeed, they reflect a major part of the recommendations of the North report.

The case for introducing random breath testing in the United Kingdom can be summarised by reference to three pieces of Government research—one Australian, and two British. First, research conducted by the transport and road research laboratory found that a large proportion of drivers in the United Kingdom who admit to drinking and driving believe that the chances of their being caught are small. This perception is confirmed by information on the actual risk of detection from the British crime survey, which suggests that the chances are as little as one in 200 excess-alcohol driving trips.

Secondly—this has been referred to already—research conducted by the Government of New South Wales shows that highly visible mass random breath testing, targeted at times when drinking and driving is most prevalent, increases the driver's perception of the chances of his being caught, thus deterring potential offenders and reducing the number of road accidents.

Thirdly, there is evidence that United Kingdom drivers surveyed by the transport and road research laboratory believe that routine random breath testing would provide an effective acceptable way of reducing the number of road accidents. Indeed, the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Joan Ruddock) presented all the arguments supporting the case for random breath testing.

I propose to deal with some of the arguments that have been advanced against its introduction, none of which I find particularly convincing. I was surprised by the recent motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley), which suggests that the available evidence does not support the belief that mass random breath testing would be helpful. A number of countries have introduced the measure, but I shall restrict my remarks to the evidence from New South Wales, as the experience there has been rigorously monitored, and there is much information on the effects.

Random breath testing was introduced in New South Wales in December 1982 as a three-year experiment. The overall objective was to create a very high perceived risk of being randomly breath tested if one continued to drink and drive. The figures that I am about to quote may be found in a paper entitled "An Overview of the Random Breath Testing Trial in New South Wales", which was produced by three members of the New South Wales traffic authority. I commend that paper to my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham in particular.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Does my hon. Friend have a copy?

Mr. Day: I shall show my hon. Friend a copy afterwards.

Part of the monitoring exercise of the trial to which this document refers was to look at the effect of the measure on accidents and casualties. It was found that, as a direct result of random breath testing, the average yearly reduction in the number of all fatal crashes was 21 per cent. The average yearly reduction in the number of crashes involving injury of all levels of severity in which the driver or rider was over the legal limit—in the case of New South Wales, 50 mg per 100 ml—was more than 35 per cent. Public support for the measure rose from 64 per cent. before random breath testing to 85 per cent. afterwards. Social security savings amounted to 20 times the cost of implementing the measure. So convincing were the results that the measure was placed permanently on the New South Wales statute book. Michael Knight MP, the then chairman of the parliamentary committee charged with assessing the affects of the measure, concluded:

"Random breath testing has been the single most effective tool in the struggle to reduce the road toll in the history of New South Wales."

Therefore, it is simply not the case that the call for random breath testing cannot be supported by good evidence. Evidence from Sweden shows that random testing works not only in countries that have higher levels of drinking and driving than does the United Kingdom, but in countries where the levels are much lower.

It is important to point out that simple comparisons, between international rates of progress in this field can be misleading. I am sorry that they have been used as an argument against random breath testing. The argument runs that as the United Kingdom has reduced drink driving faster than most other countries, why should the existing policy be changed? That question has been asked in the House today. It is a welcome fact that we have made good progress during the last 10 years, having reduced the rate of over-the-limit deaths from one in three to one in five. This has come about as a result of a number of factors: changes in the 1981 Act providing for evidential equipment; increases in breath testing; and increased social pressure as a result of Government publicity campaigns and the efforts of the campaign against drinking and driving.

However, if we stick to simple comparisons, we shall not do as well as we could. Sweden, for example, could be said to be doing better, having got the rate of over-the-limit deaths down to one in 14. But in reality, these figures do not mean very much. We have to remember that different legal limits, mixes of traffic, climate and road conditions all confound meaningful and scientific comparison between international rates of progress in this area. We heard this type of argument during the debate on the legislation making the wearing of seat belts compulsory for front-seat passengers, when crude number-crunching exercises were advanced to suggest that seat belts did not appear to save lives, because savings did not show up easily in some national data. It is fortunate that those negative arguments did not hold sway.

I have the greatest respect for my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Eltham. Indeed, I think that he was one of the best Transport Ministers we have ever had—especially in road safety. I am particularly surprised at his attitude in advancing this sort of argument. I find it difficult to square his present stance with the stance that he took when he was responsible for roads and traffic. In answer to a parliamentary question on 4 April 1989, he advised against drawing simple international comparisons of this kind. He

"Simple comparisons and statistics may be misleading; for instance, the legal limit for blood alcohol content in New South Wales is 50 mg/ml, and in this country it is 80 mg/ml." —[Official Report, 4 April 1989; Vol. 150, c. 18.]

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I hope that I shall get an opportunity later to speak in my own right, but I should like to put this matter in context now. As I understand the situation, the difference between the figures produced by the 50 mg level and the 80 mg level is probably two percentage points. My understanding is that the figure for dead drivers above the legal limit in New South Wales is 33 per cent., and that in this country it is 19 per cent. If the two percentage points were added, the figure for dead drivers above the legal limit in this country would be 21 per cent. There does seem to be an unexplained difference. Perhaps New South Wales would gain by copying us.

Mr. Day: I readily acknowledge my hon. Friend's great understanding of these matters, but the assumption at the end of his intervention did not necessarily correspond with the facts that he had put forward. However, I take note of what he said.

I wish to return to the suggestion that sufficient breath testing is being done at present and that, somehow, conducting random breath testing would be going over the top. According to the last set of annual figures for England and Wales, only one in 50 drivers was breath-tested annually. That means that, on average, drivers are breath-tested only once in their driving career. That is hardly excessive or overbearing. The figures provided to the Parliamentary Advisory Council for Transport Safety by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary suggest that the average number of breath tests per traffic officer is only one per week. Again, I do not feel that that is in any way excessive. Even the most enthusiastic random breath testing policy, which aims at the testing of one in two drivers annually, would result in every driver being breath-tested only once in two years. In my view, that is hardly excessive.

I emphasise that this new clause does not seek to give the police unfettered discretion to stop motorists and breath-test them. Despite the explanation by the hon. Member for Deptford, the intention seems to have been misunderstood as being to increase the rate of detection. In fact, it is to increase the level of deterrence. We do not want to detect drunken drivers; we do not want to have drunken drivers on the road at all. That is what the new clause is all about.

I do not accept that because the police can act to stop motorists under two separate sections of the Road Traffic Act 1988, they necessarily have sufficient powers. That legislation has led to great confusion, particularly regarding interpretation. The chances of detection range between one in 250 journeys in some parts of the country, and one in 4,000 in others. Such a lottery can hardly be fair.

The extra power in the new clause would clarify the position for drivers and, more importantly, for chief constables. As I said on Second Reading, I have heard Ministers say that the police already have adequate powers to act and that no further measures are necessary. That implies that the Government accept the principle of random breath testing—we are arguing only about the practice—so why cannot they accept the new clause?

I would welcome an explanation of how the Government hope to achieve casualty reduction figures while rejecting the major contribution that the new clause would make towards achieving those figures. Will my hon. Friend the Minister explain how he hopes to convince the 42 per cent. who admit to drink driving yet believe that they will get away with it, to change their ways, if the Government are not prepared to take further action. There is a danger that the public will believe that the Government find that 42 per cent. acceptable.

As for civil liberties, I am sure that no hon. Member would agree that people have the right to take whatever action they wish, irrespective of the consequences for others. We all broadly accept that responsibilities go with rights, and we must therefore also accept that drink drivers are, tragically, often guilty of that.

I remind the House that drink driving-related accidents account for 800 deaths and 22,000 casualties a year. Furthermore, half of the victims will not have been drinking and driving.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): While my hon. Friend is on that subject, does he agree that a possible alternative way to deal with the problem is to ensure that every driver who is caught driving over the prescribed limit is charged with reckless driving? Such a charge could be made on the basis that, in this day and age, to get into the driver's seat knowing that one is over the limit is a reckless act. It therefore follows that if, as a consequence of drinking and driving, they cause death, they should be tried for causing death by reckless driving.

6.45 pm

Mr. Day: My hon. Friend's remarks are worth considering. Although penalties are important, they are not the main factor. Deterrence is the most important factor, so, to some extent, penalties apply, but the greatest deterrent is to know that one has a chance of being caught. The new clause is important, because it will increase the public's perception of the possibility of being caught.

A significant number of my hon. Friends have asked whether we could have a free vote on the new clause, and I register my disappointment that that has not happened. The Government could have paid no greater or more eloquent testimony to the arguments of the Parliamentary Advisory Council for Transport Safety than to apply a three-line Whip. The measure should have been dealt with in the same way as the seat belt legislation and left to the individual conscience and intelligence of hon. Members. Many hon. Members, whatever their views on the matter, would have wanted that.

I hope that hon. Members, whatever they feel about the issue, will consider the matter in depth. They must all agree that lives are important and that drinking and driving is silly and wrong. Notwithstanding the three-line Whip, I hope that they will join me in the Lobby in support of the new clause.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): I shall be brief, particularly as so many of the arguments have already been put most volubly by other hon. Members.

When I added my name to the new clause, I did not expect the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) to call me a killjoy, especially as I represent no fewer than 43 distilleries on Speyside, and have a strong interest in the future of the whisky industry. I emphasise to the hon. Gentleman that, although I have that interest at heart, I also recognise the importance of the new clause. He may care to reflect on that fact that people who now visit distilleries on Speyside as part of a tourist visit, instead of being offered a dram of whisky at the end of the visit, are now offered a miniature to drink when they get home. That shows the responsible attitude that the distilleries have adopted to the problem of alcohol abuse.

Like the hon. Member for Bassetlaw, I represent a substantial rural constituency, but I cannot accept his argument that the introduction of random breath tests will result in many restaurants, bars and clubs closing down because people will be frightened to move.

In my constituency, especially on Friday and Saturday nights, most of the vehicles going to social gatherings are taxis. Taxi drivers have benefited from the introduction of the breathalyser test. My constituents must cover vast distances but they join together to share taxis in order to avoid drinking and driving. Alternatively, one person in a group exercises self-discipline and says, "I am driving so I shall not drink, and that is the end of it." I have sat through many a party into the wee hours of the morning, nursing a tonic or a soda water. I wish that all drivers would exercise the same self-discipline.

Also in my constituency, I have the chairman of an organisation known as SCID—the Scottish Campaign against Irresponsible Drivers. That organisation would agree with many of the arguments about sentencing policy and about the need to look at other aspects of road safety —for example, how many years' driving experience people should have before they sit beside a learner driver, and other aspects that it considers part and package of its campaign against irresponsible driving. However, it has also consistently emphasised the need for random breath testing. It sent to me, and presumably to many other hon. Members, case histories of the families of victims, where young people had been killed by drink-drivers. They show the sheer psychological torture through which those families go as a result of such bereavement. One cannot help but be touched by those stories.

The House has a responsibility to those families who have been deprived of one of their loved ones in such a way and should back a campaign that is worthy of support and has clear public demand. We also have a responsibility to remind drivers what they stand to lose if they are convicted of drink-driving. They will suffer the humiliation of being found out. Many of them will lose not only their licences but their jobs. Their loss can bring family tensions, and their recklessness can destroy the innocent lives of their own families. I am making a plea for drivers to exercise greater self-discipline and to remember what they may lose.

The hon. Member for Havant (Sir I. Lloyd) mentioned self-test kits. Just before Christmas, there was a possibility that such kits might be introduced in Scotland. The idea was rejected by representatives of the Scottish Office, so it was not encouraged. It seems possible that putting self-test kits in any establishment where alcohol is served might encourage people to drink up to the maximum legal level, rather than discourage them from drinking at all.

I would prefer it to be an offence to drink any alcohol when one takes a car on the road. A car is the most lethal weapon that any of us are likely to own in our lifetime. To take alcohol while driving that lethal weapon seems to be the height of irresponsibility, and I shall not encourage the use of self-test kits. I listened to the intervention of the hon. Member for Havant with care, but was not persuaded that encouraging people to drink up to the legal limit was the best way forward.

Sir Ian Lloyd: I have carefully studied the issue, and I know that, where such instruments have been generally and widely available, there is no evidence that they encourage people to drink up to the legal limit. The obverse is true—the lower the limit, the greater the obligation on those who may take a drink or half a drink and then drive, to find out specifically, before taking the risk, whether they are in a position to drive.

Mrs. Ewing: While I accept that point, I believe that various tests have shown that different kits give different readings. If they are to be introduced, they will have to be critically monitored to ensure that they are effective. I am not yet convinced that they are that efficient. We must try to become a society in which people do not drink and drive at all—we should legislate for that, as many other European countries do.

Many hon. Members who are opposed to the new clause have argued that it will not resolve the problem, because there is no guarantee that we will catch additional drink-drivers. The purpose of the new clause is not to catch drink-drivers, but to deter them. If an individual feels that the police are able to use random breath testing, that will act as a deterrent. If we keep off the road just one more possible drink-driver who is likely to cause an accident, the new clause will have the potential to save lives and avoid injury. The purpose of the new clause is to act as a deterrent—surely we should support that.

Sir Philip Goodhart: The hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) made a powerful speech, with almost every word of which I agree.

I do not think that any of us would dispute the fact that drink driving is a serious social and human problem. Since the breathalyser was first introduced 25 years ago, at the end of the 1960s, more than 25,000 people have been killed by drink-driving on this country's roads. In a quarter of a century, the number of humans we have wiped out is equivalent to the entire expeditionary force in the Persian Gulf.

The position is improving. During the past 10 years, the number of people killed and injured by drink-drivers on our roads has decreased by 50 per cent. There are a number of reasons for that, including a changed perception within society. The fundamental reason why the number of deaths and injuries on our roads has dropped so sharply is that the number of breath tests during the past 10 years has trebled—three times more breath tests were given in 1990 than in 1980. The public's perception that the police now put far more effort into carrying out breath tests has led to that quite dramatic reduction in the number of deaths and injuries.

There are more breath tests than there were, because the police take a much broader view of their powers to stop drivers. During the past few years, we in this country have developed a system of de facto random testing. There is random stopping, which almost invariably leads to testing. The police have introduced a system which is, in effect, random testing, but the House has not yet given them the powers to implement it.

We tell the police to stop people randomly, but we hesitate to give them the powers for random testing. It is interesting that so few people want to abolish the power of random stopping. Even the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton), who made a powerful speech against the new clause, does not want to abolish that power. He said that he was in favour of the status quo, but he did not say that he wanted to go back on the status quo and abolish the right of random stopping. Even he is happy with that power as it exists.

If there were an amendment giving the police what they want—unfettered powers to stop and test—I would vote in favour of it, but there is no such amendment. Instead, we are discussing the much more limited new clause, which was moved so well by the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock). I am prepared to vote for it because I believe that it will increase the deterrent power, which is all-important.

In Committee, my hon. Friend the Minister for Roads and Traffic said that our acceptance of the new clause and its implementation by this country's police forces would cost an additional £12 million a year, which is a lot of money. However, the 800 deaths a year caused by drink-driving also cost society a great deal. If increased deterrence leads to a further reduction in such deaths of 10 per cent. a year, and we save an additional 80 lives a year at a cost of £12 million, that money will be well spent. I intend to support the new clause this evening.

Dr. Godman: I promise to be brief. My speech will not be as learned as some that we have heard this evening, and I intend to offer no comparative evidence in support of the new clause.

I have been astonished by the level of knowledge of the traffic laws of other countries shown by some hon. Members. It seems that many hon. Members have visited New South Wales, Sweden and other places. The hon. Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) is but one of the hon. Members who used comparative evidence extensively in his support of the new clause. The hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) seems to be a brilliant expert in the methodology of statistical analysis. I shall skip that approach.

I think that the hon. Member for Cheadle said that drink-driving is silly behaviour. He seems to be nodding, but I am sure he would agree, on reflection, that drink-driving is dangerously irresponsible behaviour, whether the driver has drunk one pint—to quote my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton)—or four or five pints, or two or three glasses of the best Chardonnay. To drink and to drive is to commit an irresponsible act.

Mr. Day: If the hon. Gentleman checks the record, he will find that I added something to that statement which is more in tune with what he is saying.

Dr. Godman: I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman intervened.

The new clause would act as a pretty powerful deterrent, and that is how we should regard it. The police forces involved would need a code of practice, as the new clause states, which would emphasise the need for civility, courtesy and firmness when checking people. The number of people who are killed and maimed because others commit the dangerously irresponsible act of getting behind the wheel of a car after having drunk alcohol should persuade hon. Members to ignore the Whips and to support the new clause.

I wish to make one criticism of the irresponsible behaviour of courts in Scotland. I say "irresponsible" because some of our sheriffs impose appallingly slight sentences on people who have been convicted of drink-related offences. When a driver's skills have been impaired by drink to such an extent that he or she causes an accident or hurts someone, he or she should receive condign punishment when convicted in a court of law. Too many sheriffs have let people off with trivial sentences.

If the new clause is to act as a deterrent, people who are convicted of such offences should be punished, and punished severely. I look forward to the day when the European Community, by way of a qualified majority vote, introduces to the 12 nations a drastically reduced permissible level of drink for drivers. When that issue was raised in the Council of Transport Ministers, it just failed to get the qualified vote. I look forward to that vote being reversed.

As the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) said, people should not drink before getting into a car. That is why I disagree profoundly with my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw. There should be no question of having a pint and then getting into a car. If one is driving, one should not drink at all. That is the message that the House should send out, whatever happens to the new clause.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I agree. It is important that people get the message that they should either drive or drink, but not both. The choice is the bottle or the throttle —"If you have the wagon, stay on the wagon." People should get together with their friends and appoint a driver.

I disagree with the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) on one point. Cutting out drink-driving—rather than reducing it to the legal limit—is not against the interests of the country pub. Anyone who thinks that it is should get in touch with Ron Jones who used to be the president of the National Licensed Victuallers Association and is landlord of the Friar Tuck and of the Little John, in Hatfield Woodhouse, nine miles east of Doncaster. He is a Yorkshire publican who will confirm that, if a pub does its job correctly and provides an attractive range of non-alcoholic and low-alcohol drinks, and if people either walk to the pub—one advantage of having a local—or allow one person to drive others, the pub's takings will increase because three people will not each feel guilty about their car or motor bike in the pub car park.

There are three problems with which we must deal—apathy, ignorance and stupidity. I usually tackle the problem of apathy by quoting the first paragraph of an article written by Auberon Waugh in The Spectator on 15 February 1986. It was the first article that affected me when I went to the Department of Transport as one of the predecessors of my hon. Friend the Minister. It is well worth reading for those who have not yet done so. It appears in most road safety debates.

However, I prefer today to read from a booklet produced by MADD, Mothers Against Drunk Driving, which is an American organisation. The booklet is called "Will It Always Feel This Way?" The first page is entitled "What it feels like now". It states:

"Right now, if you are like most people responding to the killing of their child, you are experiencing pain.

The pain can feel as though it is in one special place—your head or chest. Or it can feel as though it has taken over your whole body. Or it may just be pain, not settled anywhere.

The pain can be so intense that it is almost intolerable.

You feel driven to do something, even while knowing there is nothing that can be done.

It is hard to concentrate, easy to become distracted. You may start an activity, forget what you were about to do, start again.

If you are thinking about the child killed, however, you don't become distracted. Then you are focused. You may have the feeling of still being able to do something for the child. You may feel this way even if in the back of your mind you know that it isn't so.

You may feel filled with anger. You are likely to be angry at the drunken individual who was truly responsible for the killing; but you may also be angry at members of the legal system or the hospital staff. You may be angry at anyone who doesn't understand.

Your anger can be directed against yourself for not having done something that would have prevented what happened —no matter how illogical this is."

It continues. No one should doubt that we have a serious responsibility in terms of legislative powers, as do the police and everyone involved—the driver, the passenger, the host, the drinking location, the breweries, the Scotch Whisky Association, and others.

We all have a responsibility to cut out the remaining 840 deaths a year, but I suspect that the figure is probably down to about 650. There were 840 deaths in 1988. Each year we have, on average, cut the deaths from drink-driving by 100. We have halved the number of those deaths in the past 10 years. Sadly, that cannot be claimed by other countries.

We have talked about New South Wales, and I congratulate it on its achievements between 1982 and 1984. I do not have the information necessary to allow me to congratulate it on its achievements since then, but there is no doubt that it cut its drink-driving deaths between 1982 and 1984. It introduced mass random breath testing.

If we introduced testing to that extent, we should have as many tests each week as we currently have each year. There would be 25 million tests a year instead of approximately 500,000 a year. Every statistic may not be right. Some refer to England and Wales, some to Great Britain and some to the United Kingdom, but the rough figure is that there would be 25 million tests a year instead of 500,000. That would not do a great deal to increase detection.

I disagree with the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) on one point—deterrence must be built on the experience of detection. People would believe that they were being deterred only for about six months if there were not increasing detection.

In 1967, when the breathalyser was introduced, for a few months, nobody took alcohol and drove. People then discovered that they did not get caught every time, so they slipped. There was a momentary boost to life—a momentary reduction in drink-driving casualties.

I came to the subject in 1986, although I had the normal interest of a Member of Parliament before that, as has my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine), the Father of the House, with whose speech I basically agreed.

In 1986, at the Department of Transport, I rediscovered the transport and road research laboratory. An inter departmental committee also recommended that we should move money from the publicity budget to research.

I discovered that the probable reason why our road deaths in this country have improved so much faster than those in other countries and the reason why our road deaths are at half the level of the Community average—and dramatically lower than those above the Community average—is that, almost always, what we did was based on fact or on a disprovable hypothesis.

I recommend those who are some years out of university, of college, or of the Workers Educational Association, to go back to Karl Popper's book about the open society and its enemies. It helps to find a disprovable hypothesis.

From 1984 to 1989, for which we have the most reliable and easily available figures, we achieved more than any other country that I have yet been able to discover in the reduction of drink-driving fatalities. Let us all remember that the only aim is to save lives. We sometimes become carried away about saving lives. At the age of 80 or 90, I do not want heroic efforts to be made to give me an extra six months. If there was a way to cut out drink-driving among the young, many parents would avoid the misery to which the booklet by the Mothers Against Drunk Driving was directed.

In a wide alliance, which I helped to construct, we built on the work of those before 1986 to continue the reduction in drink-driving. If people refer to page 25 of the article by Derek Jones in "The Casualty Report—Road Accidents, Great Britain 1989", which was published in October 1990, they will see table 2J, which shows the transformation in drinking and driving by younger people.

The number of young men who normally drank beer in pubs or clubs was reduced by two thirds if one judges by the proportion of those who died who were above the legal limit. That does not solve all the problems. Auberon

Waugh is right to say that more people die in sober accidents than in alcohol-related accidents, but the alcohol adds to the risk.

Let us consider whether what we have been doing has worked. People kept referring to the comparison with New South Wales. In 1984, 33 per cent. of dead drivers in New South Wales were above the legal limit. In 1989, 33 per cent. of dead drivers in New South Wales were above the legal limit. There were fluctuations in between, but over that five years, the figures did not improve. Anyone who comes to the House and who uses that as an argument to switch away from what we do to what the authorities do in New South Wales will be killing people.

I want to postpone my remarks about the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), who has a responsibility to share. I hope that he will return to the Chamber, because I do not want to refer to him without his being present.

In this country, we have cut the figure from 28 per cent. of our dead drivers being above the legal limit in 1984 to 19 per cent. in 1989—and the figure may be lower now. I do not think that there has been a dramatic continuation of the trend in 1990 or this year. The reason is that received opinion is suffering from a fashionable fallacy—that random breath testing, if introduced in this country, would make a significant difference to saving lives. There is no reason to believe that. If 40 per cent. of dead drivers were above the legal limit, there might be a difference. It would probably bring the reduction that my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) mentioned. However, our figure is less than half of 40 per cent. What are people doing if they do not read the information?

I should love to support random breath testing. If I thought that it would save a significant number of lives or if, on balance, it would save lives more effectively than the alternative approach has saved, I should support it, even if there was a three-line Whip.

However, I ask all those who have any doubts to vote against the new clause because, if it were introduced now, it would have the same effect as it would have had if it had been introduced two, four or six years ago. It would cause people to chase a system that does not have persistent results.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) was right to say that there are three ways to cut casualties. First, every host, whether in a pub, at a party or in a family home, should have an attractive range of alcohol-free drinks available on display—people should not have to ask for them—and the host should expect people to take them. The County Surveyors Society was the first group in Great Britain—except perhaps for a temperance party—to put on the menu card, "Your hosts have provided alcohol-free drinks on each table and they encourage drivers to take them." In Northern Ireland, the vintners—the Northern Irish term for victuallers or publicans—at their first annual banquet, were the second group of people to do that. I do not see that happen at dinners of medical societies, at police dinners or at parliamentary dinners, although it is the host's responsibility to make risk-free drink available to drivers.

If we could have swapped half the random breath testing for the three points mentioned by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow, we should have had fewer drink-drive deaths this week. Instead of 21 people in the United Kingdom dying through drink-driving, the figure might have been down to 15. One cannot always lead the media and one certainly cannot lead some of the leaders in the media to realise these points. I must make passing reference to Adam Raphael's succession of articles in the Observer over the past four years in which he has never given any of these facts.

The second point is that the passenger who includes their own driver in a round of alcoholic drinks is something that none of us would tolerate for an airline pilot, a train driver or a member of a crew of a ferry.

I have an image—perhaps a false image—of a 2CV with a hairy man with earrings sitting in the passenger seat. He goes into the pub and comes out, having bought a drink for the woman who is driving. They have a sign on the back saying "Nuclear power, no thanks", as though the risk of a scrap of radioactive dust resting on their noses for a second was in some way more dangerous than sinking a half pint or a pint or two in the pub and then going driving. Passengers, especially if they are over 18, are consenting adults in those circumstances. They are not totally innocent victims. Every passenger should pre-plan to be driven by an alcohol-free driver.

The third point concerns the drivers themselves. No driver should wait until half way through a party or a pub session before deciding how he is to get home or what he is drinking. We should encourage drivers to pre-plan.

Random breath testing will not help with any of those points. It is another part of the game of cops and robbers with the police. We do not want people to come anywhere near the legal limit and then to say that they are all right if they are below the level at which they can be arrested and convicted virtually automatically. We want less offending and less drink-driving.

It is fashionable to support random breath testing. When James Dunbar, the police surgeon from Tayside, first discovered what had been happening in Sweden and in New South Wales in 1985-86, he did a service to the country. He started to show that one could cut drink-driving pretty dramatically. His work was shown to various people, including myself. I went to New South Wales to check the figures, although I did not go to Sweden. I kept ringing up Sweden and asking people there to provide the information.

The time series was not easily available. There were two or three sessions of years for which James Dunbar had information. He may have had the information for Finland. However, the time series for each country is not easily available. If it is, I should love it to be sent to me.

The National Audit Office, in one of its most shoddy pieces of work—report No. 517 in 1988—began to talk about random breath testing. Its job is to examine Government Departments, not to interfere in ministerial decisions. The decision whether to have random breath testing is clearly a decision for Parliament and likely to be based on a ministerial recommendation to Parliament.

The National Audit Office also has a responsibility to consider the effectiveness, efficiency and economic operation of Departments. Irrespective of those three Es, in the 15 months before the National Audit Office reported we were dramatically successful at a lower cost to the taxpayer. In the 15 months before the Select Committee on Transport examined the permanent secretary at the Department of Transport, the number of drink-driving offences committed by young men under 30, appeared from surveys to have fallen from 2 million occasions a week to 600,000. That was a reduction of two thirds in the incidence of that criminal and lethal activity.

That approach has clearly saved lives, reduced crime and has not relied on a police officer behind every lamp post. One would have expected the National Audit Office therefore to extend that principle into other areas of crime reduction where silly lives are not lost.

Sir Philip Goodhart: Does my hon. Friend accept that, during that period when there was a substantial improvement, there was an enormous increase in random stopping? Random stopping by the police is surely the key.

Mr. Bottomley: I was describing what I could call the ignorance area. I was learning about what to recommend to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon), the former Secretary of State for Transport, who was involved in many of the decisions and in whose name many press releases were issued. I hope that he will not mind if I share that credit with my right hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley), who was the first Secretary of State for Transport to endorse the message that people should not drink and drive at all. He moved away from the message "keep low".

The number of breath tests may have increased from 300,000 to 500,000. However, because of the white noise from the random breath test brigade, people do not consider the facts. Those facts are available in the road accident statistics and they are available in the transport and road research laboratory studies.

They do not reach the general public because the media will only allow the public to learn that people will not run the risk of being caught unless they are caught by a random breath test. If the 42 per cent. of people who are caught driving above the legal limit for drink-driving did not believe that they were likely to be caught, they were wrong.

If it were not so serious, it would be entertaining to hear someone explain that what matters is the perceived risk of being caught and not the real risk of being caught. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) referred indirectly on 10 December to someone being caught three times. Such a person must not rely on being caught—he must change his behaviour. I believe that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East should resign, but not because of his behaviour. We all make mistakes. I drove badly on the day of his court case and I did something that could have resulted in a loss of life. I do not argue that the hon. Gentleman did that. He should resign because the facts show that opting for random breath tests would cost 200 lives a year within two years. That rate over a decade would cost thousands of lives.

The Opposition's policy is wrong. If they were to offer suggestions which would work, I would support them. All the evidence is that random breath testing at best is a distraction, and at worst would cause more lives to be lost than could now be saved.

Ms. Ruddock: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his remarks. It is unacceptable for him to suggest that my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) and I or any other hon. Member would table a new clause if we believed that it would result in the loss of 200 lives a year. We would not, and we have not, done that. The hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) has offered his personal opinion, but he has produced no evidence to support it.

Mr. Bottomley: The hon. Lady is plain wrong. I do not blame her, because she is not the boss. I am following the habit of her hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East, who is the boss. If we had introduced random breath testing in 1982, as New South Wales did, or in 1986 or 1988, or if we introduced it now and relied on it to reduce the rate at which people die in alcohol-related accidents, we might have achieved what New South Wales achieved. There would have been 50 per cent. more deaths as a result of drink driving then we now have.

Ms. Ruddock: It is not a question whether the boss is here or not. I made the speech and I will defend it. We have not suggested, as I made absolutely clear, that our proposals in the new clause for random breath testing are a substitute for measures which the Government are pursuing. Nor do we suggest that with hindsight it would have been a better alternative. We propose an additional measure that we believe will result in a further reduction in the number of drink-driving offences and so build on the good results of this country in that respect.

Mr. Bottomley: The hon. Lady is leading on to what really matters. If we believe that random checks, even under the method proposed in the new clause, will not add to detection of the crime, in the long term that will not be an effective deterrent. It will not achieve anything. It caused Alcohol Concern to write to hon. Members stating that 500 lives a year would be saved and that that figure is more than half the number of lives still being lost in alcohol-related crashes. That is not possible. A similar argument is made by Derek Rutherford, and it is led by people like the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East and the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock). They are all wrong. In fields such as medicine or education, if people can be shown to be wrong, they keep quiet.

I want to consider what measures would actually work. First, the police around the country should follow the lead of what happens in Scotland, where police try to test every driver involved in a crash. That does not happen in most parts of England, and particularly not on Merseyside or in London.

If we are to have a change in the law, all drink-drivers as a condition of bail should be expected to surrender their licences until they attend court. There would then be no delay in facing the consequences of one's actions. We should also ensure that we try to discover where people got into a condition that is criminal and so often lethal. In that way, people would have to face up to their own responsibilities, instead of relying on the mystique or white magic of random breath testing.

We must make progress so that drink-drive deaths are so infrequent that, when one occurs, the Opposition spokesman on transport calls for the resignation of the Transport Minister. When I was Under-Secretary of State for Transport for three and a half years, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East did not once call for my resignation, even though 14 people a day were dying on our roads. He was not interested in that. He wanted the glamour. The Opposition and my colleagues should agree on ways to make progress and to continue to reduce deaths on our roads.

Mr. Bidwell: The hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) has experience as a junior Transport Minister, but he said nothing to convince me that my Front-Bench colleagues are wrong.

Any additional activity should be pursued in the campaign to stop drinking and driving. As has been said earlier, people who drink and drive have a lethal weapon in their hands. That is enormously dangerous. Those people are careless. They are not all drunkards or alcoholics, although the number of alcoholics is increasing. Princess Di came to my constituency not too long ago to open an anti-alcohol clinic called Turning Point. The movement to combat alcoholism is increasing and has had to do so. People in a drunken state will be prone to take risks, a point that has not been raised so far.

7.30 pm

As many other hon. Members have said, the power of this new clause is that it must increase the deterrent. It is a matter of logic. We are asking the police to undertake an additional activity. I am glad that Labour Members have a free vote on the new clause, because that will allow my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) to do, what his conscience guides him to do, so that he can go down to his working men's club and look those present in the face. However, I am considering the new clause in the broad range and asking myself whether it will decrease the possibility of drunken drivers killing other people. I think that it will.

I take on board what the hon. Member for Eltham said about the occasion when the former Member for Blackburn, who is now a Member of the other place, introduced the first breathalyser legislation. The hon. Gentleman implied that the pubs suddenly emptied. They did not. In my own constituency, racially prejudiced publicans who had previously refused to serve black and brown people, when faced with a sharp reduction in their custom, were glad to serve anybody, and welcomed everybody with open arms, even those wearing turbans. Those are the difficulties that we encountered in the early formative years of the legislation.

I have been breathalysed twice when driving from my surgery. The first time was some time ago, because I have now learnt my lesson. On that occasion, one of the councillors with whom I shared my surgery wanted to take me to the nearest pub to have a chat. He bought me a double whisky, which I do not normally drink, but as he was paying, I accepted it with open arms. Down the road we went, and I was pulled in near Southall police station. The policeman did not know me, but I do not think that he would have acted any differently if he had recognised me.

Fortunately, I was not over the top, but the experience frightened me. I did not want to be a companion of those other hon. Members who have been done under the breathalyser test and have then had to issue a public apology. Because I do not want to be put in that position and because that experience frightened me so much, I do not drink and drive nowadays. If any action to which the House can agree will push people in that direction, so much the better.

On the other occasion when I was breathalysed, I had had only a couple of cups of tea at a local Indian social, but I was pulled up in Hayes. I served in Committee on the Bill that introduced the existing regulations on deterrents. Of course, policemen always call one "Sir", and this young man said to me, "Well, sir, you were driving erratically." That was what had given him the suspicion that I might be drunk. I said, "I do not remember us including 'suspicion of driving erratically' in the legislation. I always drive erratically." That shows that breath testing used to happen on the basis of suspicion, but that we are now moving to the new idea of random breath testing.

I am sorry that the Government are not allowing their Members to vote according to their consciences. I do not agree with the suggestion that the new clause is an attempt by teetotallers to take it out on drinkers. I agree entirely that the new clause would be a step forward in the fight against drunken driving, and I wish it all success. I hope that Conservative Members who agree with my attitude to the new clause will join us in the Lobby and will say, "Throw this three-line Whip out of the window."

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): There cannot be any right hon. or hon. Member who at some stage has not lost a constituent or a constituent's child as a result of a drink-driving case. Alcohol contributes to an estimated one in 10 of all road traffic accidents in the United Kingdom. As we have heard, it causes over 800 deaths and a staggering 22,000 casualties each year. However, more than a quarter of male drivers and one in five female drivers believe that their blood alcohol concentration has exceeded the legal limit at some time in the previous year. It is true that inroads have been made into the problem of drink-driving during the past decade. I welcome the detailed speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) as part of that statistical debate, although that is about the point where my hon. Friend and I diverge.

Further deterrents are needed, of which the random breath testing that is proposed in the all-party new clause would be one, but only one, way forward. However, based on evidence from other countries, that deterrent should work. We should not dismiss such evidence out of hand.

In a recent survey, 42 per cent. of people who admitted to drinking and driving thought that they ran little risk of detection. As long as people think that they can get away with it, the penalties will not work. Stopping the offence is clearly better than punishment—and the police agree. Mr. Peter Joslin, the chairman of the traffic committee of the Association of Chief Police Officers, has said:

"A deterrence-based enforcement system is far more effective in reducing drink-drive fatalities than the traditional enforcement model."

At present, the police can require a breath test in three circumstances. As there seems to be a little confusion in the House about this matter, I shall reiterate those three circumstances clearly. First, the police can require a breath test when the driver is suspected of having alcohol in his or her body; secondly, when a moving traffic offence has been committed; and thirdly, when the driver has been involved in an accident. The police also have the general power to stop a vehicle at any time.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): I thank my hon. Friend for giving way, because he has made precisely the point that the police have the general power to stop vehicles. Like the hon. Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell), I too have been stopped and breathalysed. It happened just before Christmas. When I stepped out of the car, the policeman said, "This is a routine check, sir." If that is not random stopping and effectively random breath testing, I do not know what is, because the policeman then asked me whether I had been drinking. I confirmed that I had, but thankfully I did not even register on the machine.

My hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) owes it to the House to make a much better case than he and the hon. Members supporting the new clause have done so far, because there are already sufficient powers. Indeed, when I told the policeman that the House was debating the point that very evening, he said, "Sir, we have enough powers as it is, but if you want to give us some more, that's fine by us."

Mr. Gregory: With respect, my hon. Friend jumped into the argument a little prematurely. The next time that he is stopped, he can refer to section 163 of the Road Traffic Act 1988. With respect, the correlation between that section and random breath testing seems to have escaped him. I did not go on to make that analogy; I merely referred to the occasions when a police officer in uniform can stop any person driving a vehicle. I have not yet gone on to extrapolate that argument in terms of random breath testing, but if my hon. Friend will bear with me for a little longer, I shall do so.

According to case law, the three circumstances to which I have referred may be combined. A police officer may stop any vehicle to establish suspicion that the driver has been drinking, after which the breath test may be required. The police argue that establishing grounds for suspicion before testing should be unnecessary and that they should have unrestricted powers to require a breath test.

The new clause provides for random breath testing at roadside checkpoints, and the regulations included in the new clause would permit roadside checks at which either all vehicles or a sample of vehicles could be stopped by a constable in uniform for the administration of breath tests. Roadside checkpoints would be authorised in writing and clearly signposted.

As a deterrent to drinking before driving, the great virtues of the new clause are its visibility and the fact that roadside testing could be encountered anywhere at any time, although there is no reason why testing should not be targeted. The Parliamentary Advisory Council for Transport Safety favours the new clause, as do many other experts and members of the public. In due course, I shall be interested to hear my hon. Friend the Minister for Roads and Traffic summon all the agencies and organisations at his command which oppose the view of PACTS. In an intervention, he referred to the Royal Automobile Club. The view of the RAC is ambiguous, as my hon. Friend should know from its press notice. I am sure that he has many other organisations at his command which support his argument.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Gregory: I am conscious of the time, but I will give way.

Mr. Bottomley: My hon. Friend has done a great deal of research into the matter. Will he confirm that all that PACTS and other organisations wish to achieve is legal under the present law? It is possible to have marked road checks and to test everyone except a driver who, after being stopped, is found not to have taken a drink, who has not been involved in an accident and who has not driven badly.

Mr. Gregory: Rather than considering exceptions, I am concerned to deter people. When enshrined in statute law, the new clause should be used not only to deter but to catch people. My hon. Friend constantly looks at the exceptions and perhaps introduces an element of the civil liberties argument, which I shall come to in a moment.

Experience abroad, notably in Scandinavia and in most of Australia, supports the case for the new clause. New South Wales has been referred to frequently tonight. Many in the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association must have visited New South Wales, judging by the number of hon. Members who seem to be aware of that fine state. In the first four years of random breath testing there, the average number of fatal or serious accidents related to alcohol fell by one third. That is a telling and practical argument which my hon. Friend the Minister should bear in mind.

One aspect has been referred to only obliquely. If there were ever any doubt about the new clause, it should be dispelled by this aspect. We are debating the measure as a motoring matter. If Department of Health Ministers and those responsible for budgeting for the health service were present tonight—they are not—they would be in favour of the amendment. The hospital and social security savings in New South Wales were over 20 times the initial cost of implementing the scheme. If the new clause does not find favour tonight—I hope that it will—such a measure might be included in the Finance Bill after the Budget on 19 March. The measure would certainly appeal to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for Health.

An argument which is sometimes used against random breath testing is that the rate of detection is low. Up to a point, that was the case made by my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham. However, no one suggests that random breath testing should be a substitute for existing procedures. It would be an additional weapon in the armoury of the police. Only in the completely impartial context of roadside checkpoints would the requirement for establishing suspicion be waived. The impartiality of random breath testing is a crucial aspect.

Mr. Michael Irvine (Ipswich): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Gregory: I must make progress. I am mindful of the time and the admonitions of the Chief Whip.

Over 77 per cent. of people interviewed in a Government survey last September praised the impartial aspect of random breath testing.

New clause 2 provides for the introduction of random breath testing. By that I mean that the police will be able to breath-test randomly selected samples of drivers without reasonable cause for suspicion at specially designated roadside checkpoints authorised by a senior police officer.

I stress that it would not give the police unfettered discretion to breath-test any driver anywhere at any time. It is an additional power, which provides an element of deterrence which is difficult to achieve under current procedures and which is so important for reducing road deaths. I am convinced that there is substantial support among professional, public and parliamentary opinion for this change in the drink-driving law.

It is essential that the message from the House tonight is that drinking and driving do not mix. The power to deter that lethal concoction is with right hon. and hon. Members, and I urge them to accept this straightforward new clause.

7.45 pm

Sir Ian Lloyd: I wish to detain the House for a few minutes to discuss some important aspects of the new clause. The first is the matter of definitions. The definition of the word "random" is important. It is clear that some hon. Members are under the impression that the new clause asks for a power that would virtually give the police permission to stop anyone they chose at any time and any place. That is not my understanding of the term "random".

A random number generator, as any statistician would agree, produces random numbers by choice, by means of a computer or, more simply, by taking numbers out of a bag, as in a lottery. For example, if 150,000 establishments which sell alcohol, such as hotels, pubs, clubs and so on, were chosen by a random number generator and one was the House of Commons, the police would be obliged to carry out checks at the exit of the House.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): They would have a field day.

Sir Ian Lloyd: They might, but there might be other places, in the country where they would have an equally good field day. If it was established that every 10th, 20th or 50th car should be checked, and the 50th car going out of the gate was that of the Prime Minister, his car would have to be stopped under genuine random testing.

The second definition with which I wish to deal is the difference between drink-driving and drunken driving. For perfectly understandable reasons, many hon. Members use the two terms as if they were entirely interchangeable. Sometimes, they take the absolutist view that there should be no drink-driving when, effectively, they mean that there should be no drunken driving. The scale of the problem clearly defines the difference. I have already given all the figures to the House, and I shall not detain it by doing so again tonight, but a clear distinction must be made between a system with the legitimate objective, of catching the incompetent, dangerous, drunken driver—someone who is over the limit—and a system directed with vast resources at the rest of the driving community.

I state once again with all the force at my command that, in a free society, we cannot attempt to use motor vehicles—22 million of them—to enforce prohibition, which is what a zero limit would be. Even if there were no legal zero limit, the social idea expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley)—that whether or not it is a legal offence, it is a moral offence to take any drink and get into a motor car and drive—is an absolutist view. We could never achieve that objective in a free society.

As one gets nearer to the limit, so the processes of enforcement become more rigorous. I have argued before on the Floor of the House that, even if the death penalty were attached to drunken driving, in a free society there would still be those who would take the risk.

My main argument is based on an entirely different set of premises. The House—and, in a sense, the Government—continues to adhere to an old technology or set of institutions. I find that difficult to understand. We are always reluctant to say, "Here is a solution which we know could work and which, if it worked, would work perfectly." As I have shown in more ways than one, the technology is clear and is being applied elsewhere. One Opposition Member said that people should lose their jobs if convicted of drunken driving. I believe that in certain circumstances they should not lose their jobs.

In California, where there is considerable experience in the matter, the use of the breathalyser ignition lock enables a person who has been involved in a case of drink-driving which was not serious to be given a lesser sentence. It is not necessary for a driver to lose his or her job.

Some hon. Members may have seen an excellent programme some time ago on television; I think it was "Horizon". It dealt with traffic problems in Los Angeles and showed some of the ways being developed all over the world to deal with the problem of the motor car. One thing which struck me forcibly was that we saw eight or nine vehicles going along a motorway, completely under computer control, some with the driver in the back seat. We are not there yet. It may be 10 to 15 years before it will be illegal for anyone who is over the legal limit of alcohol consumption to take a car on to a motorway. The technology will exist to prevent accidents, and it will be safer and better than human judgment.

If we are serious, we may say that, by the year 2000, every motor vehicle shall be fitted with a breathalyser ignition lock. If that takes place, it will be impossible for anyone to drink and drive unless the driver cuts the wires, and that would be a serious offence. The technology might exist for a central register to show that he had done so.

Do we want to eliminate drunken driving, or do we not? If we want to bring it down to zero, that is the way to do it. If it is not the way to do it, I should like to see a better way. If that is the target that we must achieve, will we do so by using deterrence, which will involve vast police forces trying to achieve by random breath testing the final eliminator test? Do we do it in that way, or do we say, "Here is a technology which enables the human being to reconcile his wish to drive his motor car and also to drink up to the point where, if he is in the least dangerous, he cannot physically do so"?

If the limit of 80 mg is too high, we can bring it down to 50 mg. If 50 mg is too high, we can bring it down to 30 mg. If 30 mg is too high, we can bring it down to zero. But at every stage of the reduction, I believe that the case that I have made in my proposed new clauses for self-breathalysing and subsequently for the use of a breathalyser ignition lock becomes stronger and stronger. I ask the Minister to give us the Government's view on my proposals.

Mr. Allason: I should like to share with the House my experience of the breathalyser, both as a police officer who has administered it and as a motorist who has been breathalysed. During the period that I spent in the police, I was satisfied that I had the equivalent of the power proposed by the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock). When I was breathalysed shortly before Christmas two years ago, I had not been drinking. When asked by the police officer who stopped me on the Embankment whether I had had a drink, I denied it. He nevertheless administered the breath test, which was negative. But examples surely show that we already have the power.

The hon. Lady gave two platforms for the new clause. The first was public pressure. I am reluctant ever to criticise the Labour party for adopting Conservative policies, but I urge it not to adopt the policy of proposing amendments like the new clause in order to be seen to be doing something, or to be responding to what is termed public pressure. The Government have made a habit of doing that. I point to the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1988 and to the Football Spectators Act 1989 as two classic examples of the Government misconceiving legislation and bringing it before the House.

The second plank of the hon. Lady's platform was the deterrent value—the likelihood of being caught. I entirely agree with her that the likelihood of being caught is indeed the principal element in deterring criminal activity. If we analyse what she is suggesting, it means greater police deployment in that sphere of activity. I interpret that as meaning greater interference with the operational decision-making which is the responsibility of chief police officers.

There is a hard core of persistent offenders, and the only way to change their behaviour is to change the culture and make it unacceptable to buy rounds for people who will later be driving.

It has been said that organisations such as the Consumers Association and the National Council for Civil Liberties support random testing. There is a belief that random testing is a panacea, but it is not. The police do not want such a power. They already have the powers that they need. I therefore urge the House to oppose the new clause.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): I wish briefly to support the new clause. My hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) has spoken ably on it, and I agree with almost every word that he said.

Of course, to have legislation on random breath testing is a curb on individual freedom, but we already accept curbs on individual freedom. We have to drive on the left of the road, we have to wear safety belts, and we have to obey the highway code. Those are all curbs on individual freedom, but they are all designed for safety and that is the purpose of the new clause.

I listened carefully to my hon. Friend the Member for Torbay (Mr. Allason), who made a persuasive argument, but as a layman I still believe that the new clause would have a deterrent value, although the powers already exist. That value is enormous in relation to the human suffering of those involved, in relation to the human anguish of the relatives of those involved, and in relation to money for the national health service and the taxpayer. I believe that about £600 million per year is involved.

As a deterrent, the new clause would help to save lives. I support it, and I urge the House to do likewise. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to reconsider his opposition to the new clause and to remember that we demand these standards of airline pilots, bus drivers and train drivers. I believe that we should bring in the new clause as a deterrent to drink-driving.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): I support random breath testing, but not the nonsense of the new clause. I cannot think of any single way in which the police could more infuriate ordinary drivers than to have such a roadside test. Whenever I am stopped at a roadside checkpoint, I get infuriated. If we want to improve relations between the public and the police, the new clause is not the way to do it.

The kind of random breath testing that I favour is the kind that we already enjoy. I do not say that with any great pleasure. The fact is that police officers can stop the driver of a car and, whether they pretend or whether they have real justification for doing so, they can inflict a breath test upon anyone. The trouble is not that that is being done, but that the public do not perceive that there is a power of random breath testing.

We could fulfil a useful purpose if we made it clear to the public that there is random breath testing already, that it is already legal and that they had better watch out when they drink and drive, because they may be stopped and disqualified. That is the random breath testing which it is within my bounds to support as one who believes in the freedom of the individual.

Mr. Chope: We have had a three-hour debate and I doubt whether anything that I could say would have much influence on the way in which hon. Members will vote. This has been a debate about random breath testing, although the better expression might be untargeted breath testing, because that is what the proponents of the new clause are arguing for. The House is united in its condemnation of those who drive with excess alcohol. Where there have been differences in the debate, they have been about the means to the end—of reducing the numbers who drink and drive and thereby the numbers who are killed and maimed as a result.

It is unworthy of those who support the new clause to accuse those who do not of being complacent or uncaring about road safety. The Government are proud of their record on road safety and, as the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) pointed out, we have the best road safety record in the European Community.

Government policy on this issue has been arrived at after the most careful and rational analysis of the evidence and arguments. On 1 February 1989, my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Hurd), when Home Secretary, initiated the debate, in response to a request from the police, for more powers. References to the background to that were made during the debate, particularly by my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon).

As a result, there was public consultation. It emerged from that that there was much public ignorance about the extent of the powers that the police have. To clarify the position, on Tuesday 5 November 1989 the Attorney-General, in answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham), set out the legal position. It is not necessary for me to recite that again tonight.

That position ensures that the police have power to stop motorists whom they wish to stop and then to ask for a breath test of motorists whom they suspect of drinking, of being involved in accidents or of moving road traffic offences. The Government view is that the existing powers strike the right balance between the need for effective enforcement of the law and the freedom of the individual.

The arguments on the other side have been largely concerned with the issue of deterrence. I think that, in the end, perception and reality over time have a tendency to coincide. We saw in the examples from New South Wales, and earlier from France, that, as soon as there was a change in the law, people thought that a random test was just around the corner, and as a result there was a reduction in the incidence of drink driving. But that was only a temporary phenomenon. It is more important that there should be a change of attitude.

One can see the difference in connection with speeding. I do not think there has been a change yet in attitude towards speeding, and that is why, when one observes police vehicles going along a motorway, most people, if they are sensible, reduce their speed while in the vicinity of those police vehicles. But as soon as they have gone past, they increase their speed.

In connection with drink driving, we do not think that the incidence of a large number of road checkpoints would add significantly to deterrence. Indeed, Government policy is to use public progaganda advertising for the purposes and to try to create a public atmosphere in which drink driving is not tolerated.

The Legal and General Insurance Company, following a recent Gallup survey, found that 84 per cent. of people said that, as a result of Government advertising, they had been made to think twice about drinking and driving. That is a more cost-effective way of proceeding than spending £12 million a year in police time setting up road blocks at which probably fewer than one in 100 of the people tested would be found to have been a drink-driver.

Mr. Day: My hon. Friend seems to have overlooked the fact that, as a number of hon. Members pointed out, the exercise in New South Wales proved to be cost-effective.

Mr. Chope: I had not intended to mention New South Wales in detail. There is a code of guidance there, and my hon. Friend and others will be interested to know that as part of that code says:

"A random breath testing station is not to be established in the immediate vicinity of licensed premises."

I do not understand why that provision is included. Many people who support the principle of the new clause may be concerned when they analyse what might be contained in the controls that would be introduced under it.

This has been a high-quality debate. We had moments of passionate intensity and serious deliberation and we had expressions of brotherly love in the Labour party, as exemplified by the exchanges between the hon. Members for Bassetlaw and for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott). The latter called his honourable enemy a twit, which elicted the memorable response from the hon. Gentleman that he was speaking as a working-class Labour voter. On the evidence of tonight's debate, working-class Labour voters may be an endangered species, and we should place a preservation order on the hon. Member for Bassetlaw.

Mr. Ashton: I should put it on record that my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) apologised for losing his temper. I accepted his apology and we are now the best of friends.

Mr. Chope: On that happy note, I shall resume my seat.

Ms. Ruddock: I shall delay the House for only a few moments to respond to the debate on the new clause that stands in my name and the names of some of my hon. Friends.

I regret that the Minister concluded his remarks in the way he did, because this has been an extremely serious debate. We should concentrate our thoughts on the main issue involved, that of deaths and injuries. During the debate, a number of myths have been peddled by those who oppose the idea of random breath testing, and they have suggested that the powers to have random breath tests already exist. They do not. What is being used by some police forces in Britain is a combination of the power randomly to stop combined, with the power to test on suspicion. Those two powers have been combined by some chief police officers in a way that has not been authorised by the House and is a combination of powers that many other police forces have chosen not to use.

By tabling the new clause, we seek in no way to remove those powers from the police. We have no intention of trying to end targeted testing, of which we thoroughly approve and which has produced good results by reducing the number of drink-related accidents. We seek to add an additional power to permit truly randomised testing. That testing would be accountable. It would not distinguish between people—types, classes and so on—but would say, in effect, "If your car is passing a random test point and you are a chosen number, you will be stopped for a legitimate purpose," and that purpose would be to deter those who choose to break the law by drinking and driving.

This is not, as has been suggested, a response by my party designed to court popularity. I have called in aid the support of the general public. That supports our case, and we cite it because we are convinced that, if our proposal were introduced, it would have public support. So the public would understand what it was all about and would be willing to co-operate in its implementation.

I remind the House that 800 deaths per annum are involved in this argument. My hon. Friends and I believe that if we can do something to help reduce that number of deaths, we should do it. We are convinced of our case. There is room for improvement on all that has been done by the Government to date. For that reason alone, we urge support for the new clause.

Confident though we are of our case, we have allowed our Members a free vote. I hope, with hon. Members anxious to vote on the issue, that those on the Government Benches who support us will have the courage to follow their consciences.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New clause 3

DESIGNATION OF PARKING CONTROL AUTHORITY

'After section 95 of the Road Traffic Regulations Act 1984 there shall be inserted—

"95A(1) The Secretary of State may in the circumstances specified in subsection (2) below and subject to subsection (5) below by Order designate any Metropolitan District Highway Authority in a Metropolitan County as a parking control authority.

(2) The Secretary of State shall make an Order under this section in respect of any metropolitan county area where—

(a) he has been requested to do so by all the Metropolitan District Highway Authorities in the relevant county; and

(b) he is satisfied that the designation in necessary having regard to—

(i) the level of unenforced contraventions of the law relating to stationary vehicles in the area concerned;

(ii) the transport policies of the authorities concerned; and

(iii) the effect of the level of unenforced contraventions on these policies.

(3) Before making an Order under this section the Secretary of State shall consult any Police Authority all or part of whose area comprises the metropolitan county concerned.

(4) Any Order made under this section shall—

(a) specify under which provisions of this Act regulations may be enforced by the parking control authorities in the Metropolitan County concerned;

(b) provide for the contravention of regulations made under those provisions to cease to be a criminal offence;

(c) specify the means by which the parking control authorities shall discharge their responsibilities under this section.

(5) No Order may be made under this section before 1st January 1994.".'.—[Ms. Ruddock.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Ms. Ruddock: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The effect of the new clause will be to allow the Secretary of State to designate metropolitan district councils as parking control authorities. He would have to be satisfied that designation was necessary because the level of unenforced parking contraventions in the area concerned was undermining local transport policies. The powers provided by the new clause would not be used until 1994.

The new clause is necessary because part II deals with parking enforcement exclusively in relation to London. The highways committee of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities is concerned, and the Opposition share that concern, that parking problems in the major urban areas outside London are increasing rapidly and that action is needed in relation to them as well as in the context of London. That view is shared by the AMA's public transport committee, which is concerned about the effect of illegal parking on the reliability of bus services.

The best detailed information on the problems of enforcement is from joint police and highway authority studies of parking enforcement in Sheffield and Rotherham, commissioned by the Home Office working party on parking enforcement.

In Sheffield, surveys were carried out in three areas, including 20 per cent. of the city centre. Agreed beats were patrolled between five and 10 times over two days. The surveys adopted the same five-minute loading rules as that adopted by traffic wardens. The Sheffield survey found that fewer than 1 per cent. of vehicles found parking on yellow lines in the city centre had been served with a parking ticket. It found 55 vehicles parked on yellow lines in a northern part of Sheffield and 49 in part of south Sheffield. None had been subject to enforcement action.

The Rotherham survey was carried out on a similar basis. In Rotherham town centre, 132 vehicles were found parked on yellow lines, only one of which had been the subject of enforcement. In the outer areas surveyed, 47 contraventions were spotted, but not one parking ticket was seen.

Those surveys show that only a minute proportion of vehicles found on yellow lines had been served with a parking ticket. In response to that finding, the police state that the contraventions found were often in side streets and had resulted in no major congestion or road safety problem. On that basis, they argue that the findings did not support the case for change outside London.

The AMA highways committee accepts that many of the contraventions found in the Sheffield and Rotherham studies did not result in major congestion or road safety problems, but it does not accept that that in any way undermines the case for change. The fact is that the law is not being enforced.

It is particularly important to understand the police view and their objective, which is parking enforcement strictly in the narrow terms of maintaining the free flow of traffic. Yet parking is increasingly also being viewed as an important transport policy. The availability of parking space can be an important influence on a person's decision whether to travel by car or by public transport. The availability of additional free parking space—that is, unenforced parking on yellow lines—can seriously undermine broader transport policies designed to encourage greater use of public service vehicles.

It is also important to acknowledge that yellow lines are introduced for a range of reasons other than maintaining the free flow of traffic on main routes. Local traffic management and environmental considerations are often, and increasingly important. Those are local authority rather than police objectives, but the responsibility for allocating enforcement resources rests with the police.

Concern is not confined to south Yorkshire. For example, Manchester city council is currently lobbying for parking enforcement powers to be transferred to its authority. Its proposals are based on the important role that parking policies are likely to play in transport strategy designed to tackle that city's worsening problem of road congestion.

When the subject was discussed in Committee, the Minister rejected out of hand the case for change outside London. He said that the view of the Home Office working party was "that the most pressing problems were in London. That is why we have brought forward proposals in the Bill to deal with the problems in London."

The Minister acknowledged that problems existed outside the capital, but maintained that they could be resolved by improved liaison between the police and highway authorities, but the Minister's remarks included a glimmer of hope for the future. He said:

"There is not sufficient evidence to warrant changing parking regimes outside London, but that will be reviewed in the light of the experience of the coming months and years in London."

We accept that the most pressing problems are in London, but that fact in itself is not a reason for not taking action in relation to other urban areas. The new clause is intended to meet most of the Minister's concerns.

First, the powers available in the clause could not be exercised until 1994. That is intended to enable trends in the other urban areas to be monitored, experience to be gained with the new arrangements in London, and discussions to take place between local highways and police authorities. If the new clause is accepted today, the legislation will be ready once those new steps have been taken.

The new clause is deliberately drawn in flexible terms. If the Secretary of State were allowed to determine by order the range of powers to be given to parking control authorities, he would be able to take on board the lessons learned in London.

In Committee, when debating the issue, the Minister further said:

"It is fair to say that local authorities sometimes abuse yellow lines by painting them on the road against the advice of the police. If the police advise against, it is hardly surprising that there is not much enforcement."—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 5 February 1991; c. 324-29.]

That goes to the heart of the problem. Highway authorities introduce parking restrictions for a range of reasons—including, increasingly, support of broad transport objectives. Yet the enforcement of those restrictions—the decision, as the Minister suggests, whether they are enforced or not—is left to the police who, in relation to parking, have two important but narrow objectives—maintaining the free flow of traffic and protecting road safety on main routes.

The way ahead does not lie in the direction set by the Minister, who, in practice, has given the police carte blanche not to enforce restrictions with which they do not agree. The way forward involves vesting public policy making, regulation making and enforcement in one authority—the local highway authority.

The Minister's response also highlights a contradiction between the recognition now being given by his Department to the importance of parking to transport policy and his attitude to enforcement. The new clause attempts to address the issue head on by including as factors which Ministers must take into account when designating a parking control authority the transport policies of the areas concerned and the impact of the level of enforcement of those policies.

The Minister may well argue about the wording of the new clause, but that is not important at this stage of the Bill's process. What is important is that the Minister should acknowledge that parking enforcement is a problem in urban areas outside London; that it is likely that changes to the enforcement regime will be needed to tackle those problems in due course; that experience in London could provide valuable lessons for other areas; and that it would be sensible to take enabling powers in the Bill so that steps could be taken to tackle the problem outside London, as soon as the Department and the police accept the local authorities' case for change. That stage may not be reached in the immediate future, but it will almost certainly be reached before further parliamentary time is found for this important area of debate.

Mr. Chope: I cannot accept the amendment. As the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) has explained, it is along similar lines to one that we discussed at considerable length in Committee. I said then that part II of the Bill had been brought forward largely in response to detailed consideration of the issues by a working party chaired by the Home Office during 1987 and 1988. Its report concluded that the problem was in London and that, although it is not true to say that there are no problems outside London, we should tackle the problems there first.

8.30 pm

In Committee, I said that it ought to be possible to arrive at a reasonable accommodation on appropriate levels of enforcement effort for traffic and parking controls in the provinces, given that the county is both the police and the highway authority. In many cases, that is what happens in practice.

As the hon. Lady reminded us, I also said that we would reconsider this matter in the light of experience. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has a flexible attitude to the subject and that, if he were persuaded of the need to extend these powers outside London, he would have no hesitation in introducing the necessary legislation. At this stage there is no case for proceding in that manner.

Ms. Ruddock: Does the Minister have any thoughts on how many years it will be before congestion problems in other major cities reach the stage that they have now reached in London? Does he believe that associated problems and the need to enforce parking restraints are relevant to that?

Mr. Chope: I cannot speculate. There is some significance in the fact that no authority outside London has requested the introduction of wheel clamping powers from the Secretary of State, which suggests that authorities have not yet exhausted the enforcement mechanisms available to them under existing powers. Authorities can also employ their own parking attendants to enforce excess charges at paid-for parking meters on the streets, and few authorities yet do so. Those authorities which are introducing new parking controls—whether with meters, parking vouchers, or pay-and-display schemes—find that they can help to achieve their traffic objectives, as well as yield a satisfactory financial return.

I am not sure whether there is a demand for the changes that the hon. Lady suggests. Even if we had sound evidence for extending our proposals beyond London, it is by no means certain that we would want to limit those powers to metropolitan districts in the way that the new clause does. Why should they be singled out? If the principle were agreed, it would be reasonable to consider extending the powers to the counties as well.

Ms. Ruddock: We limited powers to the metropolitan districts because we have received evidence that it is in those areas that the problem is perceived as being worse. That is the reason for the limitation in the new clause.

Mr. Chope: I hear what the hon. Lady says, but it is not necessary to repeat why the Government feel that the new clause should not be accepted. It does not mean that some of the powers that will soon be implemented in London may not be applicable to provincial areas at some stage in the future. We are not ruling that out, but it would be wrong to include the new clause in the Bill.

Question put and negatived.

New Clause 17

PROSECUTION AND PUNISHMENT OF OFFENDERS

'For Schedule 2 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 (Prosecution and Punishment of Offenders) Part 1 (Offences under the Road Traffic Act) RTA section 143, there shall be substituted:

(1) Provision creating offence	(2) General nature of offence	(3) Mode of prosecution	(4) Punishment	(5) Disqualification	(6) Endorsement	(7) Penalty Points
Offences under the Road Traffic Act 1988 (continued)
RTA section 143	Using motor vehicle while uninsured or unsecured against third-party risks	(a) summarily	6 months or level 5	Discretionary	Obligatory	6-8
		(b) on indictment	12 months or a fine or both	Discretionary	Obligatory	8.'.

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Gale: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

New clause 17 seeks to reintroduce a custodial sentence for driving while uninsured. This was thoroughly discussed in Committee and I do not want to detain the House long on the subject tonight. However, will my hon. Friend the Minister consider the great concern that has been expressed by the Magistrates Association, among others, about the inability to impose anything other than a fine for the free-standing offence of driving uninsured.

I am acutely aware that, in many cases, magistrates have powers to impose other sentences because driving uninsured occurs as an offence on its own on relatively rare occasions. However, there are slightly more than 200,000 convictions each year for driving uninsured, which leads me to believe that at any one time the number of people driving uninsured is somewhere in the region of 500,000. Apart from those involved in other offences—for example, theft of a car for use in a burglary or taking and driving away, which account for a number of cases—it is clear that there is a hard core of people who take a calculated risk. Rather like those who knowingly choose not to pay for a television licence, in the belief that they may get away with it, there is a hard core of people who decide, with malice aforethought, that in the long run it is cheaper not to pay for insurance. Clearly that is worrying. They may get away with it for quite a long time and, as things stand, they may save money.

Yesterday, the House carried the Criminal Justice Bill through its final stages. It provided for an increase in the level of fine to more than £2,000. I do not wish to pretend that that is not an improvement and that it is not likely to be some deterrent. However, the courts feel that there is a case for enabling them to impose a community service order on people who drive uninsured.

In 1974, the custodial sentence for this offence was abolished. That was first moved by the Conservative Government in the first half of 1974. The Bill was picked up and carried through by the Labour Government which was elected in 1974. The Bill faced fierce opposition in Committee but was carried on the Floor of the House. The sentence was abolished because the Government—it is fair to say that both sides of the House agreed—felt that the custodial sentence was, in most cases, too draconian, and I agree. When the House took that decision in 1974, the community service order was not on the statute book. As the House knows, community service orders depend on a custodial sentence. Magistrates would like the opportunity to impose community service orders, which they believe would be more effective than a fine in some cases, because of the inconvenience caused to the person concerned. There is a feeling that fines are generally treated lightly and with some disdain. Only rarely does the bench—or, in the case of a trial on indictment, the court—find it necessary to impose a prison sentence. The problem is that the custodial sentence, which the House is trying to recommend less, in general, is the key to the community service order.

As I have said, I do not wish to be doctrinaire about the matter. The problem caused by those who drive without insurance is important. It would indeed have been highlighted in three new clauses tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), which I had intended to move for him, but I am afraid that I let him down very badly. I sprinted along the corridor, but did not quite make it in time. My hon. Friend the Minister will remember, as I do, that there was unanimity on the issue in Committee, and I had the distinct impression at the time that my hon. Friend was not entirely opposed to the amendment that we discussed then.

I accept that what the House decides to do—I hope that it will decide to do something—must be in keeping with both the Criminal Justice Bill, which we passed last night and which is now in the other place, and the other sentencing proposals in this Bill. I know that my hon. Friend has already considered the matter carefully, but I ask him to continue to do so, and, if necessary, to tell me that he is prepared to table an amendment in another place if it is felt that my proposals are too draconian or out of keeping with the general context of both the Criminal Justice Bill and the Road Traffic Bill.

Mr. Allason: Driving without insurance is a serious offence: anyone without insurance causing an accident involving injury will ensure that the victim is not compensated. Not many people know that the Motor Insurers Bureau exists to compensate those involved with another vehicle so that their own vehicle can be repaired. The new clause has a deterrent value; another deterrent would be provided by the adoption of a disc along the lines of the road fund licence disc, which, if displayed in the car, would prove that the driver was insured. It is astonishing that anyone can buy a vehicle in this country without having to provide proof of an insurance policy. The only occasion when that needs to be done is when a vehicle needs to be retaxed: as we know from bitter experience, few people renew their road fund licences.

I urge the Government to accept the new clause.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) should not feel too concerned about his inability to be present for the new clauses tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway). I would certainly have been prepared to consider the first seriously, in the light of what I knew that he wanted to say, although the second would have caused more difficulty.

Driving without insurance is a serious offence, and hon. Members on both sides of the Committee supported the principle that it should be dealt with as such by the magistrates court. The new clause would make the offence triable on indictment, because a maximum penalty of six months' imprisonment would be involved: if the sentence were limited to three months, it would be triable only in the magistrates court.

I believe that my hon. Friend has had the opportunity to discuss the matter with our right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office, who is ultimately responsible for deciding on matters relating to imprisonment and on the maximum penalties. I know that my right hon. Friend is willing to discuss the issue with the Magistrates Association, on whose behalf my hon. Friend and others have spoken: indeed, it is because of the magistrates' interest in the issue that we are discussing it today.

I know that my right hon. Friend is also willing to consider the possibility of increasing the maximum financial penalty even further, to the maximum penalty that the magistrates are empowered to impose. That would not deal with my hon. Friend's anxiety about the magistrates' ability to impose community service orders; it would, however, show the extent of the Government's concern about the offence of driving without insurance.

In the seven years between 1975 and 1982, the number of such offences increased by 60,000; in the seven-year period between 1982 and 1989, it increased by only about 17,000. The rate of increase is slowing, at a time when the number of private cars on the road has increased by some 30 per cent. and the number of road traffic offences has increased by 38 per cent. My hon. Friend is right in saying that, in many cases, driving without insurance was not the most serious offence—other offences were involved, such as taking a motor vehicle without authority, which used to be called taking and driving away—but in 1989 it was the most serious offence to be tried by the courts in about 127,000 cases.

Disqualification clearly protects the public from uninsured drivers by removing them from the roads, and, given the level of penalty points, it will not be difficult to reach the stage of disqualification under the totting-up procedures. I think, however, that it would be wrong to base sentencing purely on the deterrent effect. Experience and evidence suggests that that is not always the most important issue, and that is why the approach of the Home Office is to base sentencing on the gravity of the offence. I hope that my hon. Friend appreciates that the Government take the matter seriously and are willing to keep it under review, and that my right hon. Friend will be able to meet the Magistrates Association.

My hon. Friend the Member for Torbay (Mr. Allason) raised an issue that has been raised many times in the past: the desirability of insurance certificates being displayed on windscreens. That happens in some other countries, but we see severe practical problems in the practice, which would need the co-operation of the insurance companies and a specified period for the duration of the certificate. We consider that the present system of an annual or, in some cases, six-monthly road fund licence renewal—to qualify for which a driver must show his insurance certificate and, if the age of the vehicle makes that appropriate, his MOT certificate—is sufficient.

One of the biggest problems is that, in this country, a single insurance certificate can cover more than one driver and more than one vehicle. In France, insurance has traditionally been based on a single driver and a single vehicle. Clearly, it would be much easier to have one certificate which would appear on the windscreen of the vehicle covered by the insurance.

I assure my hon. Friend that we shall continue to keep the matter under review. I hope that he will feel able to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Gale: I thank my hon. Friend for his generous understanding of the fact that hon. Members sometimes have to be in three places at once and for the undertaking that he has given, although not forced to do so. I hope that the matter can be dealt with in the other place. I warmly appreciate the time that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office gave me today and for his undertaking to meet the Magistrates Association to discuss the matter.

Clearly, the new clause would have ramifications that I did not wholly appreciate when I first tabled it, not least in terms of the general sentencing in context. I hope that the new clause will at least have shed some light on matters that require further discussion—I would not say, opened a can of worms. I hope that it will be possible to reconsider the matter in the other place. With that proviso, and with many thanks to my hon. Friend the Minister, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 19

PROHIBITION OF MOTOR VEHICLES ON BYWAYS

'Before section 35 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 there shall be inserted—

34a(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, if without lawful authority a person drives a motor vehicle on any byway he is guilty of an offence.

(2) A person shall not be convicted of an offence under this section if he proves to the satisfaction of the court that the motor vehicle was driven in contravention of subsection (1) above for the purpose of saving life or extinguishing fire or meeting any other like emergency.

(3) In this section 'lawful authority' does not include the exercise of a public right of way over a byway except where—

(a) the right of way is being exercised in connection with agricultural or forestry operations; or

(b) the exercise of the right of way has been authorised by an order under subsection (4) below.

(4) A local authority may, by order, grant authorisation for the use of motor vehicles on a byway in its area, and such authorisation may provide for use to be restricted to named persons, to a class of vehicle or to specified times.

(5) In this section—

'byways' means a highway over which the public have a right of way for vehicular and all other kinds of traffic; but which is used by the public mainly for the purpose for which footpaths and bridleways are so used;

'local authority' has the same meaning as in section 33 above.".'.

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The clause arises from the concern expressed by many people—the Ramblers Association in particular—about the damage that can be done to footpaths by driving of motor vehicles upon them. The problem is becoming increasingly serious. Our byways—the green lanes in the Pennines, the ridgeways in the downlands and public footpaths throughout the country—are being seriously damaged and churned up, often by joy riders.

The problem needs to be tackled. The new clause makes it clear that we would not in any way want to inhibit access for emergency vehicles or for genuine and legitimate farming and forestry purposes, but we must do everything we can to protect our byways, many of which are in glorious parts of our landscape and offer unparalled opportunities for recreation to many thousands of people. It is incumbent on us to do what we can to ensure that they are protected. The new clause seeks to do precisely that, and I hope that the Government will respond positively to it.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I hope that the Government will be sympathetic to this well-motivated and necessary new clause.

Mr. Chope: I am sorry to have to disappoint the hon. Members for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) and for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes).

The law already makes adequate provision for the matters to which the hon. Gentlemen referred. Highway authorities are obliged under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 to hold "definitive maps". These are open to inspection by the public and they record the status of routes in the locality. Routes presently shown as "road used as public paths" may be reclassified as footpaths or bridleways where there is no evidence of established vehicular rights. Where there are established vehicular rights, the routes must be shown as "byways open to all traffic". The definition is found in section 127 of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 and is one used in the new clause. Such a byway conveys a public right of way for vehicles, as the definition itself expressly states. That is how the law stands at present, and we believe that the procedures are satisfactory.

The new clause seeks to extinguish vehicular rights on byways open to all traffic, with exceptions only for emergencies and in respect of rights of way exercised in connection with agricultural or forestry operations and so on. "Procedure" is probably a misnomer for what is provided by the new clause, which simply gives a summary power to the local authority to grant "authorisations". The new clause is silent about the criteria against which these would be given, and the procedures to be followed. It represents an extraordinary withdrawal of long-established rights of way and would be extremely controversial were the House to accept it and incorporate it in law.

Mr. Fearn: Does the Minister agree that most local authorities do not have definitive maps? Many give the excuse that they do not have the time or the staff to produce them. Apparently, the Minister requires such maps to be produced. How long will authorities have to produce them? I am thinking in particular of my own authority, Sefton. With my support, the ramblers have been asking for a definitive map for the past five or six years, and it has still not been done. Is there a time limit?

Mr. Chope: I am not aware that there is a time limit. We are talking about an Act of Parliament passed in 1981. I should certainly hope that local authorities are making some progress towards the establishment of definitive maps, as they are under an obligation to do just that. I shall look into the matter and ascertain whether authorities have until the millennium—or until the next millennium—to produce the maps, or whether they are under an obligation to do so sooner. Obviously, they should be brought under some local political pressure, particularly in the light of concern about the unsuitable vehicular use of ancient byways.

In many cases, it should be possible to establish voluntary management arrangements, which would limit use by, for example, trail bikes or off-road vehicles. Representative bodies have sought to promote responsible use by bikers and four-wheel-drive users. That is a reasonable way in which to deal with the problem.

Mr. Chris Smith: I fear that the Minister's response is, indeed, disappointing. He places too much reliance on the possibility of voluntary management agreements, which do not always work and which are not always possible. He has failed to recognise the problem identified by the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Fearn)—the absence in a number of local authority areas of the definitive maps to which he devoted so much attention. He has also ignored the fact that there is undoubtedly a failure of enforcement even where definitive maps exist and the fact that, in some places—the green lanes are a classic case in point—where the supposed long-standing rights of vehicular access apply, there is none the less a serious problem with the destruction of our countryside heritage. The issue requires more attention and less complacency from the Government.

Of course I accept that the new clause, in setting out its objectives, is far from perfect. For example, it does not lay down criteria for the local authority concerned. That being the case, it probably would not be sensible to press it to a vote. However, I hope that the Government have noted that among hon. Members there is considerable concern about this matter. We shall certainly wish to return to it in due course.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 3

CAUSING DEATH BY CARELESS DRIVING WHEN UNDER THE INFLUENCE OF DRINK OR DRUGS.

9 pm

Mr. Chope: I beg to move, amendment No. 27, in page 2, line 33, leave out from beginning to end of line 36 and insert—

'(c) he is, within 18 hours after that time, required to provide a specimen in pursuance of section 7 of this Act but without reasonable excuse fails to provide it,'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 28, 29 and 30.

Mr. Chope: These amendments deal with a technical but important point relating to the refusal to provide a specimen where the new "causing death" offence is alleged. It is important that there be no built-in incentive to refuse a specimen in drink-drive cases, but there is also a need to have a proper safeguard. This amendment incorporates a safeguard—that a person who has refused to provide a specimen more than 18 hours after the incident to which it related would not be able to be convicted of failing to provide a specimen. The time limit is 18 hours: although obviously not exact, it is a proxy for a maximum period during which a person whose level was more than three times over the limit would probably have his blood alcohol level reduced to within the limit.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 28, in page 2, line 37, leave out from beginning to 'he'.

No. 29, in page 2, line 39, leave out from beginning to end of line 48.

No. 30, in page 3, line 4, leave out from beginning to 'above' and insert 'Subsection (1)(b) and (c)'.—[Mr. Chope.]

Clause 5

CAUSING DANGER TO ROAD-USERS

Mr. Chope: I beg to move amendment No. 31, in page 3, line 33, leave out from beginning to end of line 37 and insert

'(a) anything lawfully placed on or near a road by a highway authority;

(b) a traffic sign lawfully placed on or near a road by a person other than a highway authority;'

This amendment arises out of concern, expressed during the debate on clause 5, that the new offence did not adequately cater for traffic equipment placed by anyone other than a highway authority. I explained then that the clause as drafted already catered for equipment placed by contractors working on behalf of a highway authority, but did not go far enough.

The intention of the amendment is therefore to provide a new definition of "traffic equipment" for this purpose. It will extend the application of the new offence to interference with all traffic signs and safety equipment put up by undertakers executing street works in accordance with the requirements imposed by the Public Utilities Street Works Act 1950 or which will be imposed under the new roads and street works legislation. I hope that it will be helpful.

INFORMATION AS TO IDENTITY OF DRIVER ETC.

The Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I beg to move amendment No. 73, in page 14, line 14, after 'corporate', insert

', or in Scotland a partnership or an unincorporated association,'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 74 and 36.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Amendments Nos. 73 and 74 correct an omission in clause 18. Where a body corporate is charged with an offence under section 172 of the Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988—failing to provide information as to the identity of the driver at the time of an alleged offence—it can only benefit from the "due diligence" defence if it can show that no record was kept of drivers using the vehicle and that the failure to keep a record was reasonable. The amendments will make certain that the same qualification will apply in the case of offences by Scottish partnerships and unincorporated associations.

Amendment No. 36 responds to concerns expressed in Committee. It deals with the offence of failing to provide information about the driver of a vehicle, particularly a vehicle involved in an offence detected by the use of camera technology. There is already an obligation on a registered keeper, when required by the police, to give such information as he is able about the identity of a driver who may have committed a road traffic offence. Obviously, this is particularly important for camera-detected offences, where the camera will have recorded the vehicle's registration plate but not the driver.

If these provisions are to work, there must be no built-in incentive for the registered keeper to withhold information when he may himself be the driver, so the offence of failing to provide information must be treated with the same level of seriousness as the offence about which information is sought. Companies should have the same responsibility to provide information as a private individual, and it is right that a director or other officer who has connived at failing to provide information or who is negligent should share in that responsibility. There will be a defence that a company could not ascertain who the driver of the vehicle was at a particular time, if it can be demonstrated that failure to keep a record was reasonable. I do not, therefore, believe that companies should be absolved of responsibility.

A point was raised in committee by a number of hon. Members—in particular, by my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller), in whose name the amendments were tabled, and my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King). We are persuaded that it is not necessarily appropriate for the penalty to include the endorsement of penalty points on a licence where the offence is committed by a company and its officers. The connection with the driving of the particular company vehicles involved in the offence is remote, and too much would turn on whether the relevant director held a driving licence. In such circumstances, I am sure it is right to rely on a financial penalty. Hence, the amendment removes endorsement and discretionary disqualification from the penalty in these cases—and meets the point that was made in Committee.

For the sake of consistency, it also removes endorsement and discretionary disqualification in cases which may arise in Scotland where a partner in a partnership or an officer of an unincorporated association is prosecuted for an offence committed by the partnership of association.

I commend these three amendments to the House.

Clause 26

Disqualification for certain offences

Clause 31

Conditional offer of fixed penalty

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 75, in page 30, line 13 after 'Where', insert 'in England and Wales'.

Mr. Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to consider Government amendments Nos. 76 to 87 and 97 to 101.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The amendment empowers the police to issue conditional offers of fixed penalty to a majority of those that they would otherwise have reported to the fiscal for committing a fixed penalty offence. The power can be used either at the roadside or, if detected by unmanned equipment, by later sending the offer by post. At present, the police have no power to issue fixed penalty notices at the roadside for traffic offences committed in moving vehicles or in those that attract the endorsement. The police have pressed to have such a power for some time, as they see it as conducive to improved road traffic enforcement.

We have had extensive consultations with interested bodies and have concluded that the enforcement of road traffic offences, such as speeding, could effectively be carried out by the police using broadly the system of conditional offer fixed penalties proposed in clause 31. If the amendment is made, the police will no longer have to make routine reports on such offences as speeding to the fiscal except in cases where a conditional offer was not taken up. There will therefore be a considerable saving of time for the police and fiscals.

I commend the amendment as a useful streamlining of present procedures with a potential contribution to policing enforcement and hence road safety in Scotland.

Clause 36

Power to install equipment for detection of traffic offences

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): I beg to move amendment No. 54, in page 36, line 40, at end insert—

'(2) A highway authority may, in consultation with the Secretary of State for Transport for time to time require specified types of public service vehicles operating in its area to be fitted with equipment detectable by said highway authority.'.

I am grateful for the opportunity to move the amendment. As one of my hon. Friends said a moment ago, events have moved rather fast and the television monitor where I was sitting packed up—it was probably totally confused by the speed at which we are proceeding.

My hon. Friend the Minister mentioned unmanned equipment, and that is what the amendment refers to. It is clear to everyone that the police are severely overstretched in trying to cope with London's traffic problems. It is equally clear that certain vehicles, particularly coaches—the amendment refers to public service vehicles—have so multiplied the amount of work placed on the shoulders of the Metropolitan police that my hon. Friends who have been dealing with the Bill are right to refer to the need to utilise more unmanned equipment.

I should like the amendment to be inserted in the Bill in an attempt to use such equipment to deal with the illegal parking of, and use of unsuitable roads by, public service vehicles, particularly coaches. Since coach deregulation, the problem has become almost out of hand. The deregulation legislation, possibly inadvertently, removed from London local authorities both the right and the duty to designate coach routes. I included public service vehicles in the amendment because I wanted to differentiate between coaches and buses. London buses serve Londoners, but coaches serve commuters and tourists. It is not London's buses that cause the problem, but incoming commuter and tourist coaches.

In support of the amendment, I shall give two brief quotations. The first is a letter from the deputy assistant commissioner of the central district, Mr. Innes, who wrote to me as long ago as 15 January 1987. That is a sign of how long some of us have been trying to raise such problems. He said:

"You will be aware that in the Central Area problems with coaches are quite horrendous. We have to balance the proper desires of the tourist boards to attract visitors to London alongside the vastly increased use of coaches for commuting purposes, all in streets designed for horses and carts."

It is wrong for the House to pass legislation that puts huge burdens, with which they are virtually unable to cope, on the Metropolitan police.

More recently, on 14 February 1989, Mr. Brand, the chief inspector of operations for the Metropolitan police at Kensington police station, wrote about the problem of coaches parking on roads where they had no right to be. The anomaly has arisen that, under the Transport Act 1985, coaches that travel more than 15 miles appear to be exempt from many of the existing parking and stopping regulations. Mr. Brand said:

"Many of the tours do not require licensing under the 1985 Transport Act as these travel further than 15 miles. However, the regulations permit coaches to wait in any restricted street for as long as necessary to pick up and set down passengers or load and unload baggage."

We know perfectly well what goes on with the commuter coaches: they clog up the main arterial roads in the rush hour and often drive around for hours on end trying to kill time in order to find themselves at the right place at the right time. That often means that they park illegally while waiting to pick up people to take them home in the rush hour on over-congested roads.

In the absence of an unlimited number of policemen to watch virtually every coach operator in London, we shall have to turn to unmanned equipment. That equipment could also be used to deal with the increasingly serious problem of pollution caused by coaches, particularly in parts of the capital such as the area around Victoria coach station. I presume that it is possible to devise equipment that can register given levels of pollution from diesel fumes and, if necessary, set off an alarm.

The purpose of my amendment is to force coach firms to fit such equipment in their vehicles so that, when they park in and use roads that are not designed for them, and cause unnecessary pollution, as they do at present, the equipment will be activated. That would make the job of the police a great deal simpler.

I hope that my hon. Friend will see fit to give a fair wind to my proposal.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Like the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley), I was caught unawares by the rapid progress of this piece of transport legislation. This is an opportunity to address the problem that coaches pose to those of us who live and work in London, and to many people who come to London on public transport and end up touring London on foot.

Many of the major roads, and some of the smaller ones, are substantially blocked for long periods by coaches attempting to park, having off-loaded their passengers or, as the hon. Member for Christchurch suggested, driving around for no particular purpose—hardly an environmentally friendly activity. We must find ways to control that form of activity.

It has always struck me that the real red routes in London should be either the bus routes or the tube routes. They should be kept free for people to move quickly along them. The underground system should be designated a priority route and allowed to move speedily. The recent adverts on the backs of buses have been effective in getting the message across to those driving behind them. They call for people not to block the arteries of London by parking in bus lanes. If bus lanes and the underground system were red routes, we should have a public transport system and mobility around the capital that we do not currently have.

I do not know whether the technicalities of the amendment are easily achievable, but I am sure that where there's a will, there's a way. There must be a mechanical way of identifying where vehicles are. In the days of the Greater London council, heavy goods vehicles were required to have a permit to come into central London. That was one way of designating the limited number of vehicles which pass a particular test and of monitoring it. It would be a good idea—and probably an inevitable one—to control the number of vehicles coming into London. If we do not do that sooner, we shall do it later. One category of vehicle which needs to be controlled is that of coaches, but there are others not covered by the amendment. They are not public service vehicles, but goods vehicles. They too will need to be controlled, and various ideas about how to do that are now gaining support.

I hope that the Minister will be sympathetic to the idea that we need to tackle the growing congestion caused by coaches in London. The most modern technology could be deployed to do that. I am aware that the Government increasingly propose the use of modern technology for monitoring which types of vehicles take which routes and for enabling people to identify congestion on the roads ahead so that they can make alternative arrangements. If people are increasingly able to monitor which routes are free flowing and which are blocked, it must be possible to do something similar to what is proposed in the amendment. I hope that the Government will be sympathetic to the general idea, if not to the specific proposal.

Mr. Chope: I shall address my remarks specifically to the amendment. I invite the House to reject it, although I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) will withdraw it, because it is unnecessary.

The highway authorities already have sufficient powers under the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 to restrict or prohibit the movement of vehicles on their roads, including restricting the use of public service vehicles.

Mr. Adley: Is my hon. Friend the Minister aware that my right hon. Friend the Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke) and my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) and I met the last Secretary of State for Transport but two, more than three years ago to discuss these problems? He tended to say the same thing as the Minister. Westminster council has so far taken three years—it is not the councils fault—to draft the necessary orders and to obtain the Department's approval. The Minister was quick to give Westminster council the approval, but it has involved the local authority in a monumental amount of work and will involve it and its community charge payers in considerable expense. Theoretically, the Minister may be right in theoretical terms, but so far as I am aware, none of the London boroughs regards the matter as remotely as easy as he is trying to make out.

Mr. Chope: I am not underestimating the difficulties that local authorities may have. My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch referred to the expense to Westminster city council. Despite that expense, it has been able to set a reduced community charge for the coming year, and it must be congratulated on that. I understand that considerable effort is being made to try to achieve a voluntary agreement between coach operators and the local authorities. I am sure that my earlier announcement about extending the permitted parking powers and the parking regime so that local authorities have a greater say in the use of the roads for which they have responsibility—this will be relevant to the parking of coaches as well as to the use of coaches on the roads—will help to deal with the problem. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch would probably prefer that there were no coaches in London, but they form about 2 per cent. of the traffic in London and provide a valuable service.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) made a point about bus lanes. The red routes will facilitate the freer movement of traffic. We hope that one of the main responsibilities of the traffic director will be to facilitate the speedier movement of buses. That has been the early experience in the Archway pilot scheme.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch will accept that powers already exist. I have heard what he has said about the difficulties and technicalities of making the necessary regulations, but it has always been the policy of the Government and of the more enlightened local authorities that where there's a will, there's a way.

Mr. Adley: It would be unfair to detain the House longer on the amendment. It took me three years to persuade one of my hon. Friend the Minister's predecessors to invite the Chancellor to raise the road fund licence fee for coaches. I am sure that it will take a long time to overcome the damage done by coach deregulation. As Mr. David Weekes, chairman of the Westminster planning committee, said:

"Deregulation had left the Traffic Commissioners with greatly reduced powers."

The problem is greater than my hon. Friend the Minister is willing to admit, and sooner or later we shall have to deal with it. I am sorry that my hon. Friend does not see fit to accept what I thought was a fairly straightforward enabling amendment which I shall, of course, withdraw, although sooner or later we shall have to return to this matter.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 41

DESIGNATION OF PRIORITY ROUTES

Ms. Ruddock: I beg to move amendment No. 12, in page 38, line 9, leave out 'traffic' and insert 'people and goods'.

Clause 41 sets out the overriding objective for priority routes, or red routes as they are unpopularly called. The overriding objective is "improving the movement of traffic."

Although the objective for the priority route network are set out later in the Bill—primarily in clause 42—any conflict or weighting needed between objectives will have to be set in the context of the overriding aim.

Several amendments were tabled in Committee to attempt to broaden the overriding aim. Many of the roads proposed as red routes can reasonably be said to be concerned solely with traffic movement and they include the motorways and roads such as the A3 Kingston bypass. However, far more of the roads must serve a wide variety of purposes. The A23 in Brixton, for example, runs through what is primarily a shopping centre. The A203 South Lambeth road is mainly a residential road. The A304 Fulham road is a mixture of housing and local shops and in Putney, it becomes the local high street. Those roads are not primarily main arteries for traffic, and it is wrong to have that as an overriding aim.

The amendment seeks to replace the word "traffic" with the words "people and goods". That is not a meaningless difference. To the lay person, "traffic" is synonymous with vehicles. We should not be concerned with aiding the movement of vehicles per se, because vehicles are only a means to an end. The objective of the movement of traffic is more important and it is to get people and goods to their destination.

The distinction is becoming clear to users of the red route pilot scheme and can be seen clearly by organisations such as the Freight Transport Association. The FTA originally had some reservations about red routes, but it quickly became a firm supporter as the allure of less congestion was waved in front of it. That was obviously quite important for its members who drive their lorries around the capital. However, after experience of the pilot scheme, the FTA has now called on the Minister for a radical review.

Great difficulties have been encountered in delivering and picking up goods from premises on red routes. For example, a bread lorry was towed away while the driver was telling the baker that he would not be able to make any deliveries. The FTA now opposes the red routes because it realises that a few seconds off driving time is vastly outweighed by the extra costs to businesses that front on to red routes.

Businesses are reporting big problems up and down the pilot red route. The Islington chamber of commerce has reported that, on average, turnover in shops on the red route pilot scheme is down by 30 per cent. in comparison with the same period last year. In some cases there was a decline of more than 50 per cent.

Mr. Allason: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms. Ruddock: No, I do not have time.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): There is no time limit.

Ms. Ruddock: I am aware of that, but some of the hon. Lady's colleagues took up a vast amount of time discussing earlier amendments, and we are anxious to proceed.

The businesses to which I have referred are mainly small businesses which Conservative Members support, but they cannot continue to survive in the climate that I have described. The Minister's response to the concern has been to say that the businesses should not have been there in the first place and that they should not have started up in areas that already have parking restrictions. That comment is, in part, misleading. Most of the parking restrictions have not changed. We believe that parking restrictions should be enforced. In earlier amendments we tried to have parking restrictions enforced. We criticised the lack of enforcement of parking restrictions.

Mr. Allason: The hon. Lady has just contradicted herself.

Ms. Ruddock: Not at all. We have said that parking restrictions should be enforced and we moved amendments to that effect.

Mr. Allason: Except for bakers' lorries.

Ms. Ruddock: If the hon. Gentleman bears with me for a moment, he will understand my point.

The decline of 15 per cent. over the past five years in the number of traffic wardens has meant that parking restrictions are not enforced effectively. If businesses have continued to accept that parking restrictions are not enforced, they cannot be blamed for that. They have traded according to the local climate. However, I am not even defending that—

Mr. Allason: The hon. Lady must give way now. I will be very brief.

Ms. Ruddock: The hon. Gentleman may be brief, but he must wait until I have finished my argument.

I was simply saying that businesses operate in that climate. The important point is that the problem stems not just from parking restrictions that are being enforced now for the first time on the pilot red route, but from the new waiting restrictions. The problem arises not so much for customer parking as for delivery lorries making deliveries. Businesses are complaining about the loading restrictions that have been introduced with the pilot red route. Those restrictions are proving to be damaging to local businesses.

Even if that were not the case, the Minister's approach would cause large areas of blight in London. If shops and businesses are now deemed to be in the wrong places and must therefore go, it will be difficult to find other uses for those premises along roads like the pilot red route. The Secretary of State will become responsible for blight, but he will not be prepared to take action to remedy it.

Mr. Bowis: Does not the hon. Lady accept that, before a red route is designated—at the moment, we are dealing only with a trial scheme—there is an enormous amount of consultation, including consultation with the local authority? Nothing in the Bill requires red routes to ban parking at any specific time. That can be geared to the needs of a particular road. Surely it is not beyond the wit of man in local government or of the director of traffic to work out for each route a sensible scheme that meets the needs of deliveries and of the people living, working and shopping in the area.

Ms. Ruddock: There is much logic in what the hon. Gentleman says. It should be possible to work out a regime that is sensible and meets the obvious needs of people and goods, which is exactly what we are suggesting should be the priority and main consideration. That is the purpose of the amendment. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will support it. [Interruption.] I remind the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) that the Bill does not contain a mechanism that provides for public consultation. Our next amendment, amendment No. 13, which I shall also move, introduces consultation, because that is signally lacking in the Bill as drafted.

If there had been consultation that was as rigorous and considerate as the hon. Gentleman would wish, the problems that I am now outlining would not be occurring. Adequate consultation would surely have ensured that businesses would not now be encountering the immense difficulties that they are currently reporting to the chambers of commerce and to my hon. Friends the Members for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) and for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith).

9.30 pm

The amendment emphasises the needs of people and goods. It will mean that the overriding objective of the red routes is not simply the movement of vehicles, but the movement of people and goods to their destinations, which is what we suggest should be the primary aim of transport.

Another function of the amendment is that it will allow priority to be given to the efficient users of road space—the buses. Various hon. Members set out their view in Committee, which was that it is not possible to speed buses without similarly speeding cars, and vice versa, and that any move to speed cars will automatically help buses. However, that analysis is not accurate. Large-scale bus priority measures will speed buses, but will not affect car journey speeds significantly. It is a fallacy to suggest, as some Conservative Members have suggested, that bus lanes slow down other traffic. That is not the case, as long as they are properly designed.

Mr. Spearing: My hon. Friend has not yet mentioned—perhaps she is about to do so—that the movement of people, whether by bus or by car, might be enhanced by bus lanes, which would increase the time spent by people travelling in private cars, but there will be a net gain for everyone, with a better flow of people. That shows the inept and incorrect criteria that the Government are adopting in this part of the Bill.

Ms. Ruddock: My hon. Friend's points are well made. Large-scale bus priority measures would significantly increase the average speed at which people can move without significantly changing the average speeds of all vehicles. That is because buses are far more efficient users of road space than cars.

Furthermore, no-car lanes and other measures that aid lorries could speed the movement of freight without significantly increasing the volume of traffic or the number of cars, thus avoiding the environmental problems that that could create.

The distinction between traffic on the one hand and people and goods on the other is significant. The use of the latter definition would remove the overwhelming priority that has been given to passing vehicles and would allow a proper balance to be struck between access to red-route frontages and movement along those routes.

In the light of the experience of the pilot red routes, I hope that the Minister will concede that all is not well and that it is important to have much more regard than the Government have given in the pilot project to the movement of people and goods rather than stressing the simple speed at which vehicles can move past the homes in which people live and the shops in which they wish to conduct their business.

Mr. Adley: I am not unsympathetic to what the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) has said. I am sorry if that upsets some of my hon. Friends but I am bound to say——

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): My hon. Friend has already been reselected.

Mr. Adley: If I managed to vote against the poll tax without it causing me any problems, it will not be a problem if I agree with the hon. Lady. Having just returned from Ribble Valley, I am pleased to put that on the record.

The Government's phase of believing that the market is the only necessary discipline to deal with the problem of London's traffic should be consigned to the dustbin at the earliest opportunity. Unrestricted competition, certainly between coach companies, is one of the most serious problems that we face in London, although not the only one. Small numbers of people are brought into London by coach but the amount of congestion and pollution which the coaches create is out of all proportion. Therefore, the hon. Lady's amendment to replace the word "traffic" with the words "people and goods" is perfectly fair.

Westminster city council suggested in a recent document:

> "The Government should recognise that coach terminal provision in London is a strategic planning matter.
> The Government should support a dispersed terminal strategy.
> The Government should recognise also that coach parking in Central London is a strategic national matter and consider making it eligible for grant support."

My hon. Friend the Minister properly praises Westminster city council for its efficiency, but I assure him that the people responsible for dealing with the day-to-day problems of London traffic in that local authority will tell him that they are unhappy with the present situation.

The number of coaches towed away by the Metropolitan police rises inexorably. Indeed, when my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) was Minister for Public Transport, he produced some figures with which I shall not weary the House, which showed that the number of coaches towed away by the Metropolitan police was rising month by month. Unless we deal with the problems of priority routes properly, we shall continue to place an intolerable burden on the Metropolitan police. I am sure that none of us in the House would wish to do that.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that when the Sessional Order was moved at the beginning of this Session, I raised the problem of access to this building caused by the illegal parking of coaches in and around Parliament square. Mr. Cockram, the clerk to the traffic commissioners, has been in correspondence with an officer of the House, Mr. Brown, from the Select Committee on House of Commons Services. On 7 June last year, he said:

"On the evidence of recent checks, they"— that is a company called London Cityrama—

"appear to have broken one of those conditions and have now been warned about this. The breaches are not however such as to justify the Commissioner taking action to revoke the licence and nor does the legislation give him power to require them to use a different bus stop from that presently authorised."

So clearly there is inadequate legislation on the statute book to deal with the problem.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) will not mind if I quote correspondence from National Express, which is one of the worst offenders on trunk routes and other roads in London. I have a series of letters from various members of its staff who admit that some of the company's drivers have erred and strayed from their way like lost sheep, or not, as the case may be.

One letter of 2 November 1988 says:

"I am concerned to note that the vehicle's engine was running unnecessarily and I will ensure that the matter is brought to the attention of the owning company".

More recently, Mr. J. C. Myers, the managing director, wrote on 29 October last year:

"I have arranged for further notification to be sent to all of our operating companies reminding them of the restrictions defined by Westminster City Council."

A letter of 5 December 1990 said:

"I regret this further intrusion and your identification of vehicle registration numbers is helpful in sorting out offenders . . . I would seek to reassure you that we are taking action to stamp out this practice."

Two months later—indeed, only this morning—I received a letter which said:

"As you are aware, we have issued notices to all companies operating on the National Express network and your action in pinpointing specific times and registration numbers does at least enable us to trace individuals and arrange for the staff concerned to be disciplined".

They write letters, but nothing ever happens. We need to stiffen the legislation in the way in which the amendment proposes.

We need much greater use by my hon. Friend's Department of exhortation with the local authorities to install road humps—not on red routes—which will be yet another opportunity to slow down traffic and prevent unsuitable traffic from using some of the routes. The changes in the law which we have produced in the last few years have aggravated and in some cases created the problems of which we speak. The Bill deals with the overall problem of traffic; it seems to me that one class of offender —coaches—is still allowed to escape the rigours of the rules.

Mr. Chris Smith: I support the amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock). The red route proposals which the Government make in the Bill and which they are already implementing in my constituency are a classic example of putting the needs of the movement of traffic of and for itself before the needs of people and services. It is a case of the interests of commuters being put above the interests of local people, local traders and the local community.

The red route pilot scheme runs along Holloway road and Upper street, through my constituency. The Minister will know from my correspondence with him, and from the meeting that I had with his predecessor, together with the Upper street business association, of my fierce opposition to the idea and the content of the red route scheme. Its effect on local businesses has been severe. Its effect on side street parking for local residents has been adverse. Effectively, it has divided the community in two. It has the overall effect of drawing traffic into the area, whereas we should be attempting to reduce the volume of traffic passing through inner-city areas.

It is already having a discernible effect on local businesses and shops. Only this morning, I received a copy of a letter which the proprietor of a local shop, Aria, has sent to the borough council. I shall quote from the letter, because it puts the case succinctly:

"The red routes have been in operation now for some weeks and from the point of view of our business, the red route has proved a disaster. Whilst traffic speeds may have increased along Upper street this has been at a cost to the environment and in the long term the shops and businesses along it. . . . My area of greatest concern however is the effect on Saturdays when a greater number of people wish to visit the shop by car and yet restrictions apply as if it were a normal weekday. Levels of commuters and goods traffic are considerably less than during the week and there appears to be no sound basis for continuing with the red route restrictions in Upper street."

That is a clear statement of the problems for just one of many businesses which are adversely affected along the line of the red route.

I have a number of specific questions which I hope the Minister can answer. First, when will the review that he has promised of the operation of the pilot red route scheme be carried out? Secondly, will that review look not so much at the flow of traffic and the impact of the red route on the flow of traffic as at the impact on the local people and the local businesses? Thirdly, will there be any amendment to the operation of the red routes so that they operate purely at rush hours and not throughout the day until a late hour? Fourthly, will the red route be removed entirely, as it should be, on Saturdays? Fifthly, will there be provision for tidal operation of the red route rather than operation on both sides of the road throughout the day?

Sixthly, what has been the diversion of police resources to police the operation of the red route? Are they there to protect the interests of passing traffic or to patrol the streets and protect the interests, property and lives of my constituents? It seems that at present they are devoting undue attention to the needs of the red route.

Seventhly, will the Minister think again about the whole crazy idea of red routes? It is about time he did, and for once put the needs, views and concerns of people first. We in Islington do not want this red route imposed on us.

9.45 pm

Mr. Allason: I am in favour of red routes, and I urge the House to reject the amendment. The hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) is trying to have it both ways, because this is clearly a matter of priority. It is concerned with the movement of vehicles, and it would be sheer ideological nit-picking to substitute the words of the amendment, for this is a matter of getting buses moving. If the hon. Lady also wants to prevent lorries from stopping and unloading, she is advocating two contradictory plans.

The red route at Archway has been a great success. I understand that the traffic flow has increased by 30 per cent. I know that I speak for many other residents of the Fulham road, the A304, which is scheduled to become a red route, when I say that delivery lorries parking inconsiderately clog the flow of traffic. Such vehicles could easily move into side streets if they wish to convey a message that will take perhaps only 30 seconds to convey —for example, to say that there will be no further deliveries.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Allason) has a proper point to make about the implications for delivery and goods vehicles of changing the traffic flow, and it is right that we should consider that aspect.

The first principle of any traffic planning is that, if one creates a fast throughway for traffic, one draws more traffic to it, and the last thing London needs is more traffic. Traffic speeds in central London have slowed simply because there is far too much traffic for the capacity of London's roads. The more we investigate the possibilities of red routes, try pilot schemes and implement red route schemes more widely, the more we shall attract traffic down those arterial roads into central London and thereby congest the capital city.

I view with some apprehension any judgement by the Department of Transport that the Islington/Archway road red route is a success, because I have no doubt that the New Kent road and the Old Kent road, which run through the middle of my constituency, will be chosen because they are major trunk roads from London to Dover. They will obviously be considered as candidates for red routing.

If it were only a matter of containing the current amount of traffic and allowing that to pass in a less impeded way, that would be fine, but that is not the implication. Shoppers and pedestrians wishing to cross red routes find that they are more dangerous roads to cross and walk along. For those who live alongside those roads, there is more disruption and environmental disadvantage, with traffic pounding ever faster and in greater volumes along their frontages. That in all probability reduces the value of their properties even more, remembering that many people would not have chosen properties in the Archway road as homes even in the old days.

Mr. Bowis: I agree with the hon. Gentleman's remarks about not attracting more traffic into London. Does he accept that some of the traffic that comes on the faster flowing red routes has hitherto been rat running down residential streets, and that the interests of people living in those rat runs should also be taken into account?

Mr. Hughes: That is true, but the way to deal with that is to use traffic calming and other measures in side streets to stop the rat running and to make sure that we reduce the number of goods and private vehicles using the roads, thereby solving two problems. The problem of rat runs is solved, and that simultaneously reduces traffic coming into London. Such traffic ends up in the middle of the city and has to find somewhere to park or an escape route.

The GLC promulgated the good idea of encouraging vehicles to go round London rather than through it. The red routes will encourage drivers to come into the middle of London. As I said before, the red routes in London should be for underground trains and for buses.

Mr. Corbyn: The red route that we are discussing starts in Haringey and runs through my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). It is universally unpopular. In an answer today, the Minister told me that he had had 100 letters on the red route. Pressure of work or time, or an inability to count up to 100, prevented him from telling me how many of the letters were in favour and how many were against the red route.

I and my constituents object to red routes, because of the philosophy and principle behind them. Two years ago, the Government produced proposals for the east London assessment study, which was designed to create motorway-style roads into central London. The proposals were strongly opposed by people in my borough and neighbouring boroughs, and were subsequently withdrawn by the Government. It is interesting to note that the proposed red route follows roughly the line proposed for the major route.

We suspect that the red route's purpose is not to improve the safety or flow of traffic or the safety of pedestrians, but to bring more traffic on a fast route into central London, in this case to the City and docklands. Consultation on the system has been minimal. There was no consultation with the people of Islington about the principle of having a red route through their borough. We were consulted on the details of it being brought in. It is strongly opposed by people who see difficulty in crossing roads because of speeding cars, by people who are disturbed by increasing noise on the road and by those who suffer from disabilities and who are told that they can stop only in designated parking spaces, even though those spaces may not be outside the shops which people want to use.

At the start of the red route, there were farcical attempts by the police to move a post office van out of the way while the postman was emptying a letter box. He was told to remove his van and in future not to empty a letter box on the red route. As my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) said, there was an attempt to move a milk float. There have been other such incidents.

Many of the shops and businesses on the red route have no rear access. They are old buildings, and some of them have a mews access. Deliveries and collections have to be to the front door of the shops. That is a fact of life, whether or not it is convenient to the red route. A furniture shop on the route has had a 30 per cent. drop in takings simply because it cannot take deliveries during working hours when the furniture is brought into London from the manufacturer. In one case, a lorry came from north Wales and had to be sent back because it could not deliver.

People buying furniture from a shop on the route cannot take it away, because they cannot park close enough. The only alternative is to walk across the Holloway road carrying a double bed or a settee, and that presents more danger than a lorry parking outside a shop. The route has had a detrimental effect on the lives of people in the borough.

[Mr. Corbyn]

Hon. Members who do not represent inner-London constituencies should be told, if they do not already know, that, about halfway through the Committee proceedings on the Bill, a map produced by the Department of Transport showed a plethora of red routes to be introduced all over London. That was to be done by an unelected, unaccountable, appointed traffic commissioner with powers over local authorities to do as he or she wished. In future, traffic management will be a form of dictatorship.

Our objection to the red route is not just the increase in traffic but the philosophy of increasing the volume and speed of traffic while in ignorance of the needs of pedestrians, people with disabilities, people who wish to shop in the area and those who wish to deliver to or collect from shops.

There are already signs of a significant drop in the takings of all the small businesses along the red route. That will lead to their closure. Around the Nag's Head, at the junction of the Seven Sisters road and Holloway road, Jones Brothers, once a major department store in the area, has closed, as have other shops. Dead shopping areas are appearing all along the route.

The Minister must understand that people who live in inner-city areas usually have a lower level of car ownership than those elsewhere. Less than half the households in my borough have access to a car, never mind the individual use of a car. The needs of pedestrians and public transport are more important to them than increasing the number of commuter motorists, often in taxpayer-subsidised cars, tearing in and out of London.

The solution to London's traffic problems does not lie with traffic management schemes such as the red routes and all that goes with them; it lies with the philosophy that increases accessibility to public transport and reduces its cost. That is the way forward for the city, not by bringing more traffic into an already overcrowded and polluted central area of our city.

Mr. Chope: This debate is largely about semantics. [Interruption.] If Opposition Members look at the terms of the amendment to which they have been speaking, they will see that it seeks to substitute a new word for the word "traffic". People who are travelling and freight that is being moved are important considerations, but people and goods are moved by vehicles, and vehicles constitute one part of the dictionary definition of traffic. The other part of the dictionary definition is people.

The Bill and the red routes are all about freeing the movement of traffic to cut down waste and pollution and to improve safety. Those are desirable objectives. The essence of the scheme is primarily to improve the movement of traffic, and that is what needs to appear on the face of the Bill.

Mr. Spearing: Does the Minister agree that the movement of goods and people can be achieved by various modes, including shoe leather and crossing the road? In the Minister's book, movement by traffic seems to mean movement by motor vehicle. It is not a semantic difference —it is a big and fundamental difference.

Mr. Chope: The hon. Gentleman will probably accept that the movement of people by bus and the movement of goods by lorry are important considerations. The movement of people who service the community in London by van is also important. All those are difficult considerations to balance, but we think that, by concentrating the through traffic in London on the main routes, we shall be able to relieve the pressure on the other routes. The red route scheme is gaining increasing popular acceptance.

When London Weekend Television wished to do a hatchet job on the Government's red route proposal, it sent a crew up the red route in the morning and back again in the afternoon, speaking to many people on the route, including motorists and others. But at the end of the day, when the crew came to interview me, it had to accept—contrary to what the producer had hoped—that the red route was a pronounced success. But then—surprise, surprise—LWT did not feel it necessary to show that programme.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Does the Minister accept the proposition that there will be more traffic on that red route?

Mr. Chope: I accept that the creation of a red route will make it easier for traffic to move away from the other routes and on to the main route. That is the essence of the scheme. We hope that the amount of traffic in London will not increase significantly, but it is important that we should make the best use of London's main roads, because it is clear that the people of London do not wish to have a lot of new purpose-built roads imposed upon them.

Mr. Hughes: Does the Minister accept that the creation of a red route will increase the amount of traffic passing along that route, wherever it comes from?

Mr. Chope: Yes, if it is successful, it probably will. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) looks dissatisfied with that, but surely it would show that the red route was a success.

Many comments have been made about the effects on businesses. I am sure that the hon. Member for Islington, North will have noted that it is not merely businesses in Islington which did not have an especially good January.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Road Traffic Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Boswell.]

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Chope: A firm in Knightsbridge has not been doing especially well on the retail side recently, but it has not blamed its lack of business on a red route.

We shall have to await the results of the monitoring being carried out by the transport and road research laboratory. As I have already said, I am willing to meet people from the business community.

Mr. Corbyn: I understand that the report is being prepared. To what extent will it look into the business and social effects of the route on shops and so forth alongside it? If the report deals solely with traffic movement, it will not answer many of our objections to the route.

Mr. Chope: As I understand it, the transport and road research laboratory is making a comparison with what is happening in Streatham, where there is no red route, so it will be able to compare effects on businesses and shops there in the same period with the effects of the red route in Islington.

There has been a great deal of disinformation and exaggeration about the impact of the red route. Many of the businesses complaining about it were already in unsatisfactory positions. Three of the businesses which have complained are located next to bus stops, on zigzags next to traffic signals—as they were before the red route was introduced. Ten other businesses which have complained about the new red route are complaining about enforcement of regulations which applied before. There is certainly more provision for proper loading and unloading facilities on the pilot red route than existed before. That will be helpful to the community in Islington, especially when work on side roads has been completed.

I do not think that I shall be able to persuade the hon. Member for Islington, North that red routes are the right answer, as he argued against them articulately and emotionally in Committee, but I am sure that people in London will come to appreciate the initiatives that the Government have taken by introducing red routes.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

10.15 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes: I beg to move amendment No. 13, in page 38, line 15, after 'Commissioners', insert

'(bb) such organisations of road users as he thinks appropriate;'.

I shall be very brief. This amendment was tabled by Front-Bench Labour Members, and I have supported them. It may be that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) and one or two of his colleagues will add a word or two in support of my remarks.

The amendment concerns the process by which red routes are established. The Bill, as drafted, includes a provision for consultation with three different agencies —the relevant local authority, the relevant commissioner or commissioners, and London regional transport. The amendment would result in the inclusion of such organisations of road users as the Secretary of State thinks appropriate. This is geared intentionally to ensure that all those other people who would be affected by the creation of red routes were consulted. The obvious categories include pedestrians, who are likely to be among the most severely affected categories, and users of public transport.

It seems to me that this is an appropriate and uncontroversial amendment. Ministers always have reasons for opposing amendments that are not of their own making. Those reasons can be either technical or substantive. I believe that there is no fundamental, profound or justifiable reason for resisting this amendment, and I hope that the Minister, having won the last skirmish, will be generous enough to admit that this is a good idea.

Ms. Ruddock: Throughout the Committee stage, Members on both sides expressed concern about the very limited consultation requirements that the Bill lays down. At no point in the procedure for the definition of priority routes or for the preparation of objectives, the network plan or local plans, is there any requirement for the public to be consulted in any way. At best, this principle is accepted only in the case of local plans drawn up by the local authorities, which would expect to consult local businesses and residents in any case. So far as the other cases are concerned, the Minister made it clear in Committee that he expects local authorities to consult local residents and businesses. That is hardly adequate. These are Government schemes, not borough schemes, and boroughs are hardly in a position to explain the details of such proposals, or the thinking behind them, when questions arise—as they surely will.

In the case of the London assessment studies, the Secretary of State accepted this point and agreed that civil servants should present the consultants' proposals to public meetings, as only then could the civil servants be in a position to explain them properly. Even though the civil servants objected initially, this procedure was followed, and most would agree that, although consultation was in many ways inadequate, it was a considerable advance on any form of consultation previously offered by the Department of Transport.

Not only has the Minister refused to accept that point in this case, but he refused in Committee to accept that boroughs should accept the costs of this consultation. He also said that, generally, there would be a period of two months for consultation. After taking into account the time taken to dispatch information, collate responses, write reports and send those reports to Committee members, two months, in terms of local authority practice, would allow the public a maximum of about one week to respond, and in, many cases, no time at all.

Given the fact that these proposals will dramatically affect many people's lives and activities, this is hardly adequate. The Minister may expect the boroughs to consult their residents. As I have said, we believe that such consultation would be totally inadequate, but there are also a number of road users' organisations that cannot be consulted in that way.

Mr. Bowis: Up to now, the hon. Lady has been talking about consulting the public. This amendment refers not to the public but to organisations of road users. One is aware of organisations such as associations of road hauliers and chambers of commerce, but what about the organisations that represent our constituents who drive on these roads?

Ms. Ruddock: The hon. Gentleman misses the point. We discussed at length, in the previous amendment, the fact that it is not just the movement of vehicles or the people who are moving through London that worries us, but all the people in the neighbourhoods, many of whom my hon. Friends represent in the case of the pilot scheme.

I was about to say that the boroughs are not responsible for the views of the RAC, the Freight Transport Association, the Pedestrians Association or the London Cycling Campaign. Many of those organisations, particularly the latter two, have many members in our constituencies. Indeed, they consist of no one other than ordinary members of our constituencies, who choose a variety of modes of transport and whose views must be properly represented.

Mr. Bowis: That will take place in the consultation. But we also need to hear from Londoners who have to drive.

Ms. Ruddock: If Government policies were different, with proper support for public transport, many of the people to whom the hon. Gentleman refers would not need to travel on the roads but would have alternative modes of transport. It would then be possible for organisations of passengers who travel by public transport to be represented.

Mr. Bowis: That is different.

Ms. Ruddock: Indeed, it is different. But if the hon. Gentleman refers simply to those many individual car owners who travel through areas of London but have no reason for being in a neighbourhood, for example for shopping, the only organisations that represent them are those such as the RAC, to which I have already referred.

Mr. Bowis: I am not referring to people who do not live in the area. If one is to have consultations with organisations, one must consult fairly, across the board, with organisations covering all road users. One specific group of users comprises people who live in London but who use their vehicles—because they have to, because they choose to or because public transport is not available. How would the amendment relate to them?

Ms. Ruddock: The amendment can deal only with organisations that exist. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will acknowledge, as I suggested earlier, that the RAC could be deemed to represent individual car users. Nowadays, organisations such as the RAC and the AA are not simply rescue services but have developed a broad tranche of transport policies, and they represent car users. If the hon. Gentleman has in mind any other representative organisations, we shall be happy to hear from him. If he says that there are no organisations in existence, his suggestion is impossible. We seek to make available consultation to legitimate organisations that obviously represent a variety of forms of road users.

I repeat that there are organisations that should be consulted. The Bill gives the members of those organisations no right to be consulted whatsoever. That is the purpose of this minimal though important amendment. It would not be responsible of the Minister to put the responsibility for such consultation on to the boroughs, especially with the short time scales that he is proposing and without any extra finance. It is hardly sensible to expect the boroughs to consult more widely on proposals which are not theirs. I hope, therefore, that the Minister will take this modest proposal seriously and accept it.

Mr. Spearing: As I said on Second Reading, I have a particular reason for speaking on this amendment about consultation. I wish to show that, with better consultation, some of the misconceptions and difficulties of the scheme will be revealed. It is possible that I am the only person —certainly the only person on the Floor, although perhaps not in parts of the Chamber that we cannot name—who has been involved in implementing such a scheme.

It is now 25 years since the former Greater London council introduced clearways in London. Those clearways were designed to do almost exactly what the Minister is attempting to do with the red routes. A clear and comprehensive plan was developed across the river—where it should be—by a strategic, policy-making organisation for London. It relieved the House of matters with which it should not concern itself at this time of night, or any other time.

The plan involved a considerable amount of consultation. I remember going to many boroughs. Four sub-committees were dealing with the issue, and we spent hours round the tables in town halls trying to balance the need of the increasing movement of traffic against the needs of frontages along unique pieces of highway.

The Minister will know some of the high roads in the London borough of Wandsworth. Many of the potential red routes are along roads that existed as country lanes before London became a built-up area—for example, Streatham high road, East hill, Wandsworth, and Wandsworth high street. There are many roads in the Clapham and Battersea district with which he will be familiar from his local government days, which were built up in Edwardian times. Some of those roads were tram routes, and were thoroughfares long before the motor car or lorry became common.

A thoroughfare is not the same thing as a road; it is a multi-purpose phenomenon. It is true that it always has a road carriageway in the middle. Originally, horses and carts, trams and cycles went down the carriageway, but a thoroughfare is much more than that. It includes the pavements, the businesses, the houses, as well as the cross-routes that join the main carriageway, typical of Edwardian and Victorian London.

Further out of London there are roads that were built, specifically with traffic in mind, in the 1930s. Some of those roads were modified—for example, the Kingston bypass and parts of the A13. Some new arterial roads have been built specifically for traffic.

I suspect that the roads that the Minister has in mind and those on which he will be making designation orders are urban thoroughfares of the sort that I have described, which, for reasons we all understand, are the inner thoroughfares leading to outer arterial roads. The Minister wants the traffic-carrying capacity of those thoroughfares to impinge on the local community.

The Bill states that the Minister should take note of the unique circumstances of each scheme and consult on them, as the Greater London council did on clearways. Perhaps the Minister will explain why the clearways scheme cannot be extended as a concept, beefed up or modified, because it was the original scheme. It was not perfect, but it improved the flow of traffic without impinging too much on the interests of local people.

The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis)—there are many such roads in Battersea—asked which organisation should be consulted. I have no doubt that both he and the Minister are often approached by old-age pensioners' associations, which are sensitive to issues such as traffic lights and zebra crossings, which present desirable opportunities for people to cross roads. If the Minister takes a census—I do not know whether the transport and road research laboratory is conducting one—he may find that the number of people walking up and down the road or wanting to cross it on foot is larger than the number of vehicles using it.

Thoroughfares provide just as important a function for pedestrians as vehicles, sometimes more. There are often many more pedestrians walking up the sides of London roads than travelling on them. Victoria street might be a good example. One must take account of the fact that the flow of traffic is often lower than one might think. What about pensioners' organisations? All of us who use roads know that traffic lights must be phased. A judgment must be made at every intersection about the balance of traffic, including cross-traffic and local traffic which does not run on the trunk routes. It has to be decided how much time to allow for each phase.

When the Minister designates red routes and it comes to designing or redesigning the phasing of lights, the organisation that runs the lights—I bet that most people, even hon. Members who represent London constituencies do not know what it is——

Mr. Corbyn: Yes, I do.

10.30 pm

Mr. Spearing: Perhaps some do, through consultation. That organisation says that, in his order, the Minister said that priority must be given to such routes, to the disadvantage of local traffic which has to make cross-journeys. It does not involve only pedestrians but other movements in the same area. That problem may be covered by local authorities, but why should not the chambers of commerce that cover the appropriate red routes also be consulted?

I mentioned zebra crossings, but what about pelican crossings? Sometimes, they are more effective and efficient. If there are too many zebras, the traffic is held up, perhaps unduly. It is thought that it does not matter too much if pedestrians wait for 15 seconds to let the traffic pass. They can press the button and cross in a group, which is why pelican crossings are sometimes more effective and efficient. The Minister must bear in mind when he makes an order for a red route the fact that pelican crossings will disappear, or a pedestrian will have a much longer wait.

I have a vivid recollection of a route in a former constituency of mine—Western avenue in Acton. That was built for traffic, and the poor pedestrian could not cross it. I was assailed by residents' organisations which asked me to induce the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths), when he was a Minister at the Department of Transport, to do something about it. The residents did not have even a pedestrian signal, so they had to watch the main traffic lights and cross four lanes of traffic, if they could. An official came and got his feet wet, marching up and down to identify improvements to the route which are now enjoyed by the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young).

If the ill-begotten scheme and the vast complex statutory jungle of 28 clauses following clause 41 are accepted, they will be a barrister's paradise, a bureaucrat's nightmare and a citizen's jungle. There should be proper consultation with bodies that are relevant to each local scheme, because there will be users of the thoroughfares as well as of the carriageways.

Mr. Corbyn: I support the amendment, and I am grateful to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) for moving it.

The clause states that, before making a priority route order, the Secretary of State shall consult the London authority—the borough council—

"the relevant Commissioner or ... Commissioners" and London Regional Transport. We had a lengthy debate about that in Committee and the Minister told us that it was the local authority's duty to consult local organisations. He said that it should be the local representative body that dealt with local opinion and views.

I have no problem with that, because my local authority went to enormous lengths to consult people about the red routes and to convey the opinions of local people to the Minister. It faithfully conveyed local opinion through its transport committee and the council itself, to the effect that there was massive opposition to the red route. Unfortunately, the Minister, in his high-handed and didactic fashion, ignored and overrode the wishes of local people.

Other local authorities in London may not be as cautious in consulting local opinion as the borough of Islington attempted to be. In Committee, even the Minister accepted that Islington had gone to considerable lengths to consult local groups. Other borough councils may not do the same or may not have the resources to undertake a consultation exercise.

One feature of the introduction of the red or priority route system in London has been that expensive schemes and consultation documents are put together by the Department of Transport, which local organisations then rebut. The local organisations want to propose their own ideas, but they do not have the resources to do so. The Minister should, in fairness, tell us what assistance may be given to local organisations so that they can propose their own traffic scheme.

When dealing with road planning, there is a David and Goliath approach. The Goliath of the Department of Transport descends on the poor unsuspecting folk of one community and then expects them to produce, in a short time, an alternative view if they disagree with the Department's ideas.

We suggest that there should be a guarantee of consultation with those who use particular roads. Some organisations do not operate within one borough boundary; they may go far wider. An example is the Dial-A-Ride Users Association, which operates across London and which has local derivatives, such as the Islington Disablement Association. Groups representing the disabled should be represented. Those who represent pedestrians who live in a particular area should be represented, as should those who represent cyclists, those who represent delivery and collection, and local shopkeepers and business people. All those groups should be consulted and represented. The local authority's ability to put forward its view on the question before it is also important.

I find it rather depressing that, in 1991, when we should be talking far more about the development of activities and control in matters such as traffic, we face strong Government centralisation of local decision-making. It is depressing, as my own borough council of Islington has devolved its activities into 24 neighbourhood offices, which are popular within the borough. They give greater contact between the council and the people, and they provide far more effective consultation on issues such as traffic. Yet the borough council is unable to control what goes on with traffic across the borough.

A conglomeration of London boroughs banding together cannot decide what goes on Londonwide. Instead, the Secretary of State for Transport makes local and detailed decisions on where traffic flows go and on what powers the traffic commissioner has over neighbouring streets and sideworks. It is depressing that we should be moving into a period of centralisation.

If the system is brought into operation in London on the back of the abolition of our strategic authority, hon. Members who represent constituencies outside London should beware. If the Government abolish the county councils, these proposals will grow like triffids all over the country.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): Like what?

Mr. Corbyn: Like triffids—John Wyndham's book, for the uninitiated. Triffids grew up everywhere.

Hon. Members will find that the process of red routes and of centralisation of traffic management comes directly under the Department of Transport. We already live in an over-centralised country. These proposals will make it far more centralised.

We propose a slight mitigation. There would have to be consultation with all groups of road users who have a legitimate point of view to put. The consultation proposed in the Bill is limited and rests solely on the need of wheeled traffic to get more quickly through the area. That wheeled traffic is largely cars and, to some extent, buses. I want the needs of pedestrians and those with disabilities to be taken into account—indeed, the needs of the community as a whole should be taken into account. It cannot be lost on Conservative Members that, if one speeds up the traffic on a particular road, one increases the dangers to pedestrians. That will also increase the sense of isolation between communities on each side of the road. If the small shops are killed off, the bigger shops will be killed off, and if that happens, the shopping community will be killed off.

As the Minister drives along the Archway road in his publicly owned and chauffeur-driven care, if he looks out of the window, he will spot a large graffito which reads "Red route = Dead route."

The red route is damaging the community. There should at least be wider consultation so that all the effects of increasing traffic speeds and flows can be considered before a priority route is imposed on a community that does not want such a route.

Mr. Chris Smith: I support amendment No. 13 because it seeks to widen, to a certain extent, the process of consultation that must be undertaken before a red route can be designated. I would like the amendment to go further. The Secretary of State should have a statutory duty to consult local residents and businesses about a proposed red route instead of relying entirely on the channel of communication available to local people through their local authority.

In the limited consultation on the pilot red route scheme, the local authority quite correctly relayed to the Minister the near-unanimous view of local people and businesses that they opposed the red route proposal. However, the Minister completely ignored those views. Instead, he placed enormous emphasis on the anecdotal evidence of a London Weekend Television crew which stopped a few drivers on Upper street and asked them what they thought about the red route in operation. If a Transport Minister can make crucial decisions about transport in that part of London in that way and place more reliance on the hearsay ad hoc evidence of a television crew than on the carefully consulted evidence from the local authority, the provisions in the Bill cannot be sufficient.

The Department of Transport's consultations about the pilot scheme for the red route were completely inadequate. The idea for it germinated during consultation on the east London assessment study. At no stage in those discussions, or in proposals from Department of Transport officials, was the prospect of a red route mentioned for Archway, along Holloway road, Upper street and into City road. The only consultation—[Interruption.] It would help if the Minister would listen to the debate. These matters are of crucial importance to my constituents. If the Minister treats my views and those of my constituents with the disdain that he is showing now, I cannot be surprised by decisions taken by the Department of Transport.

Mr. Corbyn: Does my hon. Friend recall that, when he and I consulted people in Islington about the way in which the east London assessment study would affect the borough, we also asked our respective constituents about the red route and we received similar replies? Those responses were conveyed to the Secretary of State in the response to ELAS, but those responses were ignored and we discovered that the first priority route scheme was to be in our borough.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend leads me to my next point, which is that the only real consultation that was offered to my constituents on the institution of a red route along Holloway road and Upper street was when concrete proposals were set up in an exhibition in the town hall, with the Department of Transport telling us, "This is what is going to happen. We invite your views on it." A fait accompli was presented to local residents, with no real opportunity for local people to make it known to the Department of Transport that they did not want the red route in any shape or form.

Mr. Spearing: My hon. Friend will have noticed that the Secretary of State for Transport is listening to the debate. Will my hon. Friend conjecture on the possible views of an hon. Member representing an Edinburgh constituency if a route in Edinburgh were in the hands of a Secretary of State for Transport in Whitehall whose constituency was on the south coast? Would not such an hon. Member's constituents take objection to that fact, and does not much the same apply to us, in principle?

10.45 pm

Mr. Smith: I hesitate to be drawn into a constitutional debate about the proprieties of the legislation as between Scotland and England. Nonetheless, my hon. Friend has a valid point and I am grateful to notice that the Secretary of State is in his place on the Treasury Bench and that he is listening to our debate with considerably more care and attention than his Under-Secretary, the Minister for Roads and Traffic.

Mr. Corbyn: Is my hon. Friend aware that the A1 is known as the London to Edinburgh main road?

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend has a point. Indeed, the route that was chosen for the pilot red route lies along the route of the A1.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Smith: For the last time, because I wish to make some progress.

Mr. Bottomley: Is not the A1—the road to Edinburgh—slightly to the east? Is not the hon. Gentleman discussing a road that goes up to, say Chester? We seem to have gone slightly off course.

Mr. Corbyn: The Edinburgh road is the A1. The hon. Gentleman is thinking of the A5.

Mr. Smith: The hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) must know that the A1 passes precisely along Upper street, Holloway road and Archway and finally heads north towards Edinburgh.

It is obvious from what happened with the institution of the pilot red route and from the Minister's response to that consultation that the consultation has been inadequate. The amendment seeks to improve that by, at the very least, including some provision for consultation with road users.

The Minister made great play on amendment No. 12 of the fact that there had been misinformation about the impact of the red route. I must advise him that the only disinformation is in the Department of Transport. It is not among local people, who know full well what the implementation of the pilot red route has proved and is proving to be.

The Minister conspicuously failed to answer the series of questions that I asked when I spoke to amendment No. 12, although I am sure that he has every intention of writing to me with his responses to those questions. Perhaps he will write to me with his response to this question also. Under what legal authority at present is a car that is parked on a Saturday afternoon on a single yellow line within, one must admit, a dotted red line along the red route in Upper street in my constituency—[Interruption.] The amendment relates to red routes and consultation. We are talking about the interests of road users. If a road user parks a car on a red route on a single yellow line within a dotted red line on a Saturday afternoon, when parking on that single yellow line——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I find it difficult to see how that matter can possibly arise under the amendment.

Mr. Smith: I do not wish to contest your judgment, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but as you will appreciate, the amendment is about the consultation which the Secretary of State has to undertake before designating a red route. It is about consultation with "such organisations of road users as he thinks appropriate".

Under what legal authority can a road user with a car who wishes to park on a single yellow line inside a dotted red box on the red route which has been implemented on a pilot basis in my constituency on a Saturday afternoon —when parking on a single yellow line is usually perfectly in order—be taken to task by police and charged with committing an offence? Once the Bill is passed, the position may be different, but what legal authority exists at present for the police to issue a ticket on that vehicle? I should be grateful if, perhaps after consulting his officials, the Minister could provide me with an answer to that question.

The Minister said earlier that the people of London would "appreciate the initiatives that the Government have taken in implementing red routes."

The Minister is mistaken, and if he consulted properly, with not only local residents but road users, he would find out that he was mistaken. We need more consultation, more consideration and more circumspection about red routes and rather less of the complacency that we have had from the Minister during out discussions this evening.

Mr. Chope: I am in no way complacent about the red routes, but I have to admit to being satisfied with the early effects of the pilot red routes. Indeed, I recall some Opposition Members suggesting that the red routes would never achieve their purpose and that the traffic would not flow more freely. Now that the traffic is flowing more freely, they have diverted their criticism and say that the routes will be at the expense of the local community.

The basis for the provisions for consultation on the priority route network is precedented in the Local Government Act 1985, which provides for consultation with the local authorities, but not with a whole host of other organisations. We think it reasonable that there should be statutory consultation with the authorities mentioned in the Bill, but that does not mean that there will not be provision for informal consultation by the Secretary of State with other organisations.

Mr. Corbyn: What would be the position of a local community organisation which felt that its local authority was unwilling, incapable or simply had not represented its views to the Secretary of State? Would it have redress against the local authority, or would it have direct access to the Secretary of State? It is a real problem which I can envisage occurring in some places.

Mr. Chope: That is a continual problem with any consultation in a rich democracy. Some organisations feel that to be consulted effectively means that they should have a veto on the outcome, when in fact their views simply have to be taken into account. I am sure that a democratically accountable local authority in London would not wish to ignore representations from such an organisation but would allow organisations to inform its view, to be passed on to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State as part of the formal statutory consultation process.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I have not checked tonight, so I am not 100 per cent. certain, but my recollection is that, when we debated the London Regional Transport Bill in Committee, at a fairly late stage the Government conceded that there should be included in the Bill formal provision for consultation with users and with the community. It may not have been in the Local Government Act 1985, but I think that it was in the London Regional Transport Act 1984. I ask the Minister to reflect on whether that precedent is more valuable than the precedent that he is citing.

Mr. Chope: The reason why I cited my precedent was that, as the hon. Gentleman will know, under the Local Government Act 1985, we established designated roads very similar to the roads that we are talking about under the Bill. In deciding what roads were to be designated, there was provision in that Act for statutory consultation with the council of the London borough in which the designated road was, and the council of any other London borough or county where it was likely to have an effect. It was assumed that, as part of the consultation process, those boroughs would represent the feelings of their citizens to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I understand that. Obviously the boroughs can do that, being a conduit of the views of local people and organisations. None the less, may I press the Minister to be brave, break from his brief and say that he will at least consider the precedent in the London Regional Transport Act and consider, obviously for potential amendment later rather than today, whether it would not be a good PR exercise for consultation with the public at large to be written on the face of the Bill?

Mr. Chope: I have already reflected, following the debate in Committee on the matter. That is why I referred to the precedent of the 1985 Act. That precedent relates to roads in London. The hon. Gentleman asks a reasonable question, and I shall certainly have inquiries made about the precedent which he thinks goes the other way. I cannot recall which way that precedent goes.

We do not intend to introduce the red route network without consultation, but I think that the way in which the Bill sets it out is right and that it would be for informal consultation by my right hon. Friend with some of the other organisations.

Mr. Corbyn: I am interested in what the Minister says about not introducing a wider red route network without consultation. Can he explain the origin of the curious map which appeared in Committee and seemed to show a positive plethora of red routes all over London? Who has been consulted on that? As I understand it, the commissioner has not been appointed, so he has not been consulted yet—if it is a he.

Mr. Chope: Indeed, the traffic director has not been appointed yet, and we do not know whether the person will be male or female. The map, which I am glad the hon. Gentleman found helpful, set out the designated routes to London. It set out a number of the other main highway networks in London. The hon. Gentleman will recall that the original consultation paper on the red routes for traffic in London set out on one page, in quite vivid colour, the routes which we had in mind. That is not the final word on the matter, and there will be consultation following the appointment of the traffic director before my right hon. Friend decides which roads in London will be involved.

Mr. Corbyn: What is the status of the map?

Mr. Chope: It was an attempt to be of assistance to the Committee. This is the first time today that there has been a direct reference to the map. I assumed that, because hon. Members had the map before them in Committee, that facilitated the speedy dispatch of the business.

I do not think that I can add further to what I have said. We take the whole issue of consultation seriously, but we do not think that there is any purpose in writing into the statute provisions which are not strictly necessary.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Government may have a slightly more positive view towards integrated planning, and the traffic director's post may be a jobshare. Will the Minister consider that possibility?

Although the Minister shows some reticence about going further than his brief—clearly, his reflection has not persuaded him to go all the way with us—he seemed to suggest that there was a slight chink of hope that the amendment might be accepted. On the basis of being ever hopeful that there is redemption for Ministers, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 43

The Traffic Director for London

11 pm

Mr. Chope: I beg to move amendment No. 45, in page 39, line 6, at end insert—

'(3A) The Director shall keep under review the manner in which the London authorities exercise their functions under the New Roads and Street Works Act 1991 in relation to priority routes or roads which, in his opinion, are likely to affect traffic using any priority route.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I suggest that it would be convenient to discuss at the same time Government amendment No. 52.

Mr. Chope: I need not detain the House for long. The amendment incorporates in the Bill the connection with the other legislation that hon. Members will shortly have a chance to consider—the New Roads and Street Works Bill.

Mr. Simon Hughes: As I was not a member of the Committee, I apologise if the point that I now raise was canvassed there. Amendment No. 52 proposes to add the provision:

"Where a London authority are asked by the Traffic Director for London to designate a street as a traffic-sensitive street" and so on. What will constitute a traffic-sensitive street? I presume it is a term of art.

Mr. Chope: Traffic-sensitive streets are roads in which works would cause significant disruption to traffic under the terms of the New Roads and Street Works Bill. They will have applied to them special requirements for the planning and co-ordination of those works. In other words, local highways authorities will have power to give directions to undertakers of works governing the timing of the works. So the highway authority will be very much in the driving seat in ensuring that the minimum amount of disruption is caused by street works on those roads.

Ms. Ruddock: I understand that the details of the way in which the traffic-sensitive route provisions of the New Roads and Street Works Bill will operate have been worked out by a joint local authority/local utility working party and that that working party is not aware of the proposals in amendment No. 52. It seems to that working party that those proposals would greatly undermine the spirit of co-operation that now exists in the working party. It appears, according to the amendment, that the traffic director and the Secretary of State could reach an agreement over the heads of local authorities and local utilities and ignore any agreement that might have been reached by the joint working party.

Mr. Corbyn: Perhaps the Minister will explain amendment No. 45 in more detail. I understood that, under the New Roads and Street Works Bill, local authorities would be responsible for co-ordinating pavement and street repairs after various statutory undertakers and others had completed works. Why is it necessary for the functions of local authorities to be removed in respect of the priority route network?

I am not clear to what extent the authority of the traffic director will extend beyond the priority route. Will it be the immediate junctions, feeder roads to them or any roads that could be affected by the priority route scheme? If the definition were drawn at its widest, large areas of a borough might be handed over to the control of the traffic director rather than remain with the elected local authority.

Mr. Chope: The answer to the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) is that amendment No. 52 provides for the traffic director to request the London local authorities—the highway authorities for priority routes or roads—which are likely to affect traffic on any priority route and to designate those as traffic-sensitive. If a local authority were to fail to comply with the traffic director's request, the amendment gives the director a right of appeal to the Secretary of State, who may direct that the local authority complies. That seems eminently reasonable. Indeed, some people might think that power to issue such directions should be given to the traffic director himself. We do not seek that power, and I hope that that will be taken as showing the spirit of co-operation to which the hon. Member for Deptford referred. The hon. Lady says that that is not what they think. Perhaps my explanation will allay their fears.

Mr. Corbyn: Do I understand the Minister to say that the power of an order would rest solely with the Secretary of State, who would have to hear a report from the traffic director about the director's dispute with the local authority and then decide whether to make an order? Would such an order be subject to parliamentary approval?

Mr. Chope: I do not think that it would be subject to parliamentary approval, but the procedure about which the hon. Gentleman speaks would take place. The traffic director would have to put his case to the Secretary of State. If the local authority wished to put an alternative view, the Secretary of State would have to adjudicate.

Amendment No. 45 would require the traffic director to keep under review the manner in which the local highway authorities discharge their duties under the New Roads and Street Works Bill. The most important of those is the duty to co-ordinate works of all kinds in relation to priority routes and other roads likely to affect traffic on a priority route. It is envisaged that in that way the director will have access to the register which will be established by the Bill. That will enable him to maintain an oversight of the conduct of roadworks affecting the performance of priority routes.

The hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) asked about the distance from the priority routes of roads that could affect those routes. Obviously, that depends on circumstances. I cannot give a more precise answer, but that is the common-sense answer to the hon. Gentleman's question.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 45

Duty of London authorities to prepare local plans

Mr. Spearing: I beg to move, amendment No. 41, in page 40, line 41, at end add—

'(c) the needs of frontagers for road access and short term parking:

It is in order to remind the House of the context of the amendment. An extraordinarily complex set of orders, regulations and so on were the subject of an exchange during debate on the last amendment, and I was completely lost. I understand that the Minister can make an order for a section of road, and that he does so in accordance with management guidance under a statutory code that he intends to issue. He will also issue objectives to the so-called director of traffic, who is really a director of red routes. Therefore, there will be statutory objectives.

There will also be a London network plan, which may emerge in due course to be contained on the map to which my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) referred. We then descend to council level. Having received all these pieces of paper, each London authority must draw up a local network plan. Clause 45(6) states:

"a London authority shall have regard to—

(a) the Secretary of State's traffic management guidance; and

(b) the network plan."

I assume that management guidance subsumes the statutory objectives, which means that the authorities have many criteria to look at.

The amendment deals with "the needs of frontages . . ." If the local authority does not take note of the needs of local frontages, who will? The Minister rejected an amendment moved on behalf of organisations and said that local authorities would look after them. The needs of frontages are very important. I do not understand why that is not there. I hope that the Minister will have another look at this.

As I pointed out earlier, if the use of the thoroughfare is to be oriented to the needs and speed of traffic, which is the object of the Bill, the needs of the frontagers will be squeezed out. If the needs of traffic are to be emphasised in the "traffic management guidance", and if they are to be further emphasised in the objectives, which are large and can be made by the Secretary of State whether he comes from Scotland, Northern Ireland, Wales or London, the local authority does not have to have regard to anything else, because the Bill says that the local authority "shall have regard".

In other words, the poor old local authority, which is the last statutory bastion of local interest, is or could be —I ascertain that that would be the Minister's objective —prohibited from having regard to the needs of the local frontagers. If the Minister's guidance, management guidance and objectives cut that out, local authorities cannot do it. Moreover, they cannot do it by a combination of statute which I have tried to unravel and the predilections of the Secretary of State and his Minister, which have been made all too clear in earlier debates.

One might imagine, as the Minister said grandly, that the Secretary of State will consider an appeal from the director, answer an Adjournment debate, and so on, but that will not be the case. It will not even be Ministers who looks at such matters. They are great political figures with national and international matters, constituency matters and party matters to attend to, regardless of the political party to which they belong.

One Secretary of State—this is a true story—was outside his property one day when a man turned up with a brown envelope. He asked whether the Secretary of State was the householder. When he said he was, the man gave him the brown envelope. The Secretary of State opened it, to find that it informed him that the Secretary of State was minded to designate his land as being of special scientific interest. The Secretary of State said, "This is wrong," to which the man said "Oh no, Sir—I assure you it is correct." The Secretary of State said "You're lying." When the man, affronted, asked why, the Secretary of State replied, "Because I am the Secretary of State for the Environment." That was the right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley).

Such decisions will not be made by any of the Ministers here today—or their successors, who might be some of my hon. Friends here. They will be decided by others. It was difficult enough for members of the Greater London council to decide on such things. They will not be decided by Members who can be tackled in the Lobby by an affronted Member. Unless the Minister accepts my amendment, the needs of frontagers will be statutorily cut out. I am surprised about that, because some of the frontagers will be people whom Conservative Members might wish to encourage. I might also wish to encourage them, as I encourage small-scale private or public enterprise which helps the common weal.

If roads are to be converted into semi-racetracks and all the criteria of traffic management applied thereto, frontagers' interests will be ignored. My amendment does not tell local authorities that they should give those interests priority; only that they should "have regard to" them. But as written and as spoken to, as the Bill goes and as the Executive have made clear, they shall not have regard to the needs of the frontagers, whether it be in Upper street, Islington, Streatham high road, East Hill, Wandsworth or wherever the roads will run. As I said, many of them will be in the sort of high streets which were common in Edwardian and Victorian London.

[Mr. Spearing]

I hope that the Minister will have second thoughts and that he will accept the logic that I have attempted to erect in moving this amendment.

Frontagers need road access, not necessarily parking. Consider the needs, not of shops or premises, but of a disabled or elderly person who wishes to unload some furniture, and is not parking in the strict sense of the word for 10 minutes but merely for three or four minutes. That is what is meant by frontager's access to the road. Occasionally they need access.

Short-term parking could mean for the purposes of delivering to shops, waiting while someone goes into a premises to collect children, going to the doctor's, or picking up someone who is a little late because they are delayed inside the house. All those things are very important for frontagers on such thoroughfares. As the Bill stands, and according to the Minister, however, they will not be regarded by the local authority, which is the last bastion of defence for the liberty of the subject in this matter.

11.15 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes: My Docklands colleague, the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) and I have a self-interested constituency fear about prospects. I guess that a road which passes from west to east along what is roughly the northernmost boundary of my hon. Friend's constituency might be a fairly obvious candidate for designation before too long.

Mr. Spearing: Barking road.

Mr. Hughes: The A2 is also likely to be a sure candidate for a red route, given that the A1 has already undergone a trial.

My best response to my hon. Friend's story about the former Secretary of State being served a notice is that this morning, before I left home, I heard a knock upon my window, which is only a couple of feet from the road. Today is the second day since the local authority opened a neighbourhood housing office on the site next to my home. I think that the site must have been chosen deliberately for fairly obvious reasons—to add to the mischief that the local authority can impose upon me. The person who knocked on the window had been going up and down the road for some time and had been unable to find anywhere to pay her rent, so she offered it to me. I was minded to take it, but integrity got the better of me and I directed her to the building next door, which is the neighbourhood housing office but has nothing on it to say so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South spoke to the amendment tabled in our names. I must mischievously remind him about the second part, which is printed over the page, which I wish to tackle as well. We want consultation by the local authority, which will take into account two main worries—frontagers' needs for road access and parking, which my hon. Friend mentioned, and "the safety, convenience, and amenity of residents on and adjacent to any proposed priority route."

I can be brief because it is even more self-evident that this amendment poses no difficulty for the Minister, and I anticipate that if he is feeling generous he may be able to accept it readily. The amendment specifically gives a duty to the local authority, not to the Government. Governments are always more willing to impose duties on local authorities than to accept duties imposed on themselves or on any officer or official appointed by them.

The amendment will make the 33 London boroughs have regard to management, guidance, the network plan and these extra requirements. As regards

"the safety, convenience, and amenity of residents on and adjacent to any proposed priority route", will the Minister give an undertaking that the interests of people living on or adjacent to, for example, the A2, which is the Old Kent road and the New Kent road, will automatically be taken into account by the local authority? If there is any doubt about that because the Bill is not explicit, just as we encourage good planning practice by consulting people in the immediate neighbourhood of a planning application, we should surely encourage good traffic planning practice by requiring consultation with, and an obligation to have regard to the interests of, those living nearby.

The planning legislation does not always work well—not least because consultation is not obligatory, but an optional extra for local authorities. It is good practice, but they do not always follow that practice—sometimes intentionally, but more often accidentally. The amendment would impose that duty on them. It would be encouraging if my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South and I could leave the debate knowing that an obligation would be placed on our local authorities to consult the relevant people.

I entirely understand that, if we are to have a red route—the Minister already knows my views about that—we cannot have a red route which suddenly has vehicles parked along it affording delivery to the frontages, or short-term parking for other reasons. It is a perpetual problem to reconcile the needs of those who have, over the years, lived next to or run a business on a main road. I am always receiving complaints. One example is a shop called Jay's on Lower road, Rotherhithe—an old family business which has been there for years. When there was very short-term parking outside—when something was being delivered, or someone with a disabled person's badge was leaving a vehicle—a second later, a traffic warden would appear out of the blue and either issue a ticket or, on occasion, do something worse, the vehicle would be taken further down the road and someone would be inconveniencing the traffic for a long time.

I have complained when goods vehicles have parked on roads which are needed for the through passage of traffic, reducing a two-lane road to a one-lane road. Neither my hon. Friend nor I would argue that the nature of a road is not changed by allowing indiscriminate parking at any time, by any vehicle, for any purpose. We are saying that consideration must be given to reconciling the needs of established users of the road with the needs of those who are using the road. I hope that the amendment will prove appealing.

Mr. Corbyn: I support the amendment, especially paragraph (d). The initial effect of the priority-route scheme thrust on the people of Islington is the difficulty experienced by people using local shops, especially the disabled. Pedestrians have had problems trying to cross the road, because of the increased traffic speeds in the central part of the Holloway road; I am not sure whether that applies to either the Archway or the Upper street end.

Mr. Chris Smith: That is true of most of Upper street: traffic has, on the whole, speeded up. My hon. Friend must also bear in mind the fact that the two bottlenecks at Holloway road and the Angel still exist at either end of Upper street, so there has not been massive benefit for the traffic using it. Between those two points, however, the speed of the traffic, and therefore the potential danger to pedestrians, is much greater.

Mr. Corbyn: I thank my hon. Friend. The concern that we have been expressing all along is that the next thing that will happen is that the Secretary of State will come along and take one look at Archway island, Highbury corner and the Angel and decide that we need a massive road widening scheme, which will increase the volume of traffic that can use the road and so create further problems.

The amendment refers to

"residents on and adjacent to any proposed priority route."

They should surely be borne in mind, but our experience so far is that they are not, and that traffic—including parking and delivery vehicles forced off the red route—tends to park on side streets as near as it can to the priority route. The traffic wardens and police have been told to direct their efforts towards the red route, and apparently the policing effect on the immediate side roads has been reduced to the extent that disabled persons' parking bays the council has had a considerable number installed—are now often occupied by vehicles delivering to shops and other nearby establishments. It is a serious problem.

I hope that the Minister will understand that much more thought needs to be given to the problem. It is no good merely rushing in with a red route, without the necessary local junction works that should go with it and without proper consideration of the needs of the local community. The message that is conveyed by that lack of consideration is that the one purpose of the red routes is to get a greater volume of traffic moving more rapidly through a highly built-up area which in fact needs less traffic, less noise, less pollution and greater mobility. The red route offers none of those things.

Mr. Chope: I have much sympathy with the points made by Opposition Members about the importance of the needs of frontagers and residents in relation to priority routes. Certainly their needs will be taken into account in the development of priority routes and in the implementation of the measures in accordance with approved local plans, but there is no need for them to be referred to specifically in the clause, as suggested in the amendment.

Those considerations, and other issues—such as safety and environmental questions, special help for buses and facilities for pedestrians and cyclists—will be fully discussed in the traffic management guidance produced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State under clause 42. I know that the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) is sceptical about whether my right hon. and learned Friend will ever look at the guidance that he issues, but the hon. Gentleman may be familiar with the traffic management guidance issued in April 1987 under paragraph 6 of schedule 5 to the Local Government Act 1985, following the demise of the GLC. I have not consulted the then Secretary of State, but I would be most surprised if that detailed document had not been examined by Transport Ministers.

The traffic management guidance, which my right hon. and learned Friend has established is up for consultation, will set out the Secretary of State's objectives in designating the priority routes and will provide the overall framework within which the traffic director and the local authorities must work. The traffic director will be required to pay regard to the guidance in preparing his network plan under clause 44 and the local authorities will be required to pay regard to both the guidance and the network plan in preparing their local plans under clause 45.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Minister makes a reasonable point. Is he saying that the guidance that will be given by the Secretary of State will explicitly require a local authority, in preparing its plan, to have to regard to the two categories of user dealt with in the amendment? If so, what will be the sanction or remedy for those concerned if the local authority does not fulfil that requirement properly?

Mr. Chope: The same remedy will apply as applies under statutory law at the moment for any local authority that unreasonably ignores the representations made to it. The hon. Gentleman will be as familiar as any other hon. Member with the provisions for judicial review. Those are the remedies that will be available.

Mr. Hughes: What I want to know is whether the traffic management guidance will set out effectively the duties of the local authority. That is what we are trying to insert in the Bill. I cannot speak for the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) in saying that, if we were to receive from the Government an undertaking that this requirement will be set out in a secondary document, we should at least know that the local authority would have to have regard to these categories. That would certainly help us, and I am sure that it would be of interest to the people who will ultimately be affected by the proposals.

11.30 pm

Mr. Chope: After the local plans have been drawn up, the interests about whom the hon. Gentleman is concerned will be taken into account when the orders giving effect to those plans are drafted. There will be consultation and, under existing legislation, there is provision for a public inquiry. Anyone who feels that his interests is ignored could have his say at that stage.

Mr. Simon Hughes: It would be helpful if, in due course, the Minister were to set out for the benefit of those who are interested—I am thinking especially of hon. Members representing London constituencies—what specific duties, by way of consultation with residents and businesses, it is envisaged a local authority will have.

Mr. Chope: I shall be happy to do what the hon. Gentleman suggests.

I hope that I have been able to allay some concern. The traffic management guidance will not be identical to, but will in a sense be based on, the guidance that was issued in 1987. Hon. Members who examine it will see that it goes into quite a lot of detail. I hope that, in those circumstances, the hon. Gentleman will feel able to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Spearing: It seems that there are one or two misunderstandings. I do not think that I suggested—certainly I did not mean to suggest—that the Secretary of State for the Environment, or any other Minister, would not examine the guidelines for the red routes. My suggestion was that the Secretary of State would not be able to give particular orders the attention that those affected think they should have. I have told the story about the Secretary of State being informed that the Secretary of State was going to serve a notice in respect of his own property. Surely that amounts to a warning. I did not suggest that the guidelines would not be looked at. It is a question of detail. Because of the facts of time and politics, cases are unlikely to receive the attention that they deserve.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) is right to emphasise the question of residents. I have mentioned the cases of disabled people and children, but the hon. Gentleman brought to mind something that is even more important. The amendment that I drew up about a week ago referred to residents on and adjacent to any proposed priority route. The knock-on effect of a priority route will be significant for those whose properties are adjacent to it.

Let us consider the case of an existing priority route where certain parking is allowed, or where traffic wardens' discretion is exercised reasonably. Here, people will seek parking places, possibly for some distance, along the side roads—a matter that has been mentioned already. In an earlier intervention, I mentioned Barking road, which is not very far from the ground of West Ham United. Parking problems have arisen there already, although the situation generally is well organised by the police. But in such circumstances all sorts of things could happen. These red routes will cause a great deal of knock-on trouble. What about the question of property values, for instance?

Amenities include values, and I should imagine that the value of any residential or other property adjacent to or especially facing a red route, would take a dive in value almost immediately after the maps are published. Our exchanges may cause estate agents throughout London to seek copies of the map that was available to the Committee. I can imagine Tory Members receiving letters from their constituents, saying "The value of my property is going down. We did not know that these would be red routes, and they have reduced the value of our property by x per cent."

The Minister may consider that that is inevitable. However, to instruct local authorities to take the map into account but deprive them of it is quite extraordinary. The Minister's responses so far have been that the Government could include it in the guidelines for red routes, but he did not undertake that the same considerations—virtually the words in the amendment—would be included in the Bill. In response to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey, the Minister carefully and skilfully avoided making that commitment. I am surprised, because he is only taking it into account. If he does not include it in the new guidelines, he is implying that the Government cannot or should not take it into account, which centralises the matter even more.

The Minister has taken some matters on board, and I hope that, before the Bill is considered in another place, he will publish the draft guidelines for red routes. He referred to guidance that was published earlier for traffic management after the abolition of the Greater London Council. Why, therefore, can he not publish the Government's objectives? After all, they are referred to in the Bill and will be very important, I hope that those who consider the Bill in another place will take note of those objectives, guidance notes or statutory guidance. Can they really consider the issue before the objectives are published? Had I been on the Committee, I should have wanted the draft objectives and guidance to be available because, without them, the merits of earlier clauses could not have been properly assessed.

The Minister has taken account of some of those matters. He may wish to negative the amendment, but I feel strongly enough not to withdraw it, in the hope that the matter will be taken up in another place.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 45

DUTY OF LONDON AUTHORITIES TO PREPARE LOCAL PLANS

Mr. Chope: I beg to move amendment No. 17, in page 41, line 18, leave out 'on the priority routes to which their plan relates'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 18 to 22.

Mr. Chope: The amendment reflects the Government's willingness to listen to the Opposition's representations. I said that I would consider one particular issue that they raised in Committee, and the amendment reflects our acceptance of their arguments on that occasion.

Ms. Ruddock: In a few small ways, we have had some victories in Committee. We are grateful to the Minister for bringing the amendments forward now.

Amendment agreed to.

THE DIRECTOR'S TRUNK ROAD LOCAL PLANS

Clause 47

THE MINISTER'S TRUNK ROAD LOCAL PLANS

Amendments made: No. 21, in page 44, line 14, leave out 'on the priority routes to which their plan relates'.

No. 22, in page 44, line 15, after 'exercise', insert

'on or in relation to the priority routes to which their plan relates'.—[Mr. Chope.]

Mr. Corbyn: I beg to move amendment No. 14, in page 45, line 1, leave out from 'any' to 'debt' in line 38 and insert

'The Secretary of State may, by order subject to negative resolution of either House of Parliament, require any reasonable expenses incurred by him in the exercise of his powers under subsection (7) above to be paid to him by the London authority.'.

The amendment is important. One of the more disquieting features of the Bill is that it gives the traffic commissioner powers over local authorities. In addition, it gives him powers to override the wishes of the local authorities to do works in their districts and then charges them for it. The amendment seeks to allow some parliamentary scrutiny of what is taking place.

As I said earlier, the Bill provides for significant centralisation of power away from local authorities towards central Government. We seek to provide that the Secretary of State may,

"by order subject to negative resolution of either House of Parliament, require any reasonable expenses incurred by him in the exercise of his powers under subsection (7) above to be paid to him by the London authority."

That would allow parliamentary consent for what is an invasion of the prerogative of local authorities in local traffic management schemes. We tabled the amendment for that purpose.

The Minister did not make it clear in Committee why such centralisation was necessary. He is unable to point to an example of any London local authority which is unwilling to discuss the problems of traffic passing through its district. Local authorities have a different philosophy from the Secretary of State, in that the majority of Labour-controlled authorities believe that London would be better off if there were less traffic rather than more. We believe that there should be a traffic authority—subject to democratic election—for London as a whole. The Bill does not propose that, and we are not likely to get it from any legislation stemming from the Bill.

We can expect the Secretary of State to be answerable to Parliament for what charges he places on local authorities; otherwise, an unelected official might disagree with a local authority. The Secretary of State would hear the dispute between the local authority and that official and might decide in favour of the traffic director for London. A substantial bill would come to the local authority, which might be charge-capped and not able to divert resources to traffic works. It might have decided that its priorities lay elsewhere. There should at least be parliamentary scrutiny of such action.

Mr. Chope: I cannot accept the hon. Gentleman's argument. The intervention by the Secretary of State, under the provisions of the clause, would be part of a last resort, when all attempts at persuasion had failed. The hon. Gentleman said that it was impossible to quote a precedent for that—obviously it is at present, because we have not started to implement the scheme. But if what is happening in Islington is indicative of what might happen in future, who can say whether such powers will be necessary? I hope that they will not be, but if they are needed, it is reasonable that the Secretary of State should be able to recover his administrative expenses from local authorities. It is not appropriate for him to have to present an account in the form of a statutory instrument to be laid before Parliament.

Mr. Corbyn: It is all very well for the Minister to say that, but we live in a country where the expenditure of local authorities, particularly in London, is under the tight control of central Government policies and directives. In reality, we have a process of fining local authorities for alleged non-co-operation in the implementation of the priority route schemes by the Secretary of State, who cannot be brought to Parliament to account for his actions. That is totally unsatisfactory.

I should have thought that the Minister would recognise that local authorities have a legitimate role in traffic planning and management in London. If they do not, perhaps he should be honest and say that he wishes to take over all traffic management and planning in London, rather than using the stealthy approach and taking over only priority route schemes. That appears to be the logic of his answer.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 63

APPOINTMENT OF PARKING ADJUDICATORS BY JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE LONDON AUTHORITIES

11.45 pm

Mr. Spearing: I beg to move amendment No. 42, in page 55, line 46, leave out 'this part' and insert 'sections 54-65'.

We now move from the controversial subject of red routes to the equally—if not more—controversial subject of parking. Clauses 54 to 65 are labelled "Parking in London" and contain yet another series of guidelines on parking for local authorities, which are to be issued by the Secretary of State. The authorities will have to draw up a series of proposals, and the guidelines cover almost seven pages of the Bill. I am sure that they were discussed at great length in Committee. Following your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I will not venture into that, although I am sure that a fascinating description of the guidelines would be in order, as they are about to descend on unsuspecting Londoners.

The guidelines on parking tell local authorities what to do. I doubt that they relate only to red routes, but perhaps the Minister will clarify that. As I understand them, they apply to parking in general and therefore subsume parking in or around red routes or areas affected by red routes.

It is curious that the guidelines involve appeals, new bodies and a vast amount of bureaucracy, which is extraordinary coming from a party that does not believe in that sort of thing.

Clause 63 states that a joint committee of London authorities shall be set up to appoint parking adjudicators. Paragraph 3(a) relates to the amendment. It states that the London authorities shall,

"with the consent of the Lord Chancellor, appoint persons to act as parking adjudicators for the purposes of this Part of this Act".

[Mr. Spearing]

Having carried out a great deal of traffic management through the red routes, the Secretary of State seeks to take complete control of parking guidance. That puts in the shade something that he said earlier today about the local authority authorities taking control of parking. If they have to deal with parking under his guidance, it may differ from what some of us were led to believe earlier.

Not content with that, the Bill states that the local authorities will name the persons who, with the Lord Chancellor's consent, will be the adjudicators. Their duties will include responsibility for parking matters, including the costs. The rules that they will have to follow will be rather complicated.

I can imagine what will happen. When there is a hassle, someone will ask who appointed the adjudicators. The Minister will be able to say that the local authorities appointed them. As has happened in so many other spheres, the Government's responsibilities will be loaded on to local authorities.

I suggest that it would be more appropriate if the proposals were not in the clauses that deal with red routes, but in clauses 54 to 65, because they deal with matters refer to parking in general. It seems that the proposals refer back to the earlier clauses which relate to red routes. That suggests that the adjudicators may also have a great deal of power over the red routes.

I hope that the Minister will clarify the matter. Have the adjudicators any functions in respect of the red routes in clauses before clause 54, or are they concerned only in duties and obligations in clause 54 onwards? If the answer is the latter, I suggest that the Bill should say so. If the former, can the Minister tell us what role the adjudicators will have in respect of red routes? They are yet another group of persons amid a plethora of local authorities, directors, Ministers and guidance with which we shall have to grapple.

Mr. Chope: The adjudicators will be concerned with the latter of the two categories referred to by the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing). However, it is fair to say that, if there is a permitted parking area on a red route, it will come under the local authority parking regime to which the Bill refers. The adjudicators will be able to adjudicate on grievances in relation to the penalty for overstaying on that parking area.

I understand that the hon. Member for Newham, South is trying to be helpful and is suggesting a drafting improvement. I am advised that the intention is set out clearly in the Bill as drafted. However, in the light of what the hon. Gentleman has said, I will look to see whether any benefit could be gained from further clarification.

Mr. Spearing: By leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am grateful for the clarification, but it makes my worries even greater. The Minister has confirmed that, where parking is allowed on red routes—perhaps where the roads widen or where there is a facility for parking that does not interfere with the traffic flow—and there are disputes, grievances or matters coming within their jurisdiction, the adjudicators will have statutory powers. That is the present position.

Yet again, therefore, we confirm the all-to-frequent position—dare I mention the poll tax—in which authoritarian legislation from the centre has to be administered. In this case, it will be administered by semi-judicial fiat adjudicators who are appointed by the hapless local authorities. In an earlier debate, it was said that the local authorities cannot even take into account the proper—in my interpretation—interests of frontages, both residential and otherwise.

Although I understand why the Minister has clarified the matter, it shows only that the scheme will cause a great deal of trouble in London and to the Government. I cannot push the amendment, so I thank the Minister for his clarification and tell him that it will cause him and everyone else an awful lot of trouble.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 64

FIXING OF CERTAIN PARKING AND OTHER CHARGES FOR LONDON

Amendment made: No. 23, in page 58, line 15, leave out subsection (8).—[Mr. Chope.]

Clause 69

INTERPRETATION OF PART II

Amendment made: In page 60, line 31, at end insert—

'(3A) In determining, for the purposes of any provision of this Part of this Act, whether a penalty charge has been paid before the end of a particular period, it shall be taken to be paid when it is received by the London authority concerned.—[Mr. Chope.]

Schedule 2

AMENDMENT TO SCHEDULE 2 TO THE ROAD TRAFFIC OFFENDERS ACT 1988

Ms. Ruddock: I beg to move Amendment No. 15, in page 66, line 10, column 4, leave out '3' and insert '4'.

The effect of the amendment is to increase the penalty for driving after making a false declaration about physical fitness, from a level 3 fine to a level 4 fine. Section 92 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 deals with the physical fitness of drivers. An applicant for a driving licence must disclose in his or her application whether he or she is suffering or has ever suffered from certain disabilities. The Secretary of State must refuse a licence to an applicant who is suffering from a relevant disability. The disabilities, which are prescribed by regulation, include epilepsy, severe mental handicap, liability to sudden attacks of giddiness or fainting and acute short sight.

Clause 16(1) amends that section of the 1988 Act by inserting a new subsection, making it an offence to drive a vehicle if the person involved knows that the declaration about physical fitness in his or her application for a driving licence is false. Paragraph 21 of schedule 2 introduces a consequential amendment to schedule 2 to the Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988, setting the penalty for the new offence at a level 3 fine.

This is an important area of road traffic law because the condition of the driver of a vehicle is as important as the condition of the vehicle. It is not simply selfish or stupid to drive when medically unfit to do so, it is also potentially dangerous to other road users.

The amendment would increase the penalty for that offence from a level 3 to a level 4 fine. It is important primarily as a way of highlighting the importance of the offence. The amendment would also bring the penalty more into line with the penalty for driving after a licence has been refused or revoked under section 92 of the 1988 Act, which is six months imprisonment or a level 5 fine.

It is, however, important to add that the amendment deals with only one aspect of the problem: to ensure that people who are not medically fit to drive do not do so and therefore do not create a road safety risk for other road users. Equally important—and in the current financial climate more difficult—is the need to ensure that alternative forms of transport are available through concessionary fare schemes and the availability of services designed specifically to help people with disabilities so that they are not tempted to continue to drive and to break the law. I hope that the Minister will accept this simple amendment, which will increase safety on our roads.

Mr. Chope: I am happy to accept the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed: No. 34. in page 66 line 48 after second 'accident)', insert '(a)'.—[Mr. Chope.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 16, in page 66, line 48 leave out from 'in' to end off line 49 and insert

'columns 3 and 4 there shall be substituted—

(a) Summarily	(a) six months or level 5 on the standard scale or both.
(b) On indictment	(b) "two years or a fine or both".'.

Government amendment No. 35.

Ms. Ruddock: I want to refer to amendment No. 16. The act of failing to report an accident can have serious consequences. It may mean that a casualty is not dealt with as speedily as would otherwise be the case. It may mean that valuable evidence, in terms of either the state of the driver or the condition of the vehicle is lost, and it creates additional work for the police as a result of having to trace the driver and establish the circumstances surroundingg the incident. In short, it is an extremely serious offence which can have costly implications, both for the individuals concerned and the police.

In certain circumstances—for example, where a driver is over the legal alcohol limit— there may be a temptation to run. It is essential that in such cases the driver is in a position where the consequences of running are likely to be worse than not running.

Amendment No. 16 would increase the maximum penalty for failure to stop and report an accident to two years imprisonment or a fine, or both. The amendment would further provide different maximum penalties for the two different modes of prosecution.

Mr. Waller: Eight or so hours ago, I paid tribute to my hon. Friend the Minister for listening to what had been said in Committee and for tabling an appropriate new clause. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend once more because, following what I said in Committee, he has moved an amendment that goes a long way towards implementing what I suggested.

The recommendations of Dr. North were not invariably correct. He failed to take account of varying degrees of culpability attached to the offence of failing to stop to report an accident. The Magistrates Association was unhappy with the more restrictive discretion accorded to courts. I welcome the fact that that has been recognised and that the discretion that will now be available to courts in terms of the number of penalty points that they decide to award in individual cases will be much greater. That is a great improvement, and it should be welcomed. That is a tribute to my hon. Friend the Minister.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) for his comments. I cannot accept amendment No. 16, suggested by the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock), because it goes too far in increasing the maximum penalty to as much as two years' imprisonment. I hope that the House will reject that amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Mr. Chope.]

12.1 am

Mr. Corbyn: The Committee and Report stages of the Bill have been fascinating. I wish to put three brief points on the record. First, like everyone else, I welcome any methods that improve road safety and the safety of road users, be they in a car, pedestrians, cyclists or anything else. However, the Bill is, in many ways, a missed opportunity. We in this country are in danger of presiding over an enormous increase in the amount of road traffic when we should be considering alternative means of transport and the environmental effects of the continually increasing use of private motor cars. We should be especially concerned about the effects of that on our cities.

Secondly, part II contains a major extension of central Government powers over those of local authorities, with the introduction of the priority route scheme. That will not enhance safety; it will increase the levels of noise, dust and gas pollution in our inner city areas. The Government will take powers away from the local authorities which badly need them and will introduce a traffic director for London, with whom traffic commissioners will work.

Thirdly, if the Bill is enacted—I suspect that it will be—the Government will achieve the principle of taking many traffic planning measures away from local authorities in London, and exactly the same could be done in other parts of the country. We are moving to a ridiculously centralised state where very localised traffic matters can be decided by the Secretary of State for Transport and charged to the local authority. The principle of reducing the number of cars and the amount of traffic that enters the central area of London, or any other major city if the provisions are extended to other cities, has been ignored.

The people of London have made their views clear when opposing motorway building schemes and the introduction of the priority route scheme. They do not wish to see more traffic in the inner urban area. They want less. They want a cleaner city, with fewer cars and better public transport. I wish that the Bill met the needs of Londoners in that respect. Tragically, I fear that it does not.

12.3 am

Sir Philip Goodhart (Beckenham): By legalising speed cameras and red light cameras, part I should make a major contribution to the improvement of road safety. Part II, and the red route scheme, should make a major contribution to easing traffic congestion in the capital. I am sorry that the Opposition have been so churlish in their approach to the Bill's efforts to ease congestion and that they seem anxious to let traffic jams continue.

12.4 am

Mr. Spearing: This should not have been a matter for party controversy. Traffic in London has been a continuing concern of all its citizens, of whatever party, throughout the past century. The Bill will not ease the major causes of congestion because they are not even logged or known by the Department of Transport, which can be proved by the fact that it could not answer certain questions that I have asked over the past two or three years. The Bill might increase traffic flow marginally on certain routes, but it will do so at great cost. It is largely impractical. It will take considerable resources in person power. It is bureaucratic to an almost unbelievable degree. The statute is complex and will cause a great deal of difficulty, even to lawyers.

The tone of part II of the Bill is authoritarian. It imposes central will on local government and even prevents local authorities from properly protecting the interests of people within their areas. It gives power to central Government to an unprecedented and almost unimaginable degree over matters which are certainly local government matters in London. No Government, of whatever quality, power or party, would seek to impose the measures in the Bill which affect London or Birmingham, Cardiff or Edinburgh.

Part II of the Bill is thoroughly bad and will have to be revised. I hope that it rebounds on its perpetrators.

12.6 am

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) has paid his tribute to the parliamentary draftsmen. Part I of the Bill is a culmination of the work of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker), whom I am pleased to see in the Chamber, with the interdepartmental committee of officials and the establishment of the North committee. We should also remember Judge Frank Blennerhasset, who more than 20 years ago got us moving on some of the issues which are important for cutting casualties.

I hope that part I gets through the House of Lords without serious amendment but possibly with improvements. The Parliamentary Advisory Council on Transport Safety amendment, which was not selected, was important. It dealt with retesting after disqualification for drink-driving. I hope that the House of Lords will consider the measure. When this legislation is out of the way, I hope that the House and the Government, together with the voluntary bodies among whom PACTS and the Campaign Against Drinking and Driving, will consider other ways in which we can cut casualties.

It may not be possible to cut minor casualties by a third by the year 2000, but it ought still to be regarded as a heavy responsibility to cut the number of deaths and serious injuries by a third. That will require a combination of vehicle measures, such as pedestrian-friendly car fronts, and a method of dealing with our appalling record of casualties among children, which is caused by a mixture of problems with our road layout, education and parental control and chaperonage of young children. I hope that when the Bill becomes an Act we shall see the same effort put into those measures as has put into polishing up the Bill presented to the House last year.

Mr. Fearn: I have sat quiet for the past two hours, although for the first six hours I was not quiet. My party gives almost wholehearted support to the intentions behind the majority of the measures contained in the first part of the Bill. Some of the clauses could have been in line with the recommendations of the North report. As I said earlier, I am disappointed that Conservative Members were not allowed a free vote on random breath testing. I would also have liked hon. Members to be given the opportunity to debate the measures on re-testing through an extended driving test of drivers disqualified as a result of alcohol-related offences.

On the whole, the measures in part I of the Bill should make our roads much safer. I cannot give the same support to part II. The concept of red routes is misguided and the appointment of a traffic director for London, with such powers as the Bill confers on him, is undemocratic. Local authorities have lost many of their powers under the Government, and the appointment of a traffic director, or one-man quango, weakens their role even further. However, my party will support the Bill in the interests of road safety.

The Committee was a good one and I congratulate the chairman, who was excellent and very expeditious. I am disappointed that the Minister did not accept any of the amendments that I tabled on behalf of the Joint Committee on Mobility of the Disabled and even more disappointed that the two amendments dealing with the disabled which I tabled were not selected today. The needs of disabled people should not be forgotten. Unfortunately time and time again they are. Disabled people are not catered for adequately on the public transport system. Often the private motor vehicle is their only means of travel. I hope that amendments to ensure that their needs are taken into account will be tabled in the other place.

Red routes are not the answer to London's traffic problems. What is needed is a full Government commitment to resource the whole London transport system, so that it is operated in an integrated way. That is what the Government should be considering, not red routes.

12.9 am

Ms. Ruddock: When we began the debates on the Bill, we said that there was much good in it, and that we would co-operate in Committee and hope to improve some parts of it. We were pleased to support new driving offences and construction and use provisions, all of which were designed to improve safety on our roads. Indeed, we had a pleasant Committee in which there was much consultation and co-operation.

Tonight's debate has been exceedingly disappointing in that a major opportunity to add to road safety and to reduce death and injury due to drink driving has been lost. We regret very much that there was not a free vote on the Government side, because we understand that a recent survey of hon. Members gave clear testimony to the fact that a majority of hon. Members, voting according to conscience, would have supported the new clause on random breath testing.

Some hon. Members seemed to say that it was not worth allocating extra resources to police forces to deal with the problem. I said in the debate, and I repeat, that if these were considered to be 800 murders, they would be a priority for the police. There are relatives who feel that such grave offences have been committed——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady must not seek to reopen a debate on which the House has reached a conclusion.

Ms. Ruddock: I accept your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I conclude that part of my speech by reiterating our regret that an opportunity has been lost.

I said at the outset that part II of the Bill would be very contentious. It has proved to be nothing less. It is significant that hon. Members representing constituencies in London boroughs affected by the pilot scheme are receiving from their constituents grave reservations and protests about the schemes that are to be brought forward under the Bill as so-called priority routes. The traffic director will be nothing less than a traffic dictator. There is no Opposition support for the continuation of traffic jams, as the hon. Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart) suggested. We seek a variety of measures to deal with traffic jams. No one wants more than we do a capital city working and moving in a way which it does not do at present.

To introduce piecemeal measures, as in the Bill, and to call them plans for priority routes is no solution to London's problems. It puts at the forefront the priority of those who seek to rush through certain areas rather than the proper priority—the need for goods and for those who live in those areas to have access and movement on the terms which they desire.

[Ms. Ruddock]

There is no substitute for strategic planning. That is not available to us in part II. These debates will not go away. We will return to them again and again until the Government bring forward a Bill that can truly deal with the major problems that the capital city faces and which includes a strategic plan giving priority to the movement of people and goods. That means putting public transport before the private vehicle.

I regret the lost opportunities of tonight. We shall not be pressing the Third Reading to a vote, but we shall, as I said, undoubtedly return to these matters in the interests of democracy and the people of the capital city.

Mr. Chope: I regret that the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) introduced a jaundiced note in her remarks because the measure was a good Bill when it arrived for Second Reading and it is even better now, having had detailed consideration in Committee and on Report. It will command the support of the people of London, who are crying out for action to reduce congestion on the roads of the city. The Government have the courage and commitment to do something about that.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart). Indeed, we could call them the Goodhart routes. Perhaps an amendment to that effect will be introduced in another place. This is a good Bill and I thank hon. Members who participated in debating it. I hope that it will be dealt with speedily in the other place so that it may soon reach the statute book.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

Lomé Convention

[Relevant documents: European Community Documents Nos. 8127/90 on conclusion of the Fourth ACP-EEC Lomé Convention, 4590/90 on transitional measures between the Third and Fourth Lomé Conventions, 5197/90 on the financing and administration of Community aid under the Fourth Lomé Convention, 6205/90 on the balance sheets and accounts of the European Development Funds for 1989 and 6704/90 on the operation of the STABEX system in 1989.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Mrs. Lynda Chalker.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Order Paper states that this instrument is subject to the qualification:

"The Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments has not yet completed its consideration of the Instrument."

That consideration was completed this afternoon. We have made a report to the House. Both the report and the two memoranda from the Department are available in the Vote Office to help the House to complete its consideration of the matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am grateful to the hon. Member for that information and advice.

12.16 am

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): I beg to move,

That the draft European Communities (Definition of Treaties) (Fourth ACP-EEC Convention of Lomé) Order 1991, which was laid before this House on 29th January, be approved.

The fourth ACP-EEC convention, or Lomé IV as it is commonly known, was signed on 15 December 1989. The convention governs development and trade relations between the Community and 69 developing countries described as the African Caribbean and Pacific, or ACP, group of developing countries, which includes 33 of the 43 least developed nations as defined by the United Nations.

The draft Order in Council to which the motion refers allows the convention's provisions to be effected in United Kingdom law. This in turn opens the way for ratification of the convention by the United Kingdom. The convention takes force when ratified by all EC member states and two thirds of the ACP countries, and concluded by the Community.

This debate provides an opportunity to consider other Community documents, and I am grateful to the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) for his point of order. These are the internal financing agreement, 5197/90, to which I shall return, the accounts of the European development fund, 6205/90, a report on the question of STABEX, 6704/90, the transitional measures, 4590/90, bridging the gap between the third and fourth conventions and conclusion by the Community of the fourth convention, 8127/90.

Because of the wide scope of Lomé and the limited time available, I shall not address the Community's other aid instruments outside Lomé, such as programmes for Asia and Latin America and the Mediterranean, or food or emergency aid. That would be outside the debate. But I wish to comment further on one of the other Community documents to which I referred. The draft Order in Council specifying the Lomé convention followed established practice by also specifying the internal financing agreement, document 5197.

As the hon. Member for Bradford, South has said, the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments met today and reported that it considers that no useful purpose is served by specification of the agreement. The Joint Committee's report draws this to the special attention of both Houses. It is important to comment on that.

I agree with the Joint Committee that this specification is not legally essential. However, politically, this specification is an appropriate method of bringing the agreement before the House in the context of a debate on the whole series of instruments relating to the Lomé convention. This financial commitment, arising from our obligations under the convention, will this year consume 9 per cent. of my total aid budget. I needed to comment on that, and the easiest way to do so was to tag it with the other documents to be discussed.

Having been closely involved in the negotiations, I am especially pleased to present the order to the House. There is much to commend in the treaty, which builds on its predecessors. The convention is the cornerstone of the European Community's relationship with the developing world. The provisions cover a wide range of development instruments and the convention's scope is unique. The high degree of commitment is demonstrated by the improvements contained in Lomé IV.

Lomé represents a partnership between the EC and the developing world, and brings the expertise and resources of the Community and member states to bear on agreed development goals. Under Lomé IV, there are some changes in the structure and, to an extent, to the scope of the convention. Those changes will make it even more effective. The structural changes are in the duration and membership of the convention. Where previous treaties covered five-year periods, Lomé IV runs for 10 years. Increasing the duration to 10 years reflects the Community's commitment to the aims of Lomé and our will to provide a stable framework for all parties involved. Cutting the frequency of full-scale negotiations will better enable us all to focus effort on the tasks involved in implementing Lomé IV.

Within this time period, the money for the financial instruments contained in the convention will be provided under two separate five-year European development funds or EDFs. EDF VII covers the first five years. EDF VIII will be negotiated in 1994. This will also provide an opportunity to review the aid provisions of the Convention at the halfway stage.

I welcome the addition of Haiti and the Dominican Republic to the membership of the convention, but in agreeing to this, the United Kingdom insisted, initially with little support but later with the full agreement of our partners, that traditional sugar and banana interests of the Commonwealth Caribbean should not be put at risk by this enlargement.

Mr. John P. Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): Is the Minister concerned at the apparent attempts by the Dominican Republic to export large quantities of bananas to the United Kingdom? That is contrary to the existing Lomé convention.

Mrs. Chalker: I shall deal with that in winding up. We are carefully watching what is going on, and I know that the hon. Gentleman takes a special interest in the matter. As he knows from our discussions on the matter, I have fought hard to renew the protection provided for our traditional banana suppliers by earlier Lomé conventions, and I do not intend to give up now.

As the House may know, Namibia signed the treaty on 20 December last year. I know that the House shares my pleasure at that accession. I hope that the Community will help Namibia through the testing early stages of independence and democracy.

There are also important extensions to the scope of the convention. These include a new emphasis on the environment, on health and population planning, on participatory democracy and, above all, on human rights. We pressed hard on all these issues during the negotiations. I shall discuss these further after I have described the technical and financial aspects of the treaty.

The financial package for the next five years is covered by EDF VII, which was, as usual, settled outside the Community's budget procedures. There will be 10·8 billion ecu, or £7·5 billion, available for development assistance. Up to 1·2 billion ecu, or £0·84 billion may be added from the European investment bank's own resources. Those figures represent together a 46 per cent. increase compared with EDF VI. The British share of contributions to the 10·8 billion ecu EDF VII is fixed at 16·37 per cent. of the total. That amounts to 1·8 billion ecu. In sterling, our commitment is about £1·3 billion but the precise figure will depend on the exchange rate prevailing at the time that the funds are drawn down.

This is our largest ever single aid commitment and will represent an important part of the United Kingdom's total aid effort, which for 1991-92 will amount to some £1·9 billion. The funds will be spent and drawn down from the United Kingdom aid programme over a period of years as projects and programmes are implemented.

A particular feature of this convention is that 1·15 billion ecu has been earmarked from EDF VII to provide direct financial support for structural adjustment measures. This is to be used to support countries undertaking agreed economic reform programmes. In this way, the Community aid channel can lend its considerable weight to the work of the international financial institutions and the bilateral donors, including the member states, in this field. This will include in particular the special programme of assistance to debt-distressed low-income countries in sub-Saharan Africa; an effort co-ordinated by the World bank, to which we are giving very active bilateral support.

The Government believe that, if developing countries are to make sustainable economic and social progress, they need to participate as fully as possible in the world economy. That means encouraging trade, investment and private sector development. We therefore pressed hard during the internal EC negotiations for provisions which enable support to be given to the promotion of private sector activity. We believe that a healthy private sector is essential for the economic progress of all the ACP states. There, the role of the EIB is important, as its tasks include indentifying and channelling funds to efficient private sector activities.

It is, of course, of paramount importance that the very substantial resources involved are used effectively. The Commission and the EIB manage the funds in close collaboration with representatives of the member states in the EDF committee which approves all significant spending proposals. EDF VIII in the Commission applies policies and criteria shaped by the discussions of the EDF committee and developed by the Commission. The Development Council of EC Ministers meets twice a year to decide on overall policy issues. The joint ACP-EC Council of Ministers provides a forum for policy dialogue between Ministers of the EC and the developing world.

Lomé IV looks to bolster the trade concessions enjoyed by the ACP states. The new convention retains all the generous provisions of its predecessor for ACP access to the EC market. Some further improvements have proved possible, and the United Kingdom, with other like-minded member states, pressed very hard indeed for those advances.

All ACP industrial products other than rum are already admitted duty-free. The changes to the rules of origin, which define what counts as an ACP product, will provide greater access for ACP goods. Such technical changes hardly make thrilling headlines, but they serve to stimulate processing and manufacturing industries, and help diversify the economies of ACP states. Some agricultural products are still covered by tariff or quota restrictions. Many of these are dismantled or reduced by the new convention. Examples are molasses and rice, on which the access restrictions are reduced, and the inclusion of a number of horticultural products previously outside the benefits of the convention.

Two agricultural projects of major importance are sugar and bananas, which has already been mentioned. The sugar protocol of Lomé IV maintains the position of the separate agreement, which was not renegotiated in 1989. As I said, the United Kingdom fought hard to ensure that the new banana protocol maintained preferential access. We are awaiting proposals from the Commission for the arrangements to apply to bananas in the single market, after 1992. We shall stand by our commitments, as well as taking account of consumer interests, trade policy considerations and the competition and efficiency objectives of the single market.

In extending the scope of the convention, I attach special importance to the human rights provisions. For the first time in Lomé, and among the objectives and principles of the convention, is an explicit statement of the link between development and respect for human rights. I warmly commend this linkage to the House. It will be backed up by the provision of funds to activities aimed at fostering and nurturing good human rights practices. This is not a question of aid donors imposing their will on recipients. It is a partnership, in which both sides recognise what is needed for sustainable development. The convention allows us to promote human rights and participatory development, through the funding of specific projects—for example, by strengthening public administration.

I am pleased that the EDF funds will now be allocated to many more non-governmental and decentralised groups in the ACP countries. Assistance channelled in this way can encourage the growth of greater participation in society, and of more pluralism. These actions will also exemplify our desire to see ACP-EC partnerships established at all levels, and not merely between Government representatives and Commission staff.

I should also like to mention the associated Community provisions for aid to member states' dependent territories. The overseas countries and territories, as they are known, will enjoy the same general trade regime as the ACP countries. Where provisions differ, it is right that they are more generous towards our dependencies. In parallel with EDF VII, over the next five years they will be allocated 140 million ecu of aid, a 40 per cent. increase over Lomé III, supplemented by 25 million ecu from the EIB's own resources.

The Lomé convention is the cornerstone of Community relations with the developing world. It is the product of a major effort of discussion and negotiation between the ACP and the Community. To establish an effective aid and trade relationship between the Twelve and such a diverse group of 69 ACP states, is, as I know from many hours of detailed work, no easy task.

The prospects of the ACP states can only be enhanced by the kind of arrangement contained in Lomé IV—liberal trading provisions offering real opportunities for ACP states, and the largest single Community aid programme. For their part, the Government will continue to work hard and constructively to make Lomé work well.

I believe that Lomé IV represents an important advance in the Community's relationship with the developing world, and I am confident that the House will share my view.

12.32 am

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): The fourth Lomé convention was negotiated at a critical time. It was concluded at the end of a lost decade for development within the African, Caribbean and Pacific and other developing countries, and at the beginning of a decade which will see great change. The completion of the single market, the implementation of any Uruguay round agreement and the development of central and eastern Europe will have profound effects on the European Community and on our relations with ACP countries.

In assessing the Lomé IV convention, we must not only compare it with its predecessor, Lomé III, but measure it against the needs of ACP countries in a new international environment. It must also be assessed according to the original spirit of Lomé—the spirit of innovation of 1973, when the first contractual partnership was entered into between north and south, explicitly recognising the interlinking of air and trade.

As the Minister made clear, compared with Lomé III, Lomé IV contains some significant improvements. The emphasis on the environment and human rights and the commitment to pay earlier and greater attention to the needs of women are much welcomed.

The convention talks of "decentralised co-operation", which should bring non-governmental groups into the process of development in ACP countries. The decision that most Lomé funds will now be given as aid, not grants, is eminently sensible, given the ACP debt burden. At least this Lomé convention mentions the debt crisis. Both STABEX and SYSMIN have been considerably improved; strict rules of origin have been slightly relaxed, new products have been added, falling exports to non-EC countries will be taken into account and their funds have been increased. Of course, those changes must still be implemented effectively, and I hope that the Minister will tell us what work has been done in that respect.

Lomé funds are disbursed very slowly. Little more than 20 per cent. of the Lomé III budget had been spent at the end of its five-year duration in 1989. Lomé IV includes new areas of co-operation, but DG VIII has no new staff to implement them. Can the Minister tell us how local communities who were never really consulted in the drawing up of the convention will be encouraged to participate in its implementation, and whether respect for human rights will be used only to hold up aid in cases of gross abuse, or will it be brought to the fore in programming for all countries?

Doubling the life of the convention with the renewal of the financial protocol in five years ensures continuity and guarantees Europe's long-term commitment to the ACP countries. At least the amount of money available for those five years has increased in real terms in comparison with Lomé III. The real increase of 20 per cent. to 12 million ecu is considerably more than the United Kingdom Government's negotiating proposal of 10 million ecu. Fortunately, other member states prevented the Lomé budget from going the way of the UK suggestion; but, when we look at the desperate economic straits in which many ACP countries find themselves, we must ask again, "Is this enough?".

The 1980s saw economic decline and profound human suffering across much of the developing world. In sub-Saharan Africa, average incomes fell last year for the 12th year in a row. With ACP countries relying on non-oil commodities for 60 per cent. of their exports, and prices of those commodities at all-time lows, the main cause of the economic setback is clear: added to the trade crisis is the debt crisis, and the result is that citizens of ACP countries are now threatened with another lost decade.

We need an imaginative response from both north and south in the Lomé partnership, based on a generous commitment by the EC. In the words of the ACP negotiators:

"The fourth convention should be seen as a major instrument in arresting and reversing the economic crisis in ACP states."

But, in financial terms, the new agreement gives no more per person than the previous one.

The ACP states themselves requested 15·5 million ecu for Lomé IV, but the Commission imposed its own last-minute offer, with no room for negotiation. That "take it or leave it" approach to the financial package sadly indicates a lack of genuine dialogue throughout the Lomé IV negotiations. The first Lomé convention was unique in its emphasis on partnership between north and south, but in these nogotiations the EC Commission clearly dictated the pace.

Last week, we heard that the Lomé ideal of partnership had been extended to the World bank and the International Monetary Fund. Under the new structural adjustment fund of Lomé IV, World bank conditionality is replacing dialogue between the EC and the ACP. When quick disbursing aid for import support was first introduced in 1987, the Commission promised that it would develop a distinctive European policy on structural adjustment.

According to article 244 of Lomé IV, social conditions culture and regional differences would all be taken into account. Food security, environmental protection and other developmental objectives would be supported and "the right of ACP states to determine the direction of their development strategies and priorities shall be recognised and respected".

Yet only last week, the Commission announced that almost all the 1 million ecu structural adjustment fund would be handed over to the World bank's special assistance programme for sub-Saharan Africa. Countries without IMF or World bank programmes will not even be eligible for assistance. The ACP countries were not even consulted. That calls into question the whole basis of the Lomé partnership. How can article 244 possibly be implemented now?

The preamble to the first Lomé convention talked of changing the north-south relations that were hampering development, and of promoting a "new, more just, and more balanced world order."

The ideal—that huge gaps in wealth and power could be transcended by a new north-south partnership based on mutual respect—was trail-blazing at the time. That ideal was conspicuously absent, however from the Lomé IV negotiations. There have been improvements, but no major innovations, since Lomé began. As the EC-NGO liaison committee put it,

"The spirit of Lomé is lost."

Lomé IV bans the export of hazardous and nuclear waste from EC countries, and we welcome that, but a real model of north-south co-operation would surely include an agreement on the activities of all multinationals in developing countries. It would tackle the debt crisis and the international trade regime. Lomé IV unfortunately does not match that task.

I will try to demonstrate that by considering the trade provisions of Lomé IV—in financial terms, 20 times more important to the ACP countries than aid. The increased concessions that the Minister described sound impressive, but let us put them into perspective. Some 75 per cent. of ACP exports are to the EC, so we are a vital trading partner. Only 10 per cent. of the exports receive preferential treatment under Lomé, and even those goods are still subject to many restrictions.

Most of the restrictions—particularly on sugar, beef and other essential exports—survived the Lomé IV negotiations intact. It is true that the beef quota was increased from 30,000 to 39,000 tonnes per year, but to put that, too, into perspective, that would do no more than supply Sunday lunches in a couple of major cities. The tomato quota, fixed at 2,000 tonnes, is equivalent to about three hours' worth of EC consumption. Increased quotas for milk, cheese and curd sound fine, but in fact less than one tenth of 1 per cent. of EC imports of those products come from ACP countries. They are simply not significant ACP exports.

The changes will not provide the secure market access needed to encourage investment in the ACP. The EC rejected ACP requests for a special programme to improve the processing, marketing, distribution and transport of commodities. The simple industrial products that the ACP countries can most easily produce continue to be blocked by strict rules on value added, rules of origin and the exclusion of "simple assembly" manufactured goods.

Lomé trade preferences have not been able to prevent the increasing marginalisation of ACP goods in EC imports over the past decade. Lomé certainly does not address the changes that can be expected in world trade over the next decade. For example, 1992 and the single market are fast approaching. There is no doubt that exports from some of the poorest ACP countries will be squeezed by the single market even if exports in developing countries benefit. Fifty thousand banana workers in the

Windward Islands, and many more workers in the south Wales docks, will risk losing their livelihood if the preferential access given to their bananas disappears.

Mr. John P. Smith: Does my hon. Friend share my deep concern that Geest, this country's largest importer of bananas—currently importing two thirds of all the bananas consumed here—is contemplating moving from Barry, which is on the west of the United Kingdom, to the south of England? Does that not amount to a vote of no confidence in the maintenance of supplies from the Windward Islands?

Mrs. Clwyd: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. Recently, he and I visited Geest's headquarters at Barry docks in my hon. Friend's constituency, when the concern of management and unions was made very clear to us. That source of employment at Barry docks is vital to the employment prospects of south Wales as a whole, which in the past 10 years has suffered very severely as a result of Government policies. Clearly, this is a matter of great concern to the whole of south Wales and, in particular, to my hon. Friend.

The arrival of 1992, the Gulf crisis, changing relations between the EC and eastern Europe, and the Uruguay round, may all have severe effects on ACP trade. The EC should be ready with structural measures to mitigate those effects. Such measures are not covered in Lomé IV, but I hope that action can still be taken to secure them before Lomé V.

Proposals tabled in the Uruguay round will erode trade preferences offered under Lomé in respect of ACP exports. For example, according to an UNCTAD study published last July, the EC-Uruguay offer on liberalisation of trade in tropical products would cut imports from sub-Saharan Africa by about $120 million, with trade being diverted to Latin America and the industrialised countries. Worse, the Uruguay round proposals present a threat which goes to the heart of ACP development, and directly contradicts Lomé principles.

The United States and the Economic Community are moving towards a deal on agriculture that would require the Governments of all developing countries to reduce their support for food producers. Protecting farmers leads to surplus and food mountains in the Economic Community, but in developing countries it can make the crucial difference between having enough to eat and going hungry.

Governments need to protect their farmers from food dumping and to encourage agricultural investment. With 29 million people in 25 sub-Saharan countries starving right now, surely no one can fail to see the importance of encouraging food security. How can the Economic Community talk in Lomé conventions of improving food security in ACP countries, and then support GATT proposals which would outlaw the very Government measures needed to achieve that security?

Instead of making a mockery of its own proclamations of concern, the Economic Community should observe the Uruguay round mandate, which recognises the right of developing countries to special and differential treatment. It should commit itself to GATT rules that outlaw dumping and, as the Common Agricultural Policy reform debate intensifies yet again, should seek to improve the very ACP interests of which it talks so earnestly in the Lomé convention. Unless the Economic Community takes on board those wider economic issues, Lomé cannot possibly pretend to be the catalyst for re-ordering north-south relations.

At last, proposals to write off debt owed by ACP to the Economic Community under Lomé are being discussed, but still the Community opts out of taking a stronger role on international debt initiatives. It has not even established a joint framework for bilateral debt reduction. Commissioner Marin's proposal to cancel Lomé debts—about 1 per cent. of total ACP debt—is modest but important. It is a logical extension of the decision to switch to grants in Lomé IV and of the bilateral action of member Governments. Lomé IV commits the Economic Community to "support ACP efforts to reverse the outflow of capital" and

"contribute to the attenuation of debt burden."

This is a good place to start.

What position do the Government take? The Minister will probably say that the matter was discussed, has been referred and will be discussed again, just as she said that in reply to several parliamentary questions last year. It is shameful that hon. Members have to rely on the grapevine which operates between Brussels and London, often via other cities and organisations, to discover that the Government have been opposing Commissioner Marin's proposals to write off debts owed by the ACP.

Will the Minister provide details today of every vote—every nod and shake of the head—by United Kingdom Ministers and officials, on 5 November at the Development Council, on 3 to 6 December and 18 December at the General Affairs Council, and on 28 January at ECOFIN? If the Government's policy is defensible, there should be nothing to hide.

That is just one example of the lack of information and accountability from which all EC development policies suffer. We should not only debate the Lomé convention in Parliament once every five years—we should also debate the other half of EC aid to non-ACP countries. We should consider the reforms of food aid that are so desperately needed, the absurdly small amounts of aid which go to Asia, where the majority of the world's poor live, the need to improve monitoring and evaluation and to focus EC aid on the poor—a need made all too clear by the Court of Auditors report of 12 December 1990 on EC aid to Bangladesh. The report concluded:

"The allocation of more than half a billion ECU between 1976 and 1988 to Bangladesh has largely failed to achieve the general Community aid objective of improving the conditions of the least favoured inhabitants of developing countries."

The House will want to know as much as I do what action has been taken on that.

Clearly, the spirit of all EC aid—not only Lomé—needs to be revived. There is growing incompatibility between EC objectives relating to aid, trade, agriculture, central and eastern Europe, and the single market. Within Lomé IV, articles which give priority to long-term, self-reliant development compete with sections on short-term structural adjustment. The Lomé partnership is collapsing back into dominance and dependence.

The spirit of Lomé demands imagination and political will. The ACP states have seen the Community display those qualities in taking the lead in the reconstruction of central and eastern Europe. As a Senegalese delegate said during the Lomé negotiations, the Community has already promised $60 per head in aid to Poland and Hungary over the next two years, but will provide only $9 for each ACP citizen over the five yers of Lomé IV. The exact levels and terms of that aid may be disputed, but the political point is clear: Europe must reinvigorate and restate its commitment to development in the south.

Lomé IV has been described as the best that can be achieved in the present tight circumstances. That analysis may well be right, but it is no reason to be complacent. The challenge for both the EC and the ACP is to rebuild the spirit of co-operation between north and south to transform the very circumstances which constrained our co-operation and their long-term sustainable development.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): There is much to be welcomed in the Lomé IV agreement. I particularly want to congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister on the very constructive role that she played in negotiating and enhancing it. All the parties to the agreement, including the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd), have always had many misgivings about some parts of it. We all want the agreement to succeed, to be more dynamic, imaginative and helpful to the poorest countries with which the EC has traditionally been associated for many centuries. It is for those reasons that we want to improve the agreement.

I believe that many of the suggestions given to the House by the hon. Member for Cynon Valley are worthy of much greater and deeper study and implementation. The EC's 40 per cent. increase on the last Lomé III agreement is not enough but it is nonetheless an improvement, but before the EC pats itself on the back for that, I remind the House that the Community, through subsidisation of agriculture, does the third world much harm. It reduces world prices for commodities such as sugar, which could be produced in the third world.

When 3 million tonnes of sugar are put on to the world market, that reduces the world price of sugar, and thus the incomes for many people in the third world. The same is true of palm oil. When we look around in the spring and see the yellow fields of rape seed oil throughout Europe, we know that that is due to subsidies and that the people who will suffer for it are those in the poor countries that produce palm oil. There are many other such examples where the CAP severely undermines the trading ability of third world countries.

We could improve the European development fund and its administration in two sectors: first, the co-ordination of the EC's efforts with its 12 member countries and their own bilateral programme; secondly, co-ordination with other international aid organisations. Like the hon. Member for Cynon Valley, I welcome the adherence to the structural adjustment policies of the international monetary fund and the World bank, but they need to be modified and rethought. I am cynical about adjustment policies because, very often, they simply allow payment for imports for which they cannnot otherwise obtain foreign exchange. That does not promote wealth-creating development in those countries—it is simply a form of emergency aid. That does not help the changes necessary to help those countries overcome their economic difficulties.

There are problems with structural adjustment policies, but they present a means by which to co-ordinate the efforts of the EC, the World bank, the IMF and bilateral programmes. Therefore, I welcome the allocation of a significant sum of money for that purpose. But there is also major concern about the way in which EC delegates in the various ACP countries fail even to make inquiries about the way in which other countries, which have had bilateral programmes for many years, construct their aid. There is little assessment within the EC of the economic needs and how economies can be helped to grow. Therefore, the combination of efforts and talents that we in the EC, through bilateral and European economic aid, can co-ordinate with the private sector to enhance the development of those countries.

Time and again, I have visited countries and asked the European delegate what he knows about the programmes of the other 12 member states—the answer is often, very little indeed. I am sure that that could be easily rectified and I hope that, through its new organisation, the Community will pay it more attention. That would provide benefits at no additional cost and would aid those countries in a more constructive and imaginative way.

Another concern about Lomé IV is that there continues to be a major gap in ACP-EEC trade, despite all the apparently generous trade concessions that were given in that agreement, as in Lomé I, II and III. They are not taken advantage of by our ACP partners, and we must ask why. The principal reason is the rules of origin, although we welcome the fact that we have reduced the input necessary to qualify for tariff-free import into the European Community from 60 per cent. to 45 per cent. of the product produced by the exporting country.

However, I doubt whether even that will enable those countries to take advantage of the concessions. I refer to the smaller states—especially the island states—where much of the product is imported and only the labour is added. That means that few of the products will qualify for the tariff-free import into the Community. We must improve that, to enable those countries to make use of their most valuable and largest resource—their people's energy and ability to add value to a product which does not qualify for inclusion under the rules—even if the countries could understand the rules of origin which apply to many products.

One way to overcome the problem is to encourage wealth-creating investment from our private sector into those countries. A controversial proposition—although it is an idea in which I have always believed—is that, if those countries are exporting products to sophisticated western markets, they need to be able to benefit from the marketing profits made in Britain. In that way, they will benefit more than they do merely as producers and exporters.

External investment by the developed world will give the developed world a greater interest in ensuring that those economies work well. Equally, investment by the developing countries in the marketing sector of the developed world will give them an insight into what is required and into the standards needed successfully to market their products and give them a greater share in the profits from their efforts. In that way, we can begin to create a world that will enable them to benefit from the Lomé IV agreement. It is a good agreement, but it could be a good deal better.

1.5 am

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I will concentrate my remarks on the technicalities of the order because, as Chairman of the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, I brought to the attention of the House the fact that the Joint Committee had reported the order. In the ordinary course of events, precautions are taken so that the Joint Committee has the opportunity to complete its examination of an order, under the terms of the Standing Orders of the House, which involves asking the relevant Department for a memorandum or memoranda, depending on the scale of our investigations. On this occasion, the arrangements appear to have fallen down.

I understand that the Government Whips, through the usual channels, offered not to move the order tonight, so that we could make a more leisurely report. However, I did not feel that that was right, because the Committee was able to finish its consideration and we were able to put our report in the Vote Office to enable hon. Members to take copies if they wanted. The Minister was able to make a comment on our observations.

I want to put on record our concern within our range of duties of reporting to the House about the unusual use of powers and the vires of orders. An important issue is involved. The Joint Committee is the only scrutiny Committee for the huge outpouring of statutory instruments by which the majority of legislative powers are applied to the United Kingdom and related organisations, such as those in the order.

We have no quarrel with the first item in the schedule to the order—the fourth ACP-EEC convention of Lomé. We are concerned with the second item in the schedule —the "Internal Agreement on the Financing and Administration of Community Aid".

Both agreements are designated as treaties. When we asked the Overseas Development Administration for the reason why the internal financing agreement was designated as a treaty, it gave only one reason, which was not the reason that the Minister gave—it was politically a method of bringing the matter before the House.

The Overseas Development Administration said that it was a means of bringing the treaty under section 2(3) of the European Communities Act 1972, and no other reason was given. It enables "expenses incurred under or by virtue of the Treaties or this Act by any Minister of the Crown or government department" to be paid. That is an unusual way in which to describe payments to the 7th European development fund. As that is an unusual use of ministerial powers—I will come to the qualification that the Committee made—we sought to report the matter to the House. It is an important precedent.

There is much talk of a European central bank. It would be wrong if the Minister used the powers under the European Communities Act 1972 to designate a treaty as a means of transferring funds to a European central bank. I hope that that bank never comes into existence, and I believe that it would have little merit. However, the Committee is not considering that. It is considering the way in which Ministers operate. We felt that the procedure set a principle that should not be followed.

In its memorandum, which we attached to our report, the Overseas Development Administration points out that it did not need the powers to bring the internal financing agreement under section 2(3) of the European Communities Act 1972 to authorise payments, because it already has power under section 1 of the Overseas Development and Co-operation Act 1980. With that power to make payments to the development fund, it simply was not necessary to use the other powers. As our memorandum states, that seems to destroy the ODA's case for designating the treaty as a Community treaty. We therefore felt that the matter was of sufficient general importance to warrant being brought to the attention of the House.

We have the right to report something to the House on the basis of an unusual use of powers. I believe that the matter falls under that heading. However, our adviser suggested that, as the power had been used on three previous occasions, this could not be regarded as an unusual use of powers. However, that is a matter of debate. On the three previous occasions when the powers were used in that way—in 1975, 1979 and 1985—I was not the Committee Chairman. They must have crept by during one of the Committee's weak moments.

I place the Committee's concern on record, and I hope that the Minister can assure us that she will find some other way of bringing these important treaty arrangements to the attention of the House. I do not deny their importance or the valid criticisms made of them by my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd). This is not a satisfactory way of using unnecessary powers to incorporate something into the schedule of a statutory instrument. It would be at least as good to use the record of the proceedings of this place to explain the internal workings, instead of using what appears to be an abuse of the Minister's powers against which our Committee was established to safeguard.

1.11 am

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): On every occasion that the Lomé convention has been up for renewal since it was first signed in 1976, the situation facing the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries has proved to be bleaker in terms of development. My main job between 1979 and 1983 was to monitor the implementation of the Lomé convention. The task now facing the convention and the burden that is must bear is much greater than it has ever been. The debt burdens have increased, prices for key exports have been falling and there has been an increasingly unfavourable imbalance in trade with the European Community.

The fourth Lomé convention was signed in December 1989 and at last included a chapter on the environment. However, it took a year to negotiate between the member states and the 68 ACP countries. Although it will last for 10 years, as the Minister explained its financial package will be split and renegotiated after five years. We must put pressure on the convention now to ensure that it fulfils some of its original intentions. Within the context of the fourth Lomé convention, I want to refer, as a case study, to Namibia—the newest ACP member.

At the time of negotiating membership of the ACP, the focus was on Namibian beef. Although Namibia must still sort out who benefits internally from the beef quota, I want to draw the attention of the House to the current key issue—that of fishing.

On 11 March, Namibia will begin negotiating with the Community for an agreement on EC access to fishing. In the debate on Second Reading of the Namibia Bill, the Minister for Overseas Development acknowledged:

"Namibia's fisheries programme is of great importance because it will provide a major source of income, as long as the fish are not stolen away . . . the area will then need the policing that it has not enjoyed until now. The income that Namibia will derive from that sector will be enhanced once a fisheries agreement is reached with the European Community."—[Official Report, 5 February 1991; vol. 186 c. 256.]

While I welcome that statement, the problem is that Namibia's fishery resources have been plundered by illegal overfishing in both the in-shore waters and off-shore. An estimated minimum of 300,000 tonnes of the offshore hake resources are taken by oversea fleets, which amounts to a not insubstantial amount in monetary terms. There have recently been local accounts of Spanish boats plundering those resources. When approached by the coastguard patrols, they have fled into Angolan territorial waters, taking with them 500 tonnes of hake fillets.

However, there is not only a problem with illegal plundering activities; there is also a problem of rebuilding the fish stocks that have been depleted under South African occupation. Furthermore, there is the question of the development of an integrated industry, which involves both the offshore and inshore fishing industries through the development of an indigenous fleet. If Namibian fish stocks were allowed to recover, there would be sufficient to enable the indigenous fleet to work in harmony and co-operation with the European Community fleet.

However, that objective might not fit so neatly with the current European Community objective, because the point of the European Community's fisheries agreement has been to secure access for EC fisheries fleets to fishing grounds in ACP countries. In other words, the developmental objectives have tended to play a secondary role and to take a back seat.

Despite the reluctant concessions that have been built in with financial compensation in return for EC access, the pattern has been one of dominance rather than of genuine mutual integration for the purpose of development. In other words, the key aim of the EC has been to secure long-term access to internal fishing grounds for EC fleets. However, if that objective is to be faithful to the spirit and purpose of the original Lomé convention, it should be blended with the need for Namibia to develop its own fishing industry in a spirit of genuine partnership and co-operation.

I hope that the Government will support Namibia's need for immediate effective conservation measures that will allow full stock recovery. That may mean minimal or no legal access to Namibian waters for the rest of this year. It will certainly mean backing Namibia's method of stock conservation through the establishment of low total allowable catches.

There will be a need to assist Namibia's ability to monitor and control fishing activities in its own economic exclusion zone, as the Minister acknowledged in the debate on the Namibia Bill. There is also a need to maximise local processing and the development of an indigenous fleet, which would mean the transfer of technological resources and the provision of capital goods, going beyond mere financial assistance.

However, it is also politically important to put pressure on South Africa to withdraw from its continued illegal occupation of Walvis bay, which is Namibia's only deep-water port. Namibia needs its main port. I hope that the Government will recognise the need for an early integration of Walvis bay into Namibia, and that the Minister will confirm that that will take place before the end of this year, and that it will include the 12 islands.

In conclusion, to ensure that positive support to the newest member of the ACP—and in the spirit of the Minister's backing for Namibia's entry into membership of the Commonwealth, which was welcomed on 5 February—we need to ensure that there will be an increase in the allocation of overall resources that will take account of Namibia's membership. Or will Namibia be effectively locked out from that five-year budget and depend upon waiting for EDF VIII to arrive later, when it is renegotiated?

Some have spoken in the past of the lost spirit of Lomé. It is true that the convention could be described as a story of missed opportunities to change the unjust balance of relationships between the north and south worlds, which has undermined development in the past. Attempts have been made to establish rules that would have helped to establish what was referred to in the preamble to the Lomé convention as "a new more just and more balanced world order."

But in practice, the EC has tended to sign and then later undermine the realities of the agreement. For example, in the past, the European Community countries have used the loopholes in the international law of the sea to protect their fishing markets, rather than give the ACP fisheries fair treatment.

Lomé set out a model for new relations between rich and poor countries. Tonight, the Minister referred to it as the cornerstone. The European Community needs radically to improve the performance of the Lomé convention in Africa. It could start by treating the Namibians as real partners in the fisheries negotiations. The Minister spoke of the testing early stages of independence and democracy for Namibia and of the liberal trading opportunities for the ACP. I hope that the British Government's and her voice will be heard when those negotiations open in March as it is a vital, practical test of the future effectiveness of the Lomé convention.

Mr. Mike Watson (Glasgow Central): I cannot share the Minister's enthusiasm for the fourth Lomé convention. I recognise that parts of it are welcome, but when it was finally agreed in December 1989 after more than a year of negotiations, there was a feeling, particularly in the European Parliament, that the negotiations had been rather half-hearted. The way in which they progressed leads one to agree with that view.

The manner in which the EC countries approached the negotiations illustrated a thinly veiled scepticism about the problems and needs articulated by the African, Caribbean and Pacific states. It seems that the EC countries effectively put negotiating the new agreement on the backburner. They were more concerned with their own economic restructuring and intent on overcoming the many difficulties in completing the internal market for 1992. There were the further distractions of the GATT Uruguay round talks and the needs—which, I acknowledge, were legitimate—of the emergent democracies of eastern and central Europe.

It seems that many EC member states give higher priority to bilateral aid than to increased co-operation at EC level. In part at least, it is possible that that is due to the unconvincing nature of the first three Lomé conventions and their failure significantly to alter the north-south balance in terms of development.

As I said, I welcome some aspects of the new agreement. In particular, the link between development and human rights and the commitment to the environment and the needs of women are welcome. However, it has to be said that they are offset by shortcomings, especially on trade, where the concessions made by the EC countries fell far below what the ACP group sought. One instance of that is that the ACP countries' request for an increase of 30,000 tonnes of husk rice. They received an increase of only some 3,000 tonnes.

The agreement also fails to provide the ACP with a preferential trading regime for agricultural products that would allow many ACP exporters to invest in substantial production and distribution units or replace expensive subsidised EC products with competitive ACP products. Equally important, no provisions were made to stop EC dumping on ACP markets where it is a disincentive to local production.

On the crucial matter of debt, the agreement contains only a miserable few measures. They aim to avoid a worsening of ACP debt under the new convention and to give technical assistance for debt management and capital flows. But the EC refused initially to include the debt issue in the negotiations on the new convention. That ignored the fact that most ACP debt is owed to EC Governments and to private banks in the Community. However, Lomé IV contains no European commitment to take concerted action in international establishments or to establish an overall framework for bilateral arrangements that could assist the ACP in restoring their capacity to service their debt. Even the small debt to the Community was not written off.

Negotiations on Lomé IV failed to get to grips with the fundamental problem of previous conventions—the disappointing level of implementation and the poor results which emanated from it. It seems inconceivable that only 20 per cent. of the funds of Lomé III were spent during its five-year duration. That shows an endemic problem in the relationship between north and south. The EC countries still do not seem to have grasped the scale of the structural problems facing ACP countries, particularly in Africa, where there are desperate problems.

The serious deterioration of circumstances in ACP countries since the Lomé conventions began in the mid-1970s is also revealed. There was a fall of 64 per cent. in purchasing power of the convention's signatories in the five years of Lomé III alone. Lomé IV failed to address that problem also. The distribution of the resources and wealth produced in the developed world must be complemented by maximising the contribution which can be made by the underdeveloped world, if given the chance. Until debt cancellation and the real encouragement of preferential trade agreements are pursued by the EC with conviction, something which has not been shown in the negotiations or in the final document of Lomé IV, the status of Lomé will be further downgraded so that it becomes perhaps just one donor among others. Surely the ACP countries deserve better.

1.26 am

Mrs. Chalker: With the leave of the House, I should like to respond to the debate.

I had hoped that the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer), who chairs the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, might have been able to join us again, but perhaps I had better put these remarks on the record. What he said was important, following the consideration of the documents by the Committee.

I want to assure the hon. Member, as I think he recognises, that in tagging the document on the internal financing agreement on to the debate, I do not believe that we have set a precedent in any way. As I said in the early part of my opening speech, I had intended this to be a belt and braces exercise, to make sure that, when the House discussed Lomé IV, hon. Members would have full knowledge of all its aspects.

The worry of the hon. Gentleman about a transfer of moneys to a putative central bank would be more realistic if I had hidden my intention. My aim was exactly the opposite—to get everything on the record and to discuss everything together. I hope that the hon. Gentleman, who has rejoined us, will read in Hansard my first remarks in reply to the debate.

In order to permit Lomé IV to become operational, member states must ratify both the Lomé convention and the internal financing agreement. It is for us to determine how in the United Kingdom we should do that. That is why I recommended to Parliament the procedure for full consideration of all the elements making up the convention.

Lomé is unique. The member states and the European Community are partners to the convention, whereas only the member states contribute to its funding by virtue of the internal financing agreement. The agreement is a separate treaty and could, of course, have been laid alone before the House to satisfy the Ponsonby rule, but that would have deprived the House of the opportunity to consider the internal financing agreement in its proper context and would have denied the intrinsic link between it and the Lomé convention. We adopted the unusual course of bringing it before the House so as to be as open and consultative as possible.

Mr. Cryer: While I am grateful to the Minister for her response, I suggest that when in future she wants to make an explanation of that sort, she should include it in the memorandum submitted to the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments. We did not have any idea of the reason she has given.

Mrs. Chalker: Given the number of explanatory memoranda that I am signing, I did not think that the hon. Gentleman would have wanted more from me. I shall ensure that they are as full as I can make them, keeping him up till even later hours considering such matters. I shall, so far as I am able, provide the fullest possible explanations.

A number of hon. Members expressed concern today about what they see as the loss of the spirit of Lomé. I hosted a visit during the past week by Dr. Bahane, the secretary-general of the ACP countries. He believes that Lomé IV represents a significant step forward and acknowledges the important role that the United Kingdom has played in bringing that about—a subject to which I shall return.

In this short debate, we had a rather one-sided view from the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd). I have always seen the 1990s as an opportunity for Lomé countries. They can participate in 1992 and I have particularly argued with the European Commission that they should be helped to benefit from it. I believe that Lomé IV can help to stimulate growth for their products in the European Community market.

The 1990s provide an opportunity to conclude and implement GATT properly, and the hon. Member for Cynon Valley will recall my saying on 14 December how important a successful end to the GATT negotiations was for the ACP countries. But above all, we can build on the special ACP-EC partnership which has developed in implementing the wide-ranging and increased Lomé IV.

I said that Opposition Members had been characteristically negative in their remarks. That goes for the hon. Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Watson). There was nothing half-hearted about the long and detailed debates which led up to Lomé IV—the largest ever commitment of the EC countries, and rightly so, to the ACP countries. When I visit ACP countries and discuss the detail of it with them, we talk about how they can better use EC assistance, and they talk about that with enthusiasm.

None of those ACP countries would recognise the image that the hon. Member for Cynon Valley painted of Lomé IV. I assure her that nothing is collapsing and that we are increasingly working together. That applies to the member states and the Commission, the Community and the international financial institutions, and the Community and the ACP countries.

The hon. Member for Cynon Valley and my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) spoke about effectiveness, and my hon. Friend spoke of the need for donor co-ordination and the need for links between bilateral donors and EC delegates. Regarding effectiveness, the Commission is looking to the United Kingdom's knowledge and experience of aid planning to help it in the future programming of European development fund funds. It is also looking to us for evaluation methods of project proposals, and the new EDF rules will permit member states to evaluate effectiveness. Hon. Members will know that for a long time I have believed that to be necessary. I am glad to say that the Commission now has a new evaluation unit and that a much fuller use of evaluation work is planned.

It is also important that the Court of Auditors, which carries out annual reviews of aid implementation and makes recommendations for improving value for money, should be able to refer to such evaluation plans. That is why member states are considering the improvements suggested in the auditors' report for 1989, and that could prove valuable.

The hon. Member for Cynon Valley spoke of the slow disbursement rate of EDF VI. The Commission is aware of the problem. We would not have allowed it not to be aware of that. The main sector for aid under Lomé III, as the hon. Lady will recall, is agriculture and rural development. Both are inevitably rather slow in disbursing parts of the programme. It is not justifiable to steer away from these identified priorities simply to speed up disbursement. However, measures must be taken to speed it up, and we are encouraging that with the European Commission. The sectoral import programmes under the structural adjustment facility are fast disbursing and they will help to step up the disbursal rate of EDF VII. They will be able to give the balance of payments support that so many of those countries badly need.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford asked about donor co-operation. He will probably be aware that British high commissioners and ambassadors in ACP countries are encouraged to call together ambassadors from Community countries, and frequently from other countries, to discuss with the EC delegates what they are doing and how they can reinforce programmes of economic reform and structural adjustment, health care and education, and the other matters that we most value in the programmes in which we are involved.

I am glad to say that co-operation is working rather better than it did a few years ago. Nevertheless, there is a long way to go, and one of the frequent topics of conversation when I meet the Commissioner and his senior staff is how to get better co-ordination on future projects between EC partners and other main donors and EC delegates. We shall set about that with great enthusiasm in the years ahead.

The hon. Member for Cynon Valley implied that there was some secret about ACP debt and our discussions on the subject. I assure her that that is not so. When Commissioner Marin first presented his proposals to the Development Council on 5 November, I willingly undertook to consider them carefully. It is my view, and the view of other member states, that the proposals need a good deal of further work to ensure that the poorest countries benefit—exactly what the hon. Lady asked for—and that the current arrangement for dealing with debt are not undermined.

The poorest and most debt-distressed countries which are following economic reform programmes deserve the encouragement that we can give through the structural adjustment measures which are included in Lomé IV for the first time. Every donor country agrees that we must be sure that the proposals do not cut across the current international machinery for dealing with debt. No decisions have been taken. As I reported to the House after the Development Council meeting, consideration continues, and we intend to see that this is made to work.

Britain has forgiven official aid debt to the poorest in our aid programme, and we aim to view the Commission's proposals in exactly the same policy context of helping those countries to help themselves. The debt under Lomé conventions covered by the new debt proposal is about 3,900 million ecu over 50 years. The United Kingdom's share of that is estimated at about £500 million.

The hon. Member for Cynon Valley referred several times to structural adjustment. She seemed to imply that the Community would be able to work independently of the World bank and the IMF. There is no merit in the European Community, the World bank and the IMF having competing policies. We should work together to reinforce each other's efforts in these countries. As the hon. Lady may know, the Bretton Woods institutions, with their special expertise, play a special role. That means that the Commission, like bilateral donors, should play a supporting role, and we hope that it will do that.

[Mrs. Chalker]

The EC decisions on debt followed consultation with individual ACP countries, so it has not been a matter of the Community going off on its own and not consulting.

The hon. Lady also referred to the lack of staff to implement Lomé IV. Expertise is gradually being built up in DG8. I fully accept that there are insufficient specialists in certain areas. That is why Britain has seconded environment specialists to the Commission to work in DG8 and link up with the environment directorate-general. We have also just seconded a United Kingdom economist to DG8, to deal particularly with structural adjustment, and other staff are going to build up exactly the work that has to be done under Lomé IV.

The United Kingdom is committed to a liberal stance on trade because we believe that to be to the benefit of all ACP countries. We have been leading the call for CAP reform. The solution to unfair Community exports in third countries is not to commit them to aid but to tackle the unfair export competition by the EC, and that is exactly what we are doing in GATT.

One hon. Member—the House will forgive me, but I do not remember who—was rather confused by the EC tropical products offer. That has been widely recognised as a good contribution to the needs of developing countries, but like the hon. Member for Cynon Valley I would have liked more trade concessions. We fought hard for greater trade concessions, but sadly not all my colleagues in the negotiations were as willing as I to see greater trade concessions to ACP countries. However, I must exonerate the Dutch from that blame, as they were extremely helpful in trying to open up more trading possibilities for the ACP countries.

This has been a short but good debate. We see the chances of 1992 for the Lomé countries as an opportunity. A single market of more than 320 million consumers, only one external barrier and one set of standards, must make it easier for ACP countries to export to us. The benefits of going to the international trading system which are generated by the Community's new economic dynamism will be a major force for a general liberalisation. We shall go on pressing the Commission to take account of 1992, in all its programming of Lomé IV.

I will repeat something that I said briefly at the beginning about bananas—a very special commodity for our Caribbean friends. Our long-standing commitment to the traditional banana suppliers in the Caribbean will not be changed. We fought hard in the Lomé renegotiations to ensure that effective preferential access arrangements were maintained for the traditional suppliers. The commitments are enshrined in a protocol to the convention, and I assure the House that we shall uphold those commitments when we consider what arrangements should apply to bananas in the single market after 1992.

As I said earlier, the Commission has still to come forward with its proposals, but the arrangments must take account of our commitments to our Commonwealth Caribbean suppliers, of the trade policy considerations, the interests of consumers and the competition and efficiency objectives of the single market initiative.

We are committed to getting on with the job and to ensuring that Lomé IV is even more effective than Lomés I, II and III and the Yaoundé conventions before them. I am convinced that the Commission has the will. It may need a few good ideas from its member countries about how best to act, but together we can deliver a much better deal in the 1990s than we were able to achieve in the 1980s.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft European Communities (Definition of Treaties) (Fourth ACP-EEC Convention of Lomé) Order 1991, which was laid before this House on 29th January, be approved.

Optical Fibres

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Goodlad.]

1.43 am

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): In this Adjournment debate, I represent only my constituents, the town of Prescot in which I live and the work force of and all those dependent on the BICC works there, which is of vital significance to the town. I do not speak for BICC when I say that, nor for British Telecom, Mercury, or any of the other commercial concerns which obviously have an interest in this matter.

The BICC company has been vital to the town of Prescot for the past 100 years. In the past few years, the company has shrunk as an employer, from employing about 10,000 people at its peak to under 2,000 now. Several weeks ago, the closure of the copper refinery in Prescot was announced—its timing is still open to discussion—and a further 230 jobs were lost.

I make those few introductory remarks about BICC because there is a problem. The development of optical fibre cable and the development and implementation of the broad band system offer considerable potential to the company. It is estimated that, if such developments were allowed to go ahead pretty quickly in this country, about 800 jobs could be created within the borough of Knowsley, part of which I have the honour to represent in the House. When one considers that my borough is in the top 10 constituencies for unemployment, which is not a statistic that I am boasting about, but a fact of life, those 800 jobs would certainly be most valuable.

Similarly, in the north-west of England, where the cold wind of recession is blowing and scarcely a day goes by without the loss of manufacturing capacity and jobs, it is estimated that about 4,000 jobs could be created as a result of such developments.

Naturally, the estimate which is most commonly used by commerical interests is that, taking into account the multiplier effect provided by any manufacturing industry —jobs rippling through into other parts of the economy —there is potential for about 30,000 jobs. That potential, nationally, in the north-west and within my constituency is all too plain and welcome in the context of an economy which has been shrinking drastically during the past few years.

However, there are constraints upon that development. The Minister is considering the duopoly review, commissioned by the Government to study all these matters. If they accept the duopoly review's recommendations, it will prevent the development of the broad band system in the United Kingdom, in particular by preventing British Telecom and Mercury—the two operators capable of producing a system of that kind—from carrying entertainment for between seven and 10 years. That is the profitable part of the operation, which would act as a spur to the development of home computers, video phones and so forth, so that would prevent the industry from taking off.

I do not decry the Japanese Government, Japan's industry or its people—far from it—but by contrast, in Japan, through the Nippon Telegraph and Telephone Company, decisions have already been taken to invest £12 billion to create a broad band national network, which will put the company in a strong position to take advantage of any developments that are then allowed, in seven to 10 years, as a result of the delays caused by the duopoly review.

I simply wish to urge the Government to consider the prospects involved in allowing British Telecom and Mercury to develop a broad band system, and, in particular, allowing them to carry out entertainment operations. It is possible that an industry in which we already have a technological leading edge, and in which we are now a world leader, will simply slip through our fingers, and the potential jobs in my constituency and in the nation as a whole will be lost.

In the 1988 Mountbatten memorial lecture, Sir William Barlow, the distinguished chairman of the BICC group of companies, said:

> "In so many scientific and technological enterprises, Britain has frequently led the world as inventors or in research and development—only to lose the final race in terms of commercial application and market exploitation.
> We are on the threshold of a revolution in communications and we should grasp the opportunity to be a world leader."

That potential already exists—the potential for this country to move heavily and dramatically into the technological revolution. It is a matter of developing a formidable, highly technical communications network, and of Britain's getting back into the driving seat to deal with the technology and manufacturing of the 21st century. The opportunity must not be constrained for the next seven to 10 years: we must grasp it fervently now. Even if questions are posed about competition, let the existing companies get on with the job; and let us hope that, in seven to 10 years' time, the opportunity has not slipped through our fingers. It should be a matter of British national pride that we were there first, and that we are doing it.

The Minister for Corporate Affairs (Mr. John Redwood): I congratulate the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) on raising such an important subject. I was sorry to hear of the recent job losses at BICC; I hope that the plans that I hear are being discussed for development on an alternative site can bring some extra jobs and prosperity to his part of the world—assuming that the planning authorities consider them satisfactory.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman: over the next few years, the development of broad band networks and opto-electronic technologies will be important, and I hope that his constituency will benefit from that as the demand comes through: 1 million km of fibre highway are already in place for trunk calls, and more will be sold as needed. There will also be new opportunities for the suppliers. The use of fibre allows more signals to be sent along a given route. Broad band systems allowing television programmes to be sent by cable require either fibre optic capacity or thicker copper cables in the home.

The Government are keen to promote the right environment for those developments, so that British companies across all industries can benefit from them and gain an international competitive advantage. I think that Opposition Members and I can agree on that.

The hon. Gentleman asked me about the duopoly review. I am sure that he will understand that I cannot predict the results of the Secretary of State's deliberations tonight; however, we stated in the document that British Telecom was already allowed to convey entertainment services to the home as the agent of a cable company. BT has also been free to apply for cable franchises through a subsidiary, in its own right, on the same basis as any other applicant. BT is, however, now disposing of all its cable interests. Those matters will be covered when we present the findings of the review. We have been delighted by the range and quality of the representations received on those and other issues.

Although the hon. Gentleman and I can agree on the importance of cable networks, I do not think that I have always found myself in agreement with Opposition Members about the best ways to achieve that. Labour wants the Government to make BT install a national broad band grid.

The Labour party's document "Meet the Challenge—Make the Change" stated:

"BT must be empowered and directed to undertake this major investment programme."

That seemed to be reaffirmed in Labour's latest industry document, published this week. But who should pay the taxpayer or BT's customers? Moreover, why should cable be laid before there is a need for it? What possible advantages are there in returning to a monopoly provider? The Labour party's plans have been costed at an additional £20,000 million—a very considerable sum.

We say that as people demand cable TV or video conferencing, so more fibre will be used to link trunk routes—eventually into homes or businesses. Informed estimates suggest that, under our policies, the United Kingdom will spend more than £60,000 million on the technology as demand builds up. It will be a huge and important investment. By adopting our approach, the United Kingdom has already become one of the most intensive users of optical fibre for communications in the world. We use more fibre for trunk communication than France or Germany—both considerably larger countries.

Cable television companies are using fibre increasingly for trunk circuits. It is also being installed in the premises of major users of telecommunications, such as those in the City and other business centres. In the centre of London, more than 1,300 buildings are directly connected by Mercury alone, and BT accounts for more. There are also local fibre networks in Manchester, Birmingham, Bristol, Leeds, Reading, Edinburgh and Glasgow.

It does not yet pay to install fibre for smaller and residential customers, because the opto-electronic components needed to convert from optical to electronic signals are still expensive. The price of the components will doubtless come down, and as they come down, fibre to the home can become a reality if people want the sort of new services that fibre links can provide.

British Telecom has undertaken extensive research and development into fibre optics and opto-electronics—much of it in collaboration with leading United Kingdom companies. Last autumn, BT, GPT, and BICC started a two-year "field trial" of new fibre technologies in Bishop's Stortford, in which telephone calls, television pictures, text and data all travel over a single optical fibre cable. The trials are both technological and commercial. Their results will help decide when and if it will be commercial to offer such a service more widely.

The Government's role in encouraging such developments is threefold. First, we help to fund research, both in the United Kingdom and on a European basis. There is the £800 million EC RACE programme, which I expect to be followed up shortly by RACE II.

Domestically, research is also supported under the LINK programme: in opto-electronics and in advanced semiconductor materials, vital for the components in any fibre network. That involves an additional £27 million of public money over a period of five years.

Secondly, the United Kingdom played a leading role in the establishment of the European Telecommunications Standards Institute, which now undertakes most of the work in establishing standards in Europe, which can stimulate marketplace activity.

Thirdly, the United Kingdom's approach to new services in the market provides a great incentive. The success of the United Kingdom's liberal regime towards service provision has led many of our European partners to copy it. By allowing anyone with a service to test it in the market, we have enabled the United Kingdom to become the leading provider of value added network services of all types in Europe. As broad band technology develops, we shall be in a strong position to exploit what it can offer.

British Telecom and Mercury are not the only players. Cable operators already bring broad band network to the home and they do not offer television alone. They represent one of the best chances for effective competition to BT for residential phone links as well.

Some 135 cable franchises were awarded by the Cable Authority before its functions were incorporated into the ITC at the beginning of the year. It is still early days for most of the operators, but 30 of them are offering service to their customers, and many more have started to install their networks. Successful operations already provide services to more than one in five of the households they can reach. In the United States—a more mature market—penetration reaches one in two.

The next two or three years will be critical for the broad band cable industry. Cable operators make very heavy investments at the beginning of their lives, and they need to penetrate the market rapidly to get payback. If the operators stick to their plans, they will reach half of Britain's homes by the mid-1990s, and two thirds by the end of the century. They have the opportunity to bring advanced telecommunications to their customers on the back of the cable television market. Data transfer services are already being widely used by businesses, and there are niche markets for services such as video conferencing. There are plenty of other uses yet to be thought of.

The United Kingdom has the leading position in both the technology and the use of fibre optics and broad band services, and undoubtedly will be amongst the pioneers of those new uses. British Telecom and Mercury have already switched to fibre for almost all their trunk cable network. Many individual large customers now have fibre to their premises. It may well be only a question of time before it will be economic for British Telecom, Mercury and their competitors, such as the cable companies, to supply all customers.

But it must be an economic decision—not a Government command. Only in that way will customers get in service a broad band system they want, rather than a speculative white elephant at someone else's expense. In they way, Britain is likely to be in the lead and is likely to provide a good market for fibre optics and cable technology.

I agree with the hon. Member for Knowsley, North, who has raised this vital issue, that the development of these services is necessary. I believe that the Government are pursuing policies that will definitely have that effect, and that we are in the lead in western Europe.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Two o'clock.

Order for Second Reading read.

To be read a Second time tomorrow.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT

Disabled Facilities Grants

1. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will review his policy on the provision of mandatory and discretionary disabled facilities grants.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Tim Yeo): This matter is being kept under review, to ensure that grant assistance continues to help disabled people least able to afford the cost of house adaptations.

Mr. Hinchliffe: Is the Minister aware that local authorities are having to make loans to many applicants because of their inability to meet the scheme's means-testing arrangements, which require certain contributions? In many instances the loans will never be repaid because of applicants' financial circumstances. Is the Minister further aware that some elderly and disabled people are being forced into permanent care because of their inability to make a contribution for adaptations under the scheme? Bearing it in mind that the scheme's means testing arrangements run contrary to the Government's care in the community proposals, will the Minister review the operation of the means-testing arrangements and of the scheme generally?

Mr. Yeo: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman is questioning the principle of means testing, which his party did not oppose in Committee. If he is, it appears that he wants us to spend more taxpayers' money helping the best-off. If the hon. Gentleman is merely questioning the way in which means tests are undertaken in respect of adaptation grants, I assure him that we will review the system, which has been operating for less than eight months. We should like it to be up and running for a year before we undertake such a review. Nevertheless, we shall do that this summer and we will consult the associations that represent the local authorities which are administering it to ascertain how well it is operating.

Mr. Hannam: Does my hon. Friend recall that the original commitment in the consultation document was for a non-means tested operation of the grant scheme? Given that there is means testing now, is my hon. Friend aware that many disabled people are now producing examples of the way in which the system is working adversely? When he undertakes his review, will he examine carefully the need to set different criteria for means testing in respect of the disabled?

Mr. Yeo: We will certainly examine the criteria that have operated during the first year and I shall be glad to hear the views of my hon. Friend, whose expertise in the subject is well known. The new scheme was intended to widen the range of home improvements that could be paid for by the mandatory facilities grant. There is no restriction on the size of the grant or on who can apply for one. We aim to allow more disabled people to secure more help and to enable them to live more independently and comfortably at home, if that is possible. In many cases, that objective has been achieved.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I acknowledge the dilemma that presents itself in respect of means testing, but will the Department give special consideration to new build houses, so that there might be savings to a community in the long term in the form of new homes constructed to specifications that are designed to help the disabled?

Mr. Yeo: We have considered that. Ideally—this objective has the support of most of the voluntary organisations concerned—all new houses should meet standards of acceptability and convenience for the disabled, regardless of whether they will in the first instance be occupied by a disabled person or by a family that has a disabled member.

Competitive Tendering

2. Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will publish the results of investigations into the costs to local authorities of the compulsory competitive tendering legislation under the Local Government Act.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Robert Key): Research is being carried out by the Institute of Local Government Studies. We hope to publish the report on its first year's work in the near future. That research has shown that the cost of tendering is some 2·5 per cent. of total contract costs and that CCT has produced average savings of just under 6 per cent. in the annual cost of providing services—often linked to a higher quality of service.

Mr. Rooney: Is the Minister aware that thousands of contracts have been called into question throughout Britain on the ground of quality? Is he further aware that hundreds of headteachers have complained about the low standard of cleaning in their schools? Will he comment on the economic consequences of thousands of part-time, low-paid local authority workers losing their jobs as a consequence of the legislation?

Mr. Key: Of course I have read the report. That is why we are anxious to evaluate the projects as they are carried out. The Department is responsible, under legislation, for ensuring that the section 13 or section 14 notices may sometimes have to be issued. I hope that the hon.

Gentleman will agree, however, that we are interested in the quality of service and the value for money offered to the charge payers who are financing that service.

Mr. Barry Field: Does my hon. Friend agree that the competitive tendering legislation has enabled Conservative councillors on Medina borough council to cut community charge not once but twice, benefiting charge payers in the Isle of Wight?

Mr. Key: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Competitive tendering has played its part in that. I congratulate Medina borough council, which has cut its community charge by some 50 per cent. this year.

Mr. O'Brien: Is it true that the survey will not reveal any substantial financial savings for local authorities? Will the report outline the position before and after compulsory competitive tendering? I put it to the Minister that a substantial number of local authorities spend a great deal of time and money on drawing up tenders, only to find that the private sector is simply not interested in tendering.

Will the report also give comparisons relating to the quality and the full value of the service provided for poll tax payers and will it mention the decline in the proper training of personnel? I suggest that CCT represents a further failure of the Government's local government policies.

Mr. Key: The hon. Gentleman ignores the Audit Commission's claim that voluntary competitive tendering can produce savings of between 10 and 30 per cent. That is a substantial amount. We are, of course, always considering whether there should be more compulsory competitive tendering—whether the scheme should be increased. That can only be in everyone's interests. I do not think that the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) would disagree. He wrote on 15 February:

"It would be foolish to pretend that the jolt given to many local authorities has not had some beneficial effect in stimulating their own concentration on quality as well as improved managerial practice."

Hostel Beds

3. Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the number of hostel beds available (a) in London each night and (b) in the rest of the United Kingdom.

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Sir George Young): The latest estimates available show that the total number of hostel bed spaces in housing association hostels, resettlement units, probation and after-care hostels and those run by local authorities in London is 22,383, and 60,142 in England as a whole. My Department does not hold figures for the rest of the United Kingdom. I take this opportunity to thank the voluntary agencies for their hard work in developing the additional places now coming forward under the rough sleepers initiative and for their help in ensuring that the cold weather emergency provision continues to remain open for an extended period.

Mr. Squire: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. Will he tell us whether at those levels demand continues to be outstripped by supply—whether spare beds are available? Will he also tell us whether the two emergency hostels opened in London during the recent severe cold spell remain open?

Sir George Young: I assure my hon. Friend that, even on the coldest night, space was still available for those sleeping rough in London. The Paddington Green hospital, which is the largest of the emergency cold weather shelters, will stay open for six months and it is planned that the Soho shelter should remain open until the middle of April.

Mr. Fearn: Is the Minister aware of the considerable problem of homelessness in Merseyside, stretching from the Wirral to my constituency, Southport? Has he any idea what he may give the region to deal with that problem? He has recently given certain figures, but most relate to London. How much will go to Merseyside?

Sir George Young: I believe that there is a substantial number of empty properties in Merseyside. That certainly applies to Liverpool, which has experienced a good deal of emigration. One of the difficulties facing Liverpool city council is the excess of homes and I see no reason why anyone should have any reason to sleep rough in Liverpool of all places.

Miss Emma Nicholson: I congratulate my hon. Friend on introducing and implementing a package of measures that have gone so far to solve this difficult problem. Will my hon. Friend's Department be prepared to carry out research into whether homeless youngsters have been habitual truants from school, and thereby slipped the leash of parental and teacher control at an early age, and discover whether useful and constructive measures could be derived from such research?

Sir George Young: My Department has commissioned some research from York university to discover more about the motivations and histories of the homeless. A substantial number of people who have been sleeping rough were in care before they came to London. Local authorities have a responsibility to ensure that once children reach the age at which they are no longer their statutory responsibility, those children still have somewhere secure to go so that they do not end up on the streets.

Mr. Soley: Is not this a problem of the Government's own making? We did not have homeless people sleeping rough in the streets like this until we had a Tory Government. Only alcoholics and some mentally ill people slept rough before this Government came to office. I can say that as I have experience as a probation officer in the King's Cross area of London. Is the Minister aware that housing organisations and the Labour party have warned the Government that temporary hostel beds are not the answer? The real answer is real homes for real people who are sleeping in the snow. We want to know now whether the money that the Government are talking about providing will continue to be provided to the many voluntary organisations that have written to the Minister's office, but which have not received answers telling them whether they can continue the work that they started during the cold weather.

Sir George Young: If I may say so, that is a rather simplistic analysis. The problem of rough sleeping predates 1979. Responsibility does not rest with the Conservative party. The Manchester Evening News has reported that:

"Homeless people are sleeping rough and begging on Manchester streets while 5,000 council houses and flats stand empty."

For every hostel space in London, there are two move-on spaces. We are offering people the opportunity of permanent accommodation. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I are determined to build on the momentum that has been developed and bring about a situation in which no one has to sleep rough in London.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn rose—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question does relate to the United Kingdom.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: Did my hon. Friend see the recent programme by—surprisingly—the BBC, in which an Aberdonian youth who was sleeping in a box in London was flown back to his mother in Aberdeen and interviewed? He said that the last thing that he wanted to do was to stay in Aberdeen and take a job because he could beg £60 a day in London, and he did not stay in a hostel because he could keep the money if he did not spend it. He was returned by the BBC to London on a British Airways flight. Does not that say something about homeless people?

Sir George Young: I did not see that programme, but there is a small number of people who abuse the hospitality of people in London by begging instead of seeking work. For every case like that, there are some genuine cases of people who do not want to sleep rough. I agree with my hon. and learned Friend that we must deal with the abuses, but we must also make provision for those who do not want to sleep rough and would dearly like to move on to permanent accommodation.

Local Government Finance

4. Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to introduce a modern and fair rating system; and if he will make a statement.

18. Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to introduce a modern and fair rating system; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Michael Heseltine): Our review of the structure and finance of local government will look at all the options, including domestic property taxes. I hope to be able to give a first indication of our thinking in the spring.

Mr. Patchett: Does the Secretary of State agree that the poll tax is now untenable? When will he admit that it should be abolished?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman is aware that all those matters are being considered. When we have something to say, we will say it, but not until then.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Callaghan.

Mr. Cryer rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Winnick: In view of the comments that the Secretary of State made about the poll tax when he was a Back Bencher, will it be possible for him to remain in government if it is decided by the Cabinet to retain what he himself described as a Tory tax?

Has the right hon. Gentleman any comment on the absurd statement by one of his predecessors that if the rating system was brought back, there would be rioting on the streets? The only rioting that has occurred has been brought about by that Tory tax, the most unfair tax that has ever been introduced—the poll tax.

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman may be aware that many millions of people now realise that the community charge reduction scheme is bringing them substantial reductions in community charge.

Mr. Latham: Is my right hon. Friend aware that his reputation over many years for radical policies is well deserved and that the best way in which he can proceed in this matter is by radical change?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend is extremely flattering. I shall, if I may, refrain from comment until we produce the conclusions of the review.

Sir Rhodes Boyson: Is my right hon. Friend aware that there is considerable support on the Conservative Back Benches for national expenditure on schools and further education? That would achieve two objects. It would halve the community charge and make all schools grant-maintained schools responsible to parents and not inspectors, which would improve education throughout the country.

Mr. Heseltine: I know how much my right hon. Friend is concerned about this matter. He will know from speeches that I have made that I am a strong supporter of the grant-maintained school principle. When suggesting the switch, my right hon. Friend does not draw my attention to the national taxes that he would wish to be increased to fund his proposals.

Mr. Gould: Will the Secretary of State reassure the millions of people who want to see the back of the poll tax by making it clear that he has refused to be bound by the ideologues in his own party and that he at least is prepared, indeed anxious, to see the abandonment of the poll tax principle?

Mr. Heseltine: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees that it is never possible to discern any ideologues on the Conservative side of the House because there are so many on the other.

Mr. Hayes: I appreciate that my right hon. Friend is doing his best to see that the landed gentry do not riot too much on the streets of Tewkesbury, but will he do what he can to assist my poor beleaguered constituents in Harlow? Their left-wing authority has increased its expenditure by 44 per cent. this year, announced a community charge of £459, and eaten into reserves. When the review is presented, will my right hon. Friend protect people from left-wing authorities such as Harlow?

Mr. Heseltine: As my hon. Friend is aware, by and large, it is beyond any question the practice for Labour authorities to charge significantly more community charge than the Conservatives.

House Insulation

5. Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what help is offered to local authority tenants to insulate their homes.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Tony Baldry:) The Government are firmly committed to encouraging greater energy efficiency in local authority dwellings. Substantial capital resources are made available to local authorities to improve their housing stock, and advice and grants are available to tenants on low incomes to insulate their homes.

Mr. Battle: Is the Minister aware that the home insulation scheme has been reduced to the programme that is run by the energy action grants agency scheme in Newcastle and that that is leading to cowboy contractors knocking on the doors of pensioners and people on low incomes, asking for deposits in advance and then disappearing? Would not it be better to have a home insulation scheme that is properly administered and monitored by local authorities to prevent that unscrupulous abuse, to ensure that the scheme results in home improvements for council tenants and that poor people are not left in the cold?

Mr. Baldry: The home energy efficiency scheme is an excellent scheme, to which £27 million has been made available for this financial year. That is a significant increase on the level of help that has been made available to low-income households in the past. The scheme expects to undertake 200,000 insulation jobs this year. Network installers have been registered in all parts of the country and all low-income households have access to a network installer. If the hon. Gentleman has a scintilla of evidence about the scheme not working properly, I suggest that he makes it available to my hon. Friends in the Department of Energy. The energy efficiency agency that is running the scheme is highly reputable and, I am sure, will be concerned about any suggestions made by the hon. Gentleman that any network installer is not coming up to standard. Unless the hon. Gentleman is prepared to give that evidence, he should stop decrying the scheme.

Mr. Colvin: Will my hon. Friend acknowledge that a lot of money is wasted on insulation? Does he further agree that what we want is a uniform national scheme of rating for energy efficiency for buildings? At the moment, we have the national home energy rating scheme and Starpoint. Will my hon. Friend get in touch with his opposite number at the Department of Energy and ask the Department to initiate a uniform scheme, which would make it a great deal easier for my hon. Friend to honour the undertaking that his Department has given to review building regulations to take account of energy efficiency factors in home construction?

Mr. Baldry: The methodology on which both those schemes are based has been developed by the Building Research Establishment. I have no doubt that the Starpoint and national home energy rating schemes are considering ways to ensure that there is the least possible confusion about home energy rating for local authorities and home owners.

Mr. Win Griffiths: The Minister must be aware that about 170 million tonnes of carbon dioxide are thrown up into the atmosphere every year from homes in Britain. Will he admit that the scheme for which his and other Departments are responsible, which seeks to reduce our energy consumption, are miserable and, at the moment, hardly doing anything to meet the problem of global warming or even our commitment to stabilise the emission of carbon dioxide by 2005? Will the Government show a radical response and announce some positive schemes that would reduce significantly the amount of carbon dioxide that is thrown into the atmosphere from homes in Britain?

Mr. Baldry: The amounts of money that are being made available to promote energy efficiency improvements just among local authority tenants are substantial; 25 per cent. of the £3·5 billion of local authority capital investment was spent on improving heating and home insulation last year; 25 per cent. of the £450 million of estate action resources went on heating and insulation improvements; £60 million is being spent on the energy efficiency demonstration programme and, as I have already made clear, £27 million has been made available for the home energy efficiency scheme. The sums of money allocated to promote energy efficiency among local authority tenants alone are rightly substantial because we want to ensure maximum energy efficiency throughout our housing stock.

Homelessness

6. Mr. Bidwell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate on the current levels of homelessness in Greater London.

Sir George Young: In the third quarter of 1990, local authorities in London accepted responsibility to secure accommodation for 9,350 households they found to be homeless. The latest estimate of the voluntary groups dealing with rough sleepers is that there were about 1,000 people sleeping rough in seven main areas in central London at the end of January. Many of those are now using the emergency shelters and other accommodation provided under our initiative.

Mr. Bidwell: Will the Minister comment on the vicious and brutal 103 per cent. increase in rents for council house tenants since the Tories came back into power in the London borough of Ealing? Does not he understand that that is bound to lead to extra homelessness among those who cannot afford to pay?

Sir George Young: I am more than happy to comment on the increase in rents in the London borough of Ealing. It is one of the many legacies that the people of Ealing have had to bear from the outgoing Labour administration, along with a record 66 per cent. increase in rates three years ago. The reason for the rent increase in the London borough of Ealing, as the hon. Gentleman knows full well, is the irresponsible budget set a year ago by the outgoing Labour administration. The council assumed that it would make a profit on private sector leasing which it was never likely to make.

Mr. Tracey: Will my hon. Friend do something serious and immediate about the number of empty homes in councils controlled by the Labour party in London? There are 10,000 in just four Labour-controlled boroughs. Will he also do something about the millions of pounds of uncollected rents in Labour local authorities? Perhaps he will invite Opposition Members to chase their local authorities rather than make vacuous propaganda points about homelessness in London.

Sir George Young: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. In London about 20,700 properties owned by local authorities are empty and about £360 million in rents is uncollected. There are substantial resources available which could be used to meet housing need in London.

Mr. George Howarth rose——

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Speaker: Mr. George Howarth.

Mr. Tony Banks: Oh come on. The hon. Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) represents the Tory party in London.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is called regularly. He cannot expect to be called every day on every question of his choice.

Mr. George Howarth: Does not the Minister recognise the serious point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell) about the connection between the provision of housing at affordable rents and the level of homelessness in London? As regard the 103 per cent. rent increase in the Conservative-controlled London borough of Ealing, will he confirm that the increase would have been even higher if the Minister had not arranged for the authority to be bailed out to the tune of £5 million? If he will confirm that, will he also say that such provision should be made to local authorities throughout the country to cushion the rent increases that his Government are forcing on them?

Sir George Young: I must make it clear that, for obvious reasons, I played no part in the negotiations between the London borough of Ealing and my Department. The Government have taken several steps to increase the supply of affordable accommodation in Greater London, which is the subject of the question. Some £300 million has been made available, part of which is aimed at bringing voids back into use. Some of that is being spent under the tenants' incentive scheme to create vacancies in London. Some has financed homes under the private sector leasing scheme. On top of that, there is a substantial increase in the budget available to the Housing Corporation, providing an increase in the supply of affordable accommodation. The Government are taking several steps to deal with the problems that the hon. Gentleman raises.

Local Government Finance

7. Mr. Robert B. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what saving in the community charge there would be in 1991-92 to a couple living in Dacorum in a property with a rateable value of £200, under his community charge reduction scheme.

The Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities (Mr. Michael Portillo): The community charge reduction scheme will take hundreds of pounds off the bills of many people whose rates were low. The couple in my hon. Friend's constituency would have had a rates bill near the national average, but even so might expect a reduction of about £64 between them.

Mr. Jones: I thank my hon. Friend for his answer. Is he aware that Conservative-controlled Dacorum borough council has reduced its community charge by £33 per head and that one reason for that is that 98 per cent. of those registered have paid? Is he aware the council has gone about running the borough in an extremely efficient way, to the great advantage of those who live there? Does not that contrast with the nearby Labour-controlled council of Watford, which has a community charge of almost £100 more, with a cost of collection of £19 per head, compared with £7 per head in Dacorum? In those circumstances, will my hon. Friend advise the people of Watford and other areas of Hertfordshire to do what three opposition councillors in my area did last year and join the Conservative party?

Mr. Portillo: I endorse my hon. Friend's advice. It is remarkable that the community charge in Dacorum has been reduced by 8 per cent. Even so, it is remarkable that the community charge reduction scheme would give a couple in my hon. Friend's constituency a reduction of £133 if they were on three quarters of the average rateable value. Watford has no excuse in looking to the county, because Hertfordshire, which is under Conservative control, is spending £16 below the standard spending assessment, so the entire burden and more must be the responsibility of Watford.

Mr. James Lamond: Is the Minister aware that no amount of tinkering with the poll tax in Dacorum or anywhere else will make it acceptable? Can we expect the Secretary of State to make a better job of finding a method of financing local government than he did in 1972 on local government reorganisation when in charge of the Standing Committee on the Local Government Bill, the disastrous results of which we are still trying to deal with 18 years later?

Mr. Portillo: From the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, I thought that his sense of geography was not strong. From the second part, I thought that his sense of history was not strong.

8. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the community charge levels for London boroughs in 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: Westminster city council has set an example by planning a charge of £176. However, it seems already that some councils are planning charges of over £400: Hounslow, Merton, Hackney, Camden and Islington.

Mr. Greenway: Will my hon. Friend join me in congratulating Ealing's Conservative council on reducing the former Labour council community charge by £40 to under £400, despite 10 per cent. inflation? Does he accept my implacable opposition to council rent increases of £10 a week from 1 January and of £17·87 a week from 1 April? I express my implacable opposition even though the previous Labour council was entirely to blame. Can my hon. Friend find a way of helping the council?

Mr. Portillo: My hon. Friend draws attention to the extraordinary achievement of Ealing in bringing down the community charge, given the horrific legacy to which my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning referred a moment ago. What the council has managed to do on the community charge is remarkable. I regret that rents have had to go up so much, but there is no doubt where the responsibility lies. The Government have been as co-operative with Ealing in its difficult position as they can be, but in the end the sins of the old Labour administration will be visited on the people of Ealing.

Mr. Fraser: Is the Minister aware that in Lambeth we face appallingly savage cuts as a result of the Government's insisting on the writing off of about £40 million of debt? Why cannot we do what any business would do and write off that debt without treating it on the one hand as money that has to be added to the poll tax or, on the other, as expenditure to be deducted from capped expenditure? Why cannot we tackle it sensibly as a business would?

Mr. Portillo: The hon. Gentleman seeks to compare Lambeth with a business. I am afraid that I find that comparison far-fetched.

Planning

9. Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received on the remarks by the Minister for housing on the potential beneficial impact of a well-designed new town or village on the landscape.

Mr. Heseltine: I assume that my hon. Friend is referring to a recent speech by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning to a conference on "Tomorrow's New Communities". I have had no direct representations on his remarks.

Mr. Favell: My hon. Friend is right; I am referring to that brave speech by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning. Everybody is in favour of the green belt; it is a valuable asset. But if we are never to build beyond the green belt in countryside which is accessible, valuable or beautiful, all building will have to take place within towns. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the vast majority of people live in towns and that they, too, want to be able to see trees and to have somewhere to let the dog run and for their children to play?

Mr. Heseltine: I am most interested in what my hon. Friend said. He will know that we issued a consultation paper on the subject. We shall be giving our definitive views on the matter shortly and I shall take into account what my hon. Friend said.

Mr. Turner: Is the Secretary of State aware of the devastating effect on the landscape and estates close to limestone workings? It is not always a happy story. In my constituency families are suffering seriously as a result of old limestone workings and they have turned to the Government for support. However, we have not yet heard anything positive from the Government and it would be welcome if the Secretary of State could tell the people of Ettingshall Park Farm in my constituency that some relief will be offered to them soon.

Mr. Heseltine: Had I been able to anticipate the hon. Gentleman's question I should have answered it today instead of tomorrow.

Local Government Finance

10. Mr. Holt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the latest percentage figures of the number of community charge payers who have made payments for the recent year in (a) Langbaurgh, (b) Middlesbrough, (c) Hartlepool, (d) Stockton and (e) North Tyneside; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: Payments had been made by 31 December 1990 by 88 per cent. of charge payers in Langbaurgh; 89 per cent. in Middlesbrough; 86 per cent. in Hartlepool; 83 per cent. in Stockton; and 94 per cent. in North Tyneside. In most areas the proportion is now nine out of 10, which is very encouraging. However, Langbaurgh collected only 51 per cent. of its budgeted yield in the first nine months of the year, compared with 84 per cent. in North Tyneside.

Mr. Holt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that answer, but not very, as it shows how inefficient Langbaurgh council is. It has been able to collect only 51 per cent. of the yield that it should have collected by now. Is there anything that my hon. Friend's Department can do to appoint an inspector or someone else with competence to Langbaurgh council to sort out the inefficiency which has meant that many people have yet to receive their community charge bills, let alone pay them?

Mr. Key: As my hon. Friend says, there is a wide variation in the efficiency of local authorities' collection. Many local authorities have not used the collection powers available to them.

Environment White Paper

11. Mr. Cabora: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made on implementing the proposals set out in the White Paper on the environment.

Mr. Heseltine: The Government continue to make very good progress in implementing their White Paper strategy.

Mr. Cabora: I thank the Secretary of State for that answer, but does he agree that the implementation of many of the recommendations in the White Paper could proceed faster if resources were made available to local authorities to carry them out? On 1 April the new controls on air emissions will come into effect and 25 of those controls will be the responsibility of local authorities, but two authorities, Northampton and Langbaurgh, have already dismantled their control units. That is a bad omen for the implementation of many of the other White Paper proposals. Those authorities have abandoned control units because of a lack of financial resources.

Mr. Heseltine: I do not believe that any local authority will forgo its statutory responsibilities. I sincerely believe that our proposals for integrated pollution control and the inspectorate that will back that up will have a profound and desirable effect.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: Although I welcome many of the proposals in the Water Act 1989, which gives the National Rivers Authority far greater powers, I urge my right hon. Friend to make far greater use of the "polluter pays" principle so that the pricing policy of companies takes into account their responsibility towards the environment—a responsibility which will be met through their own financial incentives.

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The "polluter pays" principle is widely accepted in environmental policies, but my hon. Friend will be aware that, following the privatisation of the water industry, a £28 billion investment programme has been established which will transform the quality of water in this country.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Does the Secretary of State accept that his and the Government's credibility on environmental issues will be regarded as sound only when there is full integration between Government economic policy and Government environmental policy? The White Paper promised only that the Government would consider fuel taxation to encourage fuel economy and would consider environmental economic mechanisms to discourage pollution. Will the Tories join the Liberal Democrats in proposing a competitive tax on all forms of environmental pollution in this Budget, the next Budget, some time or never?

Mr. Heseltine: We are not too keen to join the Liberal Democrats, because we aim to stay in government. As the hon. Gentleman must be fully aware, the Government have already set up a standing environment Cabinet committee. We have nominated Ministers from each Government Department to take an interest in such matters. Although the specific questions posed by the hon. Gentleman are a matter for the Chancellor, no one could question the Government's environmental credentials, which are world pace-setting.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: Is the Secretary of State satisfied with the progress on the investment programme for the water industry which is specifically mentioned in the Government's White Paper? Is he satisfied with the progress of that investment programme, given that the industry acknowledges that there has been serious slippage in meeting those targets? Is not that slippage totally unacceptable when water bills have reached record levels and senior management in the water industry have just taken salary increases of up to 30 per cent?

Mr. Heseltine: I keep in close contact with Lord Crickhowell of the National Rivers Authority. We are broadly satisfied with the pace of progress. However, the scheme is a major enhancement in expenditure programmes which is, in significant part, necessary because of the dramatic cuts introduced by the Labour Government in the mid-1970s. It is unrealistic not to understand that to get such a level of expenditure under way takes a significant amount of time if the task of investment is to be done well. I shall be frank in response to the hon. Lady's question—yes, there is a price for high environmental standards. If the hon. Lady and the Labour party think that we can improve standards without spending and investing money, they deceive the country and themselves.

Local Government Finance

12. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the latest developments in connection with his review programme for the reconstruction of the community charge system.

Mr. Heseltine: The review is continuing to look at a range of possibilities for local government finance, structure and functions. As part of the process, I have recently held a meeting with the local authority associations and visited a number of individual authorities and I and my ministerial colleagues have met various of the Opposition parties to hear their views.

Mr. Dykes: Why have all the best ideas come from Conservative-controlled local authorities and either no ideas or the worst ideas have come from Labour-controlled local authorities?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend has been in the House for long enough to know that that is a normal event which we are used to. In fairness to the Liberal party, the Welsh nationalists and the Scottish nationalists, they have clearly thought through their proposals for local government finance and have discussed the subject with us; we have had frank, full and valuable conversations. The gap has arisen characteristically, among Labour Front-Bench spokesmen, who apparently have proposals but have so little confidence in them that they are not prepared to discuss them.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: What significance does the Secretary of State attach to the idea that all taxation should relate to ability to pay? Have the Government yet ruled in the possibility of local income tax, which could certainly be implemented in Scotland in the next financial year?

Mr. Heseltine: I have made it clear that we are looking comprehensively at all options. Although much of the argumentation behind the options is familiar and I fully appreciate the position of the Scottish National party, I shall not go further today than to say that all the options have been or are being considered by the Government, who have ruled nothing out.

Mr. Ralph Howell: In view of the commitment made by my right hon. Friend and the Prime Minister that nothing will be ruled out when considering changes to, or the repeal of, the community charge, will my right hon. Friend confirm that it is still practical and possible to repeal the community charge and replace it with 7 per cent. VAT before 1 April 1991, thus saving us from another 12 months of agony?

Mr. Heseltine: I have made it clear that nothing is ruled in and nothing is ruled out. With regard to the timing that my hon. Friend suggests, some things are ruled a bit more in than others.

Mr. Nellist: Will the review consider the powers of poll tax officers, such as is illustrated by the case of a 58-year-old lady to whom I spoke in Coventry last night? She has always paid her 20 per cent. poll tax by direct debit from a bank. After two lots of open-heart surgery, she moved last December from income support to invalidity benefit and received a £3 a week rise to £55 a week. She found that the poll tax office in Coventry had the power to phone the Midland bank and instruct it to pay £98 to the poll tax office out of her meagre savings. That is the first time that I have heard of poll tax officers having the power to instruct clearing banks to make such payments. Will the Secretary of State's review rule out such powers?

Mr. Heseltine: I cannot respond in the House to the circumstances of individual cases put by the hon. Gentleman, because I cannot reply in the detail that he expects. If the hon. Gentleman will write to me, I shall carefully consider the principles involved. The hon. Gentleman does everything that he can to avoid paying the community charge. What sort of example does that set for people whom he expects to pay it?

Mrs. Gorman: Will my right hon. Friend take my word for it that people in my constituency, which is yoked to two of the worst Labour councils in the south-east, Basildon and Thurrock, are sceptical about a change in the method of collection? They think that whatever we do under the same council structure the amount will still be too high. My constituents want the review to have an opportunity to reduce the role of local councils and put more work out to tender so that we do not need to collect as much money.

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend makes an important contribution. I strongly support her view that the more choice and competition we can introduce to the provision of services, the better value for money we are likely to get.

Mr. Blunkett: I notice that the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) questions the Secretary of State on the reconstruction, not the removal of the poll tax. The Secretary of State is now engaged in deliberations. Does he agree with the Audit Commission that people on nil or very low income should be exempted from paying, because of the cost of collection and the unfairness, or with his colleague the Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities, who earlier this month said:

"Labour is in great peril if it gives up the principle that everybody should make a contribution to the cost of local government, because that principle is widely accepted."—[Official Report, 19 February 1991; Vol. 186, c. 198.]

The two things are contradictory. If the Secretary of State is intent on introducing a floor tax, does not he accept that the only way to fulfil the wishes of the Minister of State is to maintain both a floor tax and the poll tax?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman can rest assured that my hon. Friend the Minister of State makes a vital contribution to the review, as does the Audit Commission.

Litter

13. Sir Fergus Montgomery: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the regulations under the Environmental Protection Act 1990 relating to litter came into force.

The Minister for the Environment and Countryside (Mr. David Trippier): The provisions about the fixed penalty scheme and the increase in the maximum fine for littering from £400 to £1,000 came into force on 13 February. The new duty to ensure that land is kept clear of litter and refuse will come into effect on 1 April 1991. I will be placing a full detailed timetable in the Library.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Should not the Government set a good example? Will he consider removing Crown immunity?

Mr. Trippier: I am happy to tell my hon. Friend that we have decided to remove Crown immunity, which means that every Government Department will have to comply with the litter provisions of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. I trust that all Departments will therefore set an excellent example to the rest of the nation.

Mr. Eastham: It is about time that we gave the confectionery industry some guidelines about packaging. Often sweets are covered by two or three pieces of paper which increases unnecessarily the amount of litter that has to be collected. The problem could be greatly reduced.

Mr. Trippier: I am very interested in what the hon. Gentleman says. Within the Department we have already set up a working party to deal with waste minimisation, which is precisely the point to which the hon. Gentleman has drawn the attention of the House. Last week I had an opportunity to visit Germany and was very interested in the waste minimisation proposals that are being introduced by the federal Government there. Those proposals will cover the packaging problem. It will be interesting to see how the Germans implement their legislation and I shall be fascinated to see whether it can be replicated here.

Housing

14. Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will next meet the chairman of the Housing Corporation to discuss the aspirations of non-metropolitan district councils in respect of their responsibilities towards housing.

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning has regular meetings with the chairman of the Housing Corporation, with whom he discusses a wide range of housing issues.

Mr. Shepherd: When my hon. Friend discusses these matters with the chairman of the Housing Corporation will he place great emphasis on the distribution of the resources of the corporation between metropolitan and non-metropolitan districts? Is he aware, for example, that in the west midlands region in 1989-90 more than 90 per cent. of the corporation's resources went into the west midlands county—say, Staffordshire—leaving the vast area of Herefordshire, Worcestershire, Warwickshire and Shropshire bereft of resources? Some district councils are going out of their minds in their efforts to discharge their responsibility to provide housing. Housing associations are lined up and ground is lined up, but the resources are not available.

Mr. Yeo: I appreciate my hon. Friend's concern. From 1992-93, we shall require the Housing Corporation to meet fully the requirements of the housing needs indicator. I hope that this will be helpful to the local authorities to which my hon. Friend refers. Although, in the current year, the corporation has fallen some way short of its target for new housing in rural areas, it assures me that it will make up the shortfall over the next three years. Against the background of a near-doubling of the resources that we are devoting to the corporation, there will be a substantial increase in the number of new units being provided in rural areas—more than 6,500 over the next three years. In addition, we have given local authorities the chance, in the next financial year, to bid for another £50 million of credit approvals—again, specifically earmarked for low-cost housing in rural areas. The Government give substantial support to the Rural Housing Trust, whose objective is to extend the coverage of the housing association movement in rural areas.

Mr. Ron Brown: Does the Minister understand that if there is a ceasefire in the Gulf—and there should be—and if the squaddies come home, they will fight against homelessness, against cardboard city, against the poll tax and against the ravages of Toryism? That is what frightens the Government. The war should be stopped, so that our people may come home and join us in the general struggle against injustice.

Mr. Yeo: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his comments, although they fall rather wide of the responsibilities of my Department. I assure the House that my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning and I, together with our colleagues in the Ministry of Defence, will make certain that the right kind of accommodation is available for everyone who returns from the Gulf.

Local Government Finance

16. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many letters he has received from the general public on the issue of the community charge in 1991.

Mr. Portillo: About 9,000.

Mr. Taylor: Does the Minister agree that much of the criticism of the poll tax, or community charge, would be better directed at overspending and wasteful councils? Before he makes up his mind about this great reform, will he come to Southend-on-Sea, where, just over a year ago, the Liberal-Labour council imposed a poll tax of £420, causing great hardship to the poor? Then the Conservatives took over, and the poll tax was reduced on two occasions—standing now at £340. If the Minister were to come to Southend, he would realise that most of the complaints about the terrible hardship that is being caused should be directed at councils that waste money irresponsibly, not at the principle itself.

Mr. Portillo: I am tempted by my hon. Friend's invitation to visit Southend. I had the privilege of meeting his local authority not long ago. I was astounded that, having cut the community charge last year, the local authority had been able to do it again, making it two years in a row. That shows that it was no fluke. The local authority is dedicated to reducing the overspending of the previous Labour-Liberal council. I pay tribute to it and to my hon. Friend for keeping up the pressure.

Rented Housing

17. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to increase the availability of low-cost rented accommodation; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The Government have taken a variety of measures to increase the supply of low-cost rented housing. Public resources through the Housing Corporation for the development of new housing by housing associations will increase from £1·2 billion this year to over £2 billion by 1993-94. Together with associations' new ability to draw in private investment, that will permit an increase in output from 21,000 last year to about 40,000 by 1993-94. Deregulation of the private rented sector, the business expansion scheme, the exceptions planning policy for low-cost housing in rural areas and the estate action programme are also helping to make more properties available for rent.

Mr. Kirkwood: Notwithstanding the increase in housing association and Housing Corporation cash that the Minister has just announced, does he accept that funding does not begin to match the demand and need identified by the Housing Corporation and the housing associations for long-term provision of housing? Will he think again about the possibility of increasing that budget?

Provided that the standards of provision are adequate, will the Minister consider making it easier to give financial incentives to those who have spare rooms to make them available and so bring people off the streets as a transitional stage towards the provision of longer-term accommodation?

Sir George Young: I have sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's point, which is also constantly pressed on me by my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman)—the concept of the friendly landlady. However, it is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer because it involves tax incentives. Of course, I shall ensure that the hon. Gentleman's suggestion is brought to his attention.

Points of Order

3.31 pm

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Do you agree that, when we reached Question No. 10, which referred to Langbaurgh, Middlesbrough, Hartlepool, Stockton and North Tyneside, the reason that you were unable to call me to make a point about the extremely high-spending Labour councils was because no Labour Members——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot give an explanation of my discretion in these matters.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would sit down for a minute. I can give no bonus points for the sort of behaviour in which he constantly indulges, but I shall hear him now.

Mr. Banks: My point of order, Mr. Speaker, is that I wish to apologise to you for my outrageous behaviour in challenging your partiality in calling the hon. Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) on a question about homelessness in Greater London. As you know and I know, the hon. Gentleman is the chair of the London group of Conservative Members of Parliament——

Mr. Speaker: Order. As a matter of fact, I did not know that. However, I do know that the hon. Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) represents a Greater London seat.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. With respect, I think that I was on my feet before the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks)——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That may be so, but I have discretion in these matters.

Mr. Dykes: Indeed, Mr. Speaker. Despite all your long years of distinguished service in the Speaker's Chair, were you not deeply shocked by the hysterical display of petulant anger when you called my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey)——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am frequently deeply shocked but I try not to show it.

Mr. Derek Conway (Shrewsbury and Atcham): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—I thought that you might like a genuine one for a change. We have discussed before the closure of the side galleries following the demonstration by those opposed to the Gulf war. Now that feeling about the British position in the Gulf is perhaps less emotive among those opposed to it, will you reconsider the decision to close the galleries? That is especially important before Budget day, when there is so much pressure for seating. The officials in the Admission Order Office are helpful to hon. Members, but their hands are tied until the ruling is rescinded.

Mr. Speaker: That matter is constantly under review. The House would expect me to take action to protect hon. Members, but I shall bear in mind what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): On a completely different and important point of order, Mr. Speaker. It has just been announced on Baghdad radio that Iraq is willing to abandon all claims to Kuwait, to discuss reparations and to release all prisoners of war as soon as a ceasefire is arranged. I realise that that is a preliminary announcement, and we are always dubious about what is said, but if that information proves valid, we might want a statement at 7 o'clock or later this evening. Can that be conveyed to the appropriate Minister?

Mr. Speaker: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for having brought that welcome piece of news. I hope that it turns out to be true. I am sure that what he has said will have been heard by those on the Front Bench.

BALLOT FOR NOTICES OF MOTIONS FOR FRIDAY 15 MARCH

Members successful in the ballot were:

Mr. Tam Dalyell

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): For debate on Friday 15 March, I have selected the subject of the ecological consequences of the Gulf war and the actions that are being taken by Her Majesty's Government and members of the coalition to cope with oil slicks, Gulf oil fires, dysentery, typhoid and other related problems in Iraq, and with casualties on both sides. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is the old procedure. The hon. Gentleman is empowered to say that.

Mr. Lewis Stevens

Mr. Gerald Howarth

BILLS PRESENTED

Age of Legal Capacity (Scotland)

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn, supported by Sir David Steel, Mr. Menzies Campbell, Mr. Bill Walker and Mr. Brian Wilson, presented a Bill to make provision in the law of Scotland as to the legal capacity of persons under the age of 18 years to enter into transactions, as to the setting aside and ratification by the court of transactions entered into by such persons and as to guardians of persons under the age of 16 years; to make provision in the law of Scotland relating to the time and date at which a person shall be taken to attain a particular age; and for connected purposes. And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 8 March and to be printed. [Bill 95.]

Mr. Harry Cohen, supported by Mr. Tony Banks, Mr. Harry Barnes, Mrs. Rosie Barnes, Mr. Gerald Bermingham, Mr. Andrew Bowden, Mr. Peter Griffiths, Mr. Doug Hoyle, Mr. Simon Hughes, Mr. Steve Norris, Mr. Robin Squire and Mr. Andrew Welsh, presented a Bill to make hare coursing illegal: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 8 March and to be printed. [Bill 96.]

Zoo Animal Welfare

4.37 pm

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make further provision for the welfare of zoo animals.

I should say at the outset that the Bill has nothing whatever to do with working conditions in the Palace of Westminster.

The Zoo Licensing Act 1981 was a major and welcome step forward which has had a significant beneficial impact. I pay tribute to my hon. Friends the Members for Plymouth, Drake (Dame J. Fookes) and for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn), as well as to the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy), who played an important role in promoting and improving the Bill.

British zoos are not particularly bad by international standards. Anyone who has visited zoos in developing countries will no doubt have seen harrowing scenes of animals in cramped unnatural conditions. I well remember not long ago going to a zoo in China and seeing a lioness in a dark, damp, concrete cell 6 ft by 12 ft being taunted by people throwing cigarette ends at her. In the same zoo I saw a lone panda, supposedly China's national animal, in a completely unsuitable concrete pen without a companion and with no greenery whatever.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): No bamboo shoots?

Mr. Oppenheim: Not one.

By contrast, good British zoos and safari parks make a genuine effort to look after their animals properly. Glasgow zoo is a good example of one that is attempting to take account of the animals' natural habits and instincts and to keep them occupied and stimulated, and I welcome those efforts.

Despite certain improvements as a result of the 1981 Act, major problems remain. They have been highlighted by an admirable organisation named Zoo Check, and by the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals' 1988 report, which was based on a large survey of British zoos. The problems they revealed relate not only to obvious shortcomings such as inadequate and cramped accommodation. Astonishingly, the RSPCA survey showed that only two zoos were required by their licence to ensure suitable social groupings of the animals that they kept. The RSPCA reported several instances of single representatives of highly social species, which is a very cruel practice.

Many zoos had failed to undertake the improvements required by their licences within the specified period, which shows the serious shortcomings of existing legislation. I will highlight one or two of them. Currently, most inspectors come from within the zoo industry, which is not always a good idea. Also, inspections are made only every four or six years, and they should be made annually. Mandatory standards should be established and enforced by law, and the implementation of inspectors' recommendations should also be mandatory in the granting of licences. Too often in the past, local authorities have ignored recommendations when granting licences.

My final point relates to the role of local authorities as licensing bodies. That is an unsatisfactory arrangement in many respects, because of the conflict of interests. Many local authorities own zoos, or lease land property to zoos —and often they are keen to keep open zoos as a local attraction, rather than to prioritise the welfare of the animals that the zoos contain. Consequently, they are frequently unwilling to take action where animals are kept in unsuitable conditions.

The Bill's main aim is to encourage amendments to the existing law, but I hope that, in the longer term, more thought will be given to the whole question of zoos. They were originally established to allow research, but that is no longer their prime purpose. Zoological research is often more satisfactorily undertaken in the field. Subsequently, zoos were considered primarily as places of entertainment and perhaps of education.

However, the superb wildlife programmes that are now shown on television make it no longer necessary or desirable to keep animals cooped up in cages just to entertain or educate. One must question the educational value to children of seeing animals cooped up in cages in an artificial environment, in conditions that cause them extreme stress. If we are to use animals for our entertainment, it is incumbent upon us to keep them in humane conditions.

In this day and age, the only real justification for zoos is as centres for the conservation of endangered species. I hope that the Government will consider that argument in relation to London zoo in particular. It has already received large sums of Government money, and is actively lobbying for even more. Such grants should be made conditional on major improvements, with the aim of turning zoos into centres for conservation, which could educate the public about the problems that lead to certain species being endangered. I hope that zoos in this country and throughout the world will develop in that way in future. If they do, they will carve out for themselves a valuable role in conservation and education.

Animals are not machines, but sensitive beings capable of feeling unhappiness. Man is the most powerful species on earth, and we have a duty of care towards weaker animals. If we are to keep animals in zoos, and if we consider ourselves to be a civilised society, that must be done in a way that respects the animals' psychology. I commend the Bill to the House.

3.45 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. Gentleman intend to oppose the Bill?

Mr. Dalyell: Yes. I do not think that the ten-minute Bill procedure is the right way to go about this. I also take exception to a number of the implications in the speech that we have just heard.

For instance, the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) referred to Glasgow zoo. Whatever may have been the case many years ago, Graham Law and others have made enormous advances——

Mr. Oppenheim: I said that.

Mr. Dalyell: The general implication was that there was considerable dissatisfaction. I listened to what the hon. Gentleman was saying. The truth is—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has the right to oppose the Bill.

Mr. Dalyell: The truth is that many zoos are trying to make great progress. The hon. Gentleman did not name any that were not. I give the example of Glasgow, which the hon. Gentleman himself mentioned. Many years ago, the bears had only 0·4 hectares of space, and kept strutting up and down. Now, they have 3 hectares. A whole series of challenges has been made for bears at that zoo; it is not true to say that the conditions are cramped. Most zoo owners are very enlightened, and are doing their best to improve matters.

Secondly, I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's criticism of the local authorities. Thirdly, and more important, he attacked the keeping of animals for research purposes. Contrary to his implication, the captive breeding programmes are very important. I pay tribute to those —for instance, Roger Wheater in Edinburgh—who have pioneered the system. We need not legislation but resources if we are to return to the desired system of proper landscaping: the Hagenback system.

Fourthly, if parliamentary progress is to be made, I suggest that the hon. Gentleman persuade some of the Ministers to devote more resources, to, for example, the natural parks system set up by the Scottish Natural Heritage Bill, which some of us are discussing in Committee every Tuesday and Thursday. That is the way to conduct research, and to implement what Markowitz and others have achieved in the field of animal psychology.

If the resources are there, the House should be discussing a number of other matters. We should currently be considering how to save many of the birds and animals that risk extinction because of what has happened in the Gulf—for example, the green turtle, the hawksback turtle and the Socotra cormorant—as well as the coral ecosystems. That is where the resources should go.

Finally, I oppose the Bill on the ground of what the hon. Gentleman said about inspections. If he is to talk of annual inspections, a representative of the Government had better say what resources will be devoted to the appointment of more inspectors, who will be capable of coping with the problems.

Perhaps my deepest objection is that we need not the hon. Gentleman's Bill, but legislation on the importation of birds for the bird trade, which reeks of a cruelty beyond anything in our zoos.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): That is true.

Mr. Dalyell: I am glad to have the support of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) and others, who know a great deal about the subject. I am not a universal expert, but I know rather a lot about zoos. I took some soundings, because I did not know what the hon. Member for Amber Valley was going to say; on the basis of what he has said, especially by implication, I for one oppose his Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Phillip Oppenheim, Dame Janet Fookes, Mr. Gerald Bowden, Mr. David Sumberg, Mr. James Pawsey, Mr. Andrew Mackay, Mr. Kenneth Hind, Mr. Lewis Stevens, Mr. Simon Burns, Mr. Cecil Franks, Mr. Michael Brown and Mr. David Evennett.

Zoo Animal Welfare

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim accordingly presented a Bill to make further provision for the welfare of zoo animals: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 8 March and to be printed. [Bill 93.]

Social Security

3.52 pm

The Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): I beg to move,

That the draft Social Security (Contributions) (Re-rating) Order 1991, which was laid before this House on 13th February, be approved.

I understand that it would be for the convenience of the House for us also to consider the following motions:

That the draft Guaranteed Minimum Pensions Increase Order 1991, which was laid before this House on 11th December, be approved.

That the draft State Scheme Premiums (Actuarial Tables) Amendment Regulations 1991, which was laid before this House on 18th February, be approved.

That the draft Social Security Benefits Up-rating Order 1991, which was laid before this House on 13th February, be approved.

That the draft Social Security (Contributions) Amendment Regulations 1991, which was laid before this House on 13th February, be approved.

That the draft Child Benefit and Social Security (Fixing and Adjustment of Rates) Amendment Regulations 1991, which was laid before this House on 21st February, be approved.

That the draft Statutory Sick Pay (Rate of Payment) Order 1991, which was laid before this House on 13th February, be approved.

That the draft Statutory Sick Pay (Small Employers' Relief) Regulations 1991, which was laid before this House on 20th February, be approved.

Mr. Speaker: Will that be for the convenience of the House?

Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Newton: It is just possible that hon. Members may also agree that the main interest of the House and perhaps the main focus of the debate will be on the draft rating order.

However, in line with my duties to the House, I must first refer to the purpose and content of the other orders and regulations, although I do not propose to refer to the order concerned with state scheme premiums which is entirely technical, not to say dense. However, I am prepared to say something about that order if pressed.

The draft contributions re-rating order is, as always, concerned with national insurance contributions which determine people's entitlement to pensions and other important contributory benefits and which are the source of finance for more than half of what is spent each year on social security. A notable feature of the draft re-rating order is that, for the eighth year in succession, we propose no increase in the main rates—the class 1 rates paid by employed people and their employers.

As the House will already be aware, this time I have been able to propose a reduction in the rates of national insurance contributions payable by employers. I propose to reduce the standard rate from 10·45 per cent. to 10·4 per cent. and, perhaps more important, to reduce the lower rates, which are currently 5 per cent., 7 per cent. and 9 per cent. in respect of employees earning up to £175 a week, to 4·6 per cent., 6·6 per cent. and 8·6 per cent. respectively. Those changes will reduce employers' costs by about £250 million. I remind the House that they are likely to be especially helpful to employers—often smaller employers—whose employees are among the less highly paid, and will go a considerable way towards offsetting any additional costs that employers meet as a result of changes to statutory sick pay made by the Statutory Sick Pay Act 1991.

The House will be aware also that there are boundaries for contribution liability, called the lower earnings limit and the upper earnings limit, and they will change as usual. The LEL applies to employers' and employees' share of contributions, but the UEL applies to the employees' share only. The order does not set those two earnings limits; that is done by a set of regulations to be laid after the benefits uprating order has been approved. However, the LEL, which is linked by law to the nearest pound below the retirement pension rate, will be £52 a week, and the UEL will be £390 a week.

The effect of the increase in the lower earnings limit will be to reduce most employees' contributions by 42p a week, or by 30p if they are in contracted-out employment. The effect of raising the upper earnings limit is that those having earnings of £390 or more a week will pay an extra £3·18 a week or £2·50 if they are contracted out.

A few minutes ago, I mentioned the proposed reductions in the rates of contributions paid by employers. Additionally, as on previous occasions, the re-rating order provides that the earnings limit below which they pay lower contribution rates will be increased. From April, employers' contributions will be 4·6 per cent. in respect of employees earning between the lower earnings limit and £84·99, 6·6 per cent. for those earning between £85 and £129·99, 8·6 per cent. for those earning between £130 and £184·99, and 10·4 per cent. for those earning more than £185 a week.

In 1991-92, class 1 contributions, which are the ordinary contributions that most people make, are expected to yield more than £35 billion. As is the case with contributions made in all classes, that revenue will be apportioned between the national insurance fund and the national health service.

I shall now say a word about self-employed people, who pay national insurance contributions in two portions—the flat-rate class 2 contribution and the profits-related class 4 contribution. We do not propose any change to the class 4 rate, which will remain at 6·3 per cent. in the coming year. The profits limits for class 4 contributions, which determine the level of annual profits on which contributions are payable, will once again be increased to £5,900 and £20,280 respectively. The upper profits limit is exactly 52 times the class 1 upper earnings limit.

We propose also to increase the class 2 contribution by 60p, to £5·15, per week from next April. That class 2 rate is broadly linked to the class 1 lower earnings rate, and its increase reflects the proposed rise in that limit. The result of all that is that self-employed people with profits at or below the present upper limit of £18·200 will pay about £28·35 less in class 4 contributions per year, and that will largely offset the increase of £31·20 in their class 2 contributions. Those with higher profits will pay up to £102·69 more in class 4 contributions. Self-employed people are expected to contribute nearly £1·4 billion overall in contributions in 1991-92.

Certain categories of people—for example, those who are not gainfully employed or who are receiving contributions credits, such as people who retired before the age of 60—can pay class 3 contributions if they wish. They are voluntary contributions. We propose to increase class 3 contributions by 60p, making them £5·05 per week.

[Mr. Newton]

As usual, the Government Actuary's report on the effect of our proposals on the national insurance fund has been laid with the re-rating and uprating orders. It is estimated that the total income received by the national insurance fund will be around £33·5 billion in 1991-92. Total expenditure, including administration, is estimated at £34·5 billion. However, although expenditure is likely to exceed income, the balance is expected to remain comfortably above the minimum recommended by the Government Actuary.

The changes in national insurance that I have just described will determine the contributions of the vast majority of people, but I should like to say a word about one interesting corner of the system which is of particular interest, although to only a limited number of hon. Members—the Social Security (Contributions) Amendment Regulations 1991, which deal with the special rate of class 2 contribution that is paid by share fishermen. I notice that the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) is pricking up his ears. He is one of the hon. Members whom I had in mind. I refer to the 13,000 people who are jointly engaged in a fishing enterprise and who are paid wholly or in part by a share of the profits from the catch. Unless they are working under a contract of service, they are regarded as self-employed for national insurance purposes.

Unlike self-employed people generally, however, under a long-standing arrangement, share fishermen can receive unemployment benefit and industrial injuries benefits. They earn their entitlement to these benefits by paying a special, enhanced class 2 contribution. This consists of the standard class 2 contribution paid by the majority of self-employed people, with an additional amount related to the costs of the extra benefits payable to them.

Hon. Members—including the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire—will recall that one of the measures contained in the Social Security Act 1990 was the removal from the scope of the national insurance fund of industrial injuries benefits, which are now met from general taxation. Clearly, therefore, it is inappropriate for share fishermen to pay extra in contributions for benefits that are no longer funded from these contributions. From April, we propose that share fishermen should no longer pay this extra amount, although I hasten to reassure the House that this change will have no effect on their rights to benefits.

To make the position clear in financial terms, I should explain that, with additions for both unemployment benefit and industrial injuries benefits, the share fishermen's contribution currently stands at £6·15. By removing the addition for industrial injuries benefits, but adding the normal increase in the standard class 2 contribution, which this year is 60p, the share fishermen's contribution rate from April will be £6·20. This means that, for a very modest increase of 5p a week on their contributions, share fishermen will continue to receive their extra benefits in the same way as before, as well as benefiting from the coverage given by standard class 2 contributions. I had hoped that the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire might pop up to say what good news that is and what a generous Government we are.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Hope springs eternal. Although this welcome rationalisation reconciles the longer-term problems faced by share fishermen, they also face more urgent short-term problems, such as the eight-day tie-up period during which they are excluded from unemployment benefit. Will the right hon. Gentleman look at that as a matter of some urgency, to try to bring about some short-term relief in the coming year?

Mr. Newton: From long experience in the House, perhaps I should have known that it is impossible to do good work without somebody seeking to get one to do more. I shall, of course, look at the points that the hon. Gentleman has raised, but I hope that he will understand me when I say that I shall do so without commitment. That matter has the air of a point that somebody has looked at fairly closely several times previously——

Mr. Kirkwood: To no useful effect.

Mr. Newton: As I have said, I can make no commitment —only an expression of good will in the hon. Gentleman's direction.

I turn with some relief, which I suspect is shared by the House, from the rather tedious details of national insurance to the Statutory Sick Pay (Rate of Payment) Order, which represents changes that are part of a wider package of shorty-term sickness provisions for those in employment, other elements of which are contained in what is now the Statutory Sick Pay Act. As the ground was well, not to say exhaustively, trodden during the debates on the Statutory Sick Pay Bill both in this House and in another place, I shall not take the time of the House this afternoon by going over it again in great detail. I simply state briefly and factually that the order increases the lower rate of SSP by the full retail prices index increase of 10·9 per cent. from £39·25 to £43·50 a week and leaves the higher rate unchanged at £52·50 a week.

At the same time, the earnings threshold between the two rates will increase from £125 to £185 per week, thus extending the coverage of the lower rate across the whole range of earnings for which employers pay lower rates of national insurance contributions. Those proposals will reduce public expenditure on SSP by about £100 million in 1991-92. [Interruption.] In view of the faint sounds of muttering from Oldham, I should like to remind the House once more that the majority of employees will see no effect on the total payments that they receive when sick. That is because of the way in which occupational sick pay under employers' schemes interacts with SSP.

To pre-empt one of the points which the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) will undoubtedly make, not all employees are covered by such schemes, either because they are among the 9 per cent. of employees who work for an employer who does not have an occupational sick pay scheme or because they do not satisfy the qualifying conditions of their employer's scheme. But I hope that the hon. Gentleman will recognise that those who do not satisfy the qualifying conditions, and possibly a significant proportion of the others, will be mainly employees who are modestly paid or who work part-time and will generally be on the lower rate of statutory sick pay. Their entitlement once again will be fully protected in real terms by the increase that is proposed in the order.

Before I finish dealing with SSP, I should refer to the Statutory Sick Pay (Small Employers' Relief) Regulations, which are also in the package before the House. As hon. Members will realise, those regulations are in consequence of the Statutory Sick Pay Act 1991, passed earlier this month. The regulations enable small employers who experience abnormal sickness in their work force to revert to an SSP reimbursement rate of 100 per cent., instead of 80 per cent., after an employee has been sick for a spell of six weeks or more.

I do not intend to go over the background to those provisions today, because they were the main focus of our recent debates on the Statutory Sick Pay Act 1991, but I can confirm that, as foreshadowed in that debate, the regulations provide for an employer to be defined as a small employer where his contribution payments in the preceding tax year do not exceed £15,000. Small employer's relief—that is, 100 per cent. recovery—will apply once an employee has been entitled to SSP for six weeks in a period of incapacity for work. The regulations also modify the provisions on the position of new employers.

Before I move on, I want to say a few words about the proposals for statutory maternity pay. As I said in my uprating statement, the considerations which apply to statutory maternity pay are different from those which apply to statutory sick pay. In particular, there is much less occupational cover for maternity than for sickness. So we propose to move away from the link which currently exists between the flat-rate element of statutory maternity pay and statutory sick pay.

Indeed, the main benefits uprating order increases the rate of statutory maternity pay by £25 a week to £44·50 per week, which is a full £1 above the retail prices index increase of 10·9 per cent. In other words, a real, additional £1 is being added. Indeed, a real, additional £1 is also being added to the state maternity allowance, which will go up by £4·90 to £40·60 a week. The effect of that is a real increase in benefit for some 315,000 mothers-to-be. That is a modest improvement but a useful and welcome one, which has been less noted than I should have wished.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): The Secretary of State should have made it more generous.

Mr. Newton: It is £5 million, if I remember rightly, so it is a significant sum, nevertheless.

I will touch only briefly on the Guaranteed Minimum Pensions Increase Order, which is in line with my statutory duty under the Social Security Act 1986. It requires occupational pensions schemes which are contracted out of the state earnings related pension scheme to give post-award increases in guaranteed minimum pensions earned since the 1988-89 tax year of 3 per cent. from 6 April this year.

On child benefit, as I made clear in my uprating statement and am happy to have another opportunity to make clear today, the benefit is and will remain a strong element of our policies for family support. As the House knows, I decided that the right course of action this year was to give practical recognition to the fact that all families with children face additional costs compared to families with none, by proposing an additional payment of child benefit of £1 a week for every family with children.

That will be paid for the eldest eligible child in each family, and will go to around 7 million claimants, in most cases the mother. The net cost will be over £250 million a year. As the extra £1 will go to every family and will indeed be larger than a retail prices increase would have been in one-parent benefit—which is itself defined as an increase for the eldest eligible child—I decided that, on this occasion, it would not be right to make a separate increase in that benefit as well.

The extra payment for all families with children complements the real terms increases in income-related benefits which we have introduced over the past three years to focus additional help on the less well-off families with children. Families on income support and family credit will also, of course, have their benefits increased From April to compensate them for price increases in the usual way. Taken together with the earlier real increases, it means that spending on income-related benefits for families with children is expected to be worth some £400 million more in real terms in 1991-92 than in 1987-88.

The Draft Child Benefit and Social Security (Fixing and Adjustment of Rates) Amendment Regulations are the legislative means by which the extra £1 a week will be implemented. They provide for £1 extra per week to be paid for the only, elder, or eldest child for whom a family is receiving child benefit at any time. For the sake of equity, there are provisions to ensure that every family receives one extra amount of child benefit each week.

Historically, there has always been a link between child benefit and other benefits for children. When child benefit for the first child in a family was increased from £1 to £2·30 in April 1978 by the previous Labour Government, there was a corresponding decrease of £1·30 in the rate of other benefits for that child. We therefore propose to make further regulations to be laid before Parliament in due course to ensure that the general principle, that benefit rates for children should be based on the overall level of child support, continues to apply. We propose that benefits payable under the Social Security Act 1975 in respect of children be adjusted where the child in question is one for whom the increased rate of child benefit is payable.

The draft uprating order provides for an across the board increase from £9·65 to £10·70 in the dependant's additions to contributory benefits. The effect of the proposed overlapping benefit adjustment to which I have just referred will be to reduce the amount of such a benefit by £1 where the increased child benefit is in payment; £1 is, of course, the amount by which child benefit is increased.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): I am pleased to see the Secretary of State in good health. If the worst came to the worst, and he were to fall under the proverbial bus, can he tell those in receipt of child benefit anything about the reports in The Independent on Sunday of serious splits in his ministerial team, of the think tank and of Mr. David Willetts coming up with other ideas? Can he reassure us that, if he were to leave his present position, child benefit would remain safe?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman should perhaps have taken the answer to his question as already having been given in my firm reiteration, made to the House and elsewhere on several occasions, that child benefit is and will remain a strong element in our policies for family support. I made that statement on 24 October, as a statement on behalf of Her Majesty's Government collectively; it was not made off the cuff by the Secretary of State for Social Security. That seems to make the position absolutely clear.

Mr. Frank Field: It is possible to accept that the Government now, thank goodness, have no intention of abandoning the child benefit scheme—they want to spend the money within that framework in a different way. Press reports sometimes suggest that a Tory party inquiry is being held, sometimes a departmental one, on the various options. Is it possible for the Secretary of State to tell us whether such inquiries are taking place in the Department, in the Tory party or in both?

Mr. Newton: I do not believe that it is possible for me to answer the hon. Gentleman's question in the way in which it has been phrased, but it is certainly not true that all thinking has ceased on the Conservative Benches about possible further development of the benefit system—I presume that the same is true of the Opposition Benches. I am not able to predict the outcome of regular consideration of what is the right way in which to deal with social security matters.

Mr. Field: I do not expect the Secretary of State to tell us the outcome of reviews, but I asked whether such reviews are taking place and where.

Mr. Newton: In that case, the answer to the hon. Gentleman is that, such is the liveliness and vigour of all of us in the Conservative party—I was grateful to note the remarks of the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) about my appearing to be in reasonable health—that we are constantly thinking about social security matters in all sorts of ways, at every level and in a variety of forums.

Mr. Field: That is not a good answer.

Mr. Newton: I think that it is a very good one, and I do not propose to try to come up with something better.

The draft Social Security Benefits Up-rating Order 1991 provides for an increase in retirement pensions, and in virtually all other benefits that are not income-related, of 10·9 per cent. That is the increase in prices that took place during the year ending September 1990. As for income-related benefits, the draft order provides for a general increase of 8·1 per cent., which is the increase in retail prices, other than housing costs, over the same period. That difference, as is now well understood, reflects the fact that, for people on income support, help with rent is separately available through housing benefit and help with mortgage interest separately within income support itself.

Rather than rehearse all the many benefit rates to which the general increases give rise—they are set out in the order—it would be more helpful, especially in view of the relatively short time that the House has to consider the order, to concentrate on two ways in which its provisions improve on the general pattern that I have outlined.

This year, we are proposing to spend an extra £80 million through a real increase in the basic pensioner premium that is paid to people on income support aged 60 to 74. That increase will directly benefit about 400,000 pensioners on income support and will feed through to housing benefit and community charge benefit. The premiums for single pensioners in that age group will go up by an extra £1 a week, over and above a straightforward uprating, while couples will receive an extra £1·50 a week. That increase builds upon the improvements we made to the premium structure for other pensioner groups on income support in October 1989, which provided £200 million of extra assistance in its first year.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Newton: I could almost have predicted an intervention from the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Winnick: Perhaps that is true, as I want to refer to a report in The Independent today, which says that there were 2,347 more deaths, mainly among the elderly, than was expected during the cold spell. The charity Winter Action on Cold Homes puts a great deal of blame for those deaths on inadequate heating, fuel poverty and the like. Although I was pleased that two payments of £6 were made, far too many elderly people are simply financially incapable of keeping their homes warm, and that leads to a great deal of deprivation and, sadly, death. I hope that the Government will take more effective action than they have so far to deal with that problem.

Mr. Newton: I have seen the report in The Independent this morning and the comments that go with it, but I cannot pretend to have had an opportunity in the intervening period to make a detailed analysis of the figures underlying it. I learned from my previous experience in the job now done by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People, when there was discussion and controversy on the subject, that this country is not alone in experiencing the problem of higher mortality rates in winter than in summer. It is clear that the causes of that problem, which go well beyond this country, are by no means simple to identify or overcome. Those mortality rates include people who, by no stretch of the imagination, could be described as badly off and may be in comfortable and heated residential institutions. It is difficult to draw firm and clear conclusions from the statistics.

I go along with the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) in acknowledging that a range of measures is required. I hope that the cold weather payments recently made will make a contribution. In addition, the Government recently introduced—it was contained in the Social Security Act 1989, although it is not strictly a social security measure—a home energy efficiency scheme, the latest version of a number of schemes designed to improve the way in which the houses of elderly people and others are insulated. The advisory services' "keep warm, keep well" campaign, run by Help the Aged, with Government support, can also make a contribution. There is certainly a problem, towards which a range of measures are directed. This Government, and any other Government, would acknowledge that we constantly need to find new ways to address it.

I do not believe that the evidence suggests that the problem can be solved as simplistically as the hon. Member for Walsall, North suggests—by simply using more money on it. The hon. Gentleman intervened at a point in my speech when it was logical to make his remarks, but the paragraph at the end of which he intervened made it clear that, during the past 18 months, we have directed additional regular, weekly support—worth almost £300 million—to the very groups about whom he is concerned.

Another significant way in which the order varies from the overall retail price index or "Rossi" uprating pattern to which I referred, is the increase in the income support limits governing the amounts payable to those in residential care and nursing homes, by amounts ranging up to no less than £55 a week for a nursing home in Greater London—at an overall cost of £225 million. I should make it clear that, under a technicality, the £10 increase in the London nursing home supplement requires a separate set of regulations distinct from the uprating order under debate.

As the House knows, the balance of the increased limits is weighted towards nursing homes. All the evidence, including the Price Waterhouse survey of costs that we commissioned, shows that that is where large increases are most needed.

In view of some of the comments made, I should emphasise two points about the residential care home limits. First, the basic residential care home limit has increased faster than inflation during the past five years. Secondly—this is too often overlooked in such discussions—the structure includes a separate and higher limit for residential care homes for the very dependent elderly, whose care is obviously likely to entail higher costs. That limit, which covers well over a third of all elderly people on income support in residential homes, is being increased by £15 a week.

I hope that it is in order to refer to a matter which is not about uprating but which is of considerable interest to many hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs) who has rightly pressed us on it. It is the lump sum made available to those who suffer severe neural or physical damage as a result of vaccination. Such payments are made under the Vaccine Damage Payments Act 1979 and were last increased from £10,000 to £20,000 in 1985, when I held the post now occupied by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People.

I am glad to tell the House that we have decided to increase the amount by a further £10,000 to £30,000, which rather more than restores its value to the 1985 level. The necessary order will be laid shortly. That increase does not represent a changed judgment about the risk of vaccination, but simply our view that it is once again appropriate to increase the payment. I hope that that will be welcome.

Mr. Anthony Coombs (Wyre Forest): I welcome my right hon. Friend's news about the increase. It will be especially welcomed by young people who, through no fault of their own or of their parents, have been damaged by vaccine. The increases are in response to representations that I and other hon. Members have made over the past year. I should like the Minister to look at the rules and regulations under which vaccine damage payments are made. Currently, an 80 per cent. disability has to be proved before any payment can be made. I have urged the Minister in the past to look at this matter, and I hope that he will do so. I thank him for his valuable contribution.

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments. I shall consider the issue that he raises but, obviously, I cannot make any commitment at this stage. I pay tribute to him and to other hon. Members for the way in which this issue has been pressed. I am glad that we have been able to announce a response.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): While we all appreciate the increase, it seems to be just below the increase in earnings for the period and probably in line with inflation. How many vaccine-damaged children will benefit from the change?

Mr. Newton: As with the previous change, this change will apply to new claims made after a certain date, in this case after 15 April. The reasons for doing it in that way were fully explained in 1985, but I can repeat them if hon. Members wish me to do so. Only about four or five vaccine damage awards are made each year. It is a small scheme, and I hope that it is clear to the House that I am not trying to oversell it. However, the matter has been sensibly and rightly raised, and we have responded to it in the same way.

It is customary in such debates for the Secretary of State to conclude by reminding the House of the huge amounts with which we are dealing. The increase in social security expenditure between this year and next, most of it arising from the uprating order, is nearly £5 billion, and it will take the total next year to well over £60 billion. [Interruption.] I wish that Opposition Members would stop muttering.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): Instead of trying to take credit for the fact that the budget has increased by £5 billion a year, the Secretary of State should eat a little humble pie by acknowledging that his economic colleagues have completely lost control of inflation, and that that, and that alone, is the cause of the increase.

Mr. Newton: It is absolutely clear that inflation is falling at a very significant rate, and that is welcome to all of us. The hon. Gentleman might have spotted that, although I felt it, as it were, routinely necessary to refer to these macro-economic figures, I was about to move to a rather different way of bringing my speech to an end.

It is possible to take those huge sums and present whatever arguments we may have as to their basis. I prefer to concentrate on what this is all about—the people we are helping. In raising the national insurance retirement pension by £5·10 for a single person, and by £8·15 a week for a couple, we are firmly maintaining our pledge to raise pensions in line with price rises. In providing a real increase in income support for many less well-off pensioners, we are building on what was done 18 months ago for those in this group who are disabled or who are over 75—taking the total of real additional help to nearly £300 million in less than two years.

With the increase in child benefit, we are helping more than 6 million families, complementing the £400 million of real extra help already provided to families who are less well-off, compared with the position that obtained before the social security reforms of 1988. When all that is taken together with legislation that the House passed recently to bring an additional £300 million a year of help to many disabled people, it will be seen that we can take some pride in this order and in the Government's record.

4.32 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): The annual debate on social security uprating is, in effect, a debate on the living standards and prospects of the poorest one third of the nation. On that subject, we have just had a rather modest speech from the Secretary of State. It was a speech full of minor details, but perhaps that is not surprising as, when it comes to protecting the living standards of our poorest citizens, he has a lot to be modest about. However, modesty is not a quality that comes naturally to the present Government. Last July, the then Prime Minister roundly declared:

"all people of all incomes have increased their standard of living under this Government."—[Official Report, 24 July 1990; Vol. 177, c. 304.]

Let the Secretary of State say that to the 100,000 claimant households that have not had a penny rise in their benefits since April 1987. Ironically, 24 hours before that declaration by the Prime Minister, the Government published statistics which, for the first time, publicly admitted the opposite.

A Department of Social Security document bearing the sexy title, "Households below average income"—I suppose that only a Government Department could dream up such a title—for which we were grateful, despite its late publication, shows that, between 1979 and 1987, the average income, after housing costs, of the bottom one tenth of the population fell by 5·7 per cent. in real terms, and that the average income of the bottom one fifth of the population fell by 1·1 per cent. in real terms. The 10 million people affected are the subject of today's debate.

Ministers like to say that they have concentrated help on the most needy. I am glad to see that the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People has woken up now that the Secretary of State has finished and I am speaking. On 30 January 1990, he said:

"We have adjusted the system to concentrate help on the poorest elderly and disabled pensioners."—[Official Report, 30 January 1990; Vol. 166, c. 211.]

I wrote to the Secretary of State and asked for more details of the poorest 1 million people in this group—the most disadvantaged in our society. After four months, the Minister replied, confirming what we had always suspected—that under the present Government the 1 million in the population with the lowest incomes have suffered a fall in their real living standards of no less than 10 to 15 per cent.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): The hon. Gentleman mentioned comparative modesty between the two Front Benches. He will know that, since 1979, the Government have increased spending on family benefits by 29 per cent. in real terms. When the last Labour Government cut spending on family benefits by 8 per cent., where was the hon. Gentleman and what did he do?

Mr. Meacher: I should certainly like to know where those statistics come from. The hon. Gentleman must know that, during their last term of office, the Government have cut child benefit by more than 25 per cent.

Among the groups that I mentioned—they are the subject of today's debate—one group about which the Government like to claim they are concerned is precisely the group mentioned by the hon. Gentleman, families with children. Indeed, the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People said in his revealing speech a year ago:

"We try to establish those parts of the social security system where the shoe pinches unduly and make adjustments to it. We have helped families on low incomes, whether in or out of work."—[Official Report, 30 January 1990; Vol. 166, c. 211.]

On 26 July 1990, the Government published what has really been happening to families on low incomes. I mention that date only because, as hon. Members may remember, it was the day that Parliament rose for the recess. I am sure that my hon. Friends know that there is no more important Hansard to read than the one that is circulated after Parliament has closed for the recess. That is when all the unwelcome information that the Government have been trying to conceal for the past year finally sees the light of day. It is worth reading carefully. It shows that where the shoe pinches unduly—the poorest 10 per cent. of families on low incomes—have not been helped by the Government. According to the Government's figures, those people are 7 per cent. worse off in real terms compared with 1979. That is on the record, and I recommend that the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson) look at that Hansard.

Mr. Newton: My first point is not my main point, but it needs to be made. The hon. Gentleman appeared to be referring to households on below average income and to the date of publication for certain figures. Those figures were not published on the day that Parliament rose for the recess. I remember that they were published when I was due to appear before the Select Committee on Social Security. We felt that it would be right, if possible, to publish those figures then so that the Select Committee could examine me on them. That must have been before Parliament rose for the summer recess.

I wish to make a more substantive point about the way in which the hon. Gentleman is using the figures. He will acknowledge that he is referring to figures after housing costs, rather than to the total income available to the family. In reckoning their standard of living, most people look at their total income rather than their income after paying their rent or mortgage, although they may need to do that calculation for other purposes.

By concentrating on the figures after housing costs, the hon. Gentleman runs the risk—I put it no higher than that because I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is not seeking to run that risk—of being seriously misleading. I shall give one simple example, which I also gave to the Select Committee last year. If a young couple save £50 a week to put towards a deposit on a house, that £50 will still be in their income after housing costs and they will probably be several deciles up in the tables to which the hon. Gentleman referred. When that couple stop saving £50 a week, but instead start paying £50 towards a mortgage, it becomes a housing cost and the couple drop a decile or two in the tables and are suddenly defined as poor. The only change is that they are putting £50 a week into a mortgage instead of saving £50 a week for a deposit. That shows how absurd some interpretations of statistics can be.

Mr. Meacher: The right hon. Gentleman is not correct on a number of points. First, I was not quoting the "Households below average income" figures; I was quoting Hansard for the last day of the Session, which I think was 26 July, and which was circulated 10 days after. It is correct that the HBAI figures were issued two or three days before, but what the right hon. Gentleman does not add is that they had been sat on by the Government for at least a year. They had been promised the Christmas before, they had been promised in the new year and they had been promised before Easter. We finally had them in the last week of the Session, when it was not impossible but extremely difficult to make use of them in the House.

Whether taking incomes before or after housing costs is the fairest representation of the state of overall income is a genuine issue, but it is curious to hear the right hon. Gentleman make such a point on behalf of a Government, who have constantly said that we should ignore the cost of mortgages in the retail prices index—[Interruption]. That is exactly what the Government have repeatedly said. They say that the mortgage element should be put on one side and that we should look at incomes minus mortgage payments. I do not think that I need to take any lessons from the right hon. Gentleman about which is the correct way of representing the figures.

Mr. Frank Field: Is not one of the difficulties that the Government face that they have been hoist on their own low income figures? When the figures after housing costs showed that the poorest were doing twice as well as everybody else, the Government wanted to use them, but when they were revised the Government came up with some rather good reasons why we should not use them. Should not all the data carry a Government health warning, since both sides of the Chamber use figures for political reasons rather than because they reflect what is happening to the poor?

Mr. Meacher: My hon. Friend, who was Chairman of the Select Committee on Social Services at the time, makes a relevant point. The Government statistics at that time were said to show that the poorest 10th—I think that it was the lowest decile—had increased their standard of living twice as fast as the rest of the community. That seemed an incredible claim and the Select Committee and my hon. Friend rightly subjected the Government's statistics to independent assessment by, I think, the Institute of Fiscal Studies. It showed that the figures were bogus. Therefore, we should take into account my hon. Friend's point and the way in which the Government have moved the goal posts by presenting figures calculated on a different basis.

The Government have only released figures for up to 1987. That is just as well for them because 1989 was a bad year, 1990 was a dreadful year and 1991 looks like being a disastrous year, not only for the nation, but above all for those on the lowest incomes. Since 1987, for them—it is mainly for them—unemployment has risen sharply and child benefit has been frozen. It can safely be said that if a quarter of the population were worse off in real terms after eight years of Tory government, as the Government have now admitted, they are even worse off now, after 12 years of Tory government.

We may be told, although the right hon. Gentleman has not yet said so, that all that occurred under the previous regime—the ancien regime. The Conservative party is now the purveyor of the classless society. Frankly, I have never heard such cant. It was the Prime Minister who used that phrase and it was the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State who, five years ago, presided over the legislation that introduced the social fund; that virtually ended free school meals; that abolished entitlement to 90 per cent. of disablement benefit; that extended the penalty for so-called voluntary unemployment from six weeks to six months; that removed all entitlement to benefit for 16 to 17-year-olds which led directly to cardboard city; that hacked £500 million off housing benefit for pensioners and other poor families, and which, according to the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux caused 82 per cent. of social security claimants to be worse off.

All those damaging changes were the direct result of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State and they came into effect in 1988—the same year in which the Prime Minister, who was then Chief Secretary to the Treasury, and a former Chancellor of the Exchequer handed out £2 billion in tax reliefs to the well-heeled and the rich.

I seem to remember that someone once said that people should be judged not by what they say but by what they do. Far from ushering in a classless society, the Prime Minister has handed down some of the most class-conscious and divisive legislation that Britain has suffered since the war. If the Prime Minister really believed in a classless society, he would not be making short-term gestures such as raising cold weather payments by £1 a week for a few elderly people for just two weeks. He would be restoring heating additions to all pensioners in need. He would be reversing the Tory's break of the pension uprating link with earnings, which has made pensioners a class apart—the only people who are denied the rise in living standards enjoyed by the rest of the community.

If the Prime Minister really believed in a classless society, he would not merely be offering an additional £1 in child benefit for just this year for the eldest child only; he would be reversing the four-year Tory freeze on child benefit for all children. If the Prime Minister really believed in a classless society, he would not merely be talking about opportunity and fairness; he would be abolishing the social fund that traps millions of our people deeper into poverty and debt.

Mrs. Marion Roe (Broxbourne): Does the hon. Gentleman agree with the president of Pensioners' Voice, who says that Labour's commitment to pensioners is weak?

Mr. Meacher: I did not see that and it surprises me because we are proposing—I am grateful to the hon. Lady for giving me the opportunity to include this in my speech—an extra £5 a week for the single pensioner, an extra £8 a week for the married pensioner on top of the normal uprating and, even more important in view of the experience of the past decade, to restore the link with earnings. As a result of that link being broken, pensioners have lost £12 a week if they are single and £20 a week if they are married. Our proposal is not weak—it is a formidable commitment.

Mr. Winnick: Is my hon. Friend aware that, whatever criticism Pensioners' Voice may or may not have about our record and commitment, it has only contempt for what the Conservative Government have done and the fact that married pensioners have lost some £23 a week and single pensioners between £13 and £14 a week as a result of the decision taken in 1980? [Interruption.] I do not know what the junior Ministers are muttering about, but I know that many pensioners in Britain are bitterly disappointed that they are way behind pensioners in other European countries and that they are being treated with contempt by this Administration.

Mr. Meacher: Labour also should be judged not by what it says but by what it does. The previous Labour Government increased, over five years, the real value of a pension by 20 per cent., whereas 12 years of Conservative government—as the Secretary of State implicitly admitted when speaking about prices indexes—produced a real increase in the value of pensions of next to nothing. That is a formidable difference between the two parties, and one of which I am sure pensioners will take account at the next general election.

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South): Does the hon. Gentleman recall that, in January 1987, in the Bill promoted by the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnock), he voted in favour of free concessionary television licences for pensioners? Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that it is Labour's intention to implement such a measure during its first year in office? If so, how much will it cost the taxpayer?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I cannot see how that question arises from the motions on the Order Paper.

Mr. Meacher: I share your view, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that, while I ought to answer relevant questions, I am being dragged a long way from the subject of the debate.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) has spoken for 19 minutes, but has not mentioned any of the orders once. If he is allowed to do that, the House ought to be permitted to hear his answer to my hon. Friend's question about concessionary television licences.

Mr. Meacher: In that case, I shall certainly continue with my speech.

For all the Prime Minister's soothing rhetoric, it is obvious that he does not believe in a classless society or in a welfare state for the needy. His record shows that he believes in a welfare state for the wealthy. Governments are not judged by little gestures—by a little concession or minor amendment here, a further detail there—they are judged by the changes that they make to overall flows of income and by their operation of the social security and taxation systems. That is the measure by which Governments stand or fall.

In successive Budgets during the past decade, the Government have, according to independent estimates, engineered a rise in the incomes of the richest one tenth of the population of about £6 billion. According to a parliamentary answer that I received a week ago, the Government have also poured £3·75 million into a public subsidy during the past five years for private pensions for the well-off.

On the other side of the balance sheet, according to the Government's own figures, during the past decade, pensioners have had £22 billion taken from them as a result of the break of the earnings link. That puts Conservative Members' comments into perspective. The Government's minuscule improvements are no doubt welcome, but they are insignificant when compared with the financial effect on pensioners of their other measures.

The £22 billion would be enough to give every pensioner a Christmas bonus this year of more than £2,000.

Sir Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): I invite the House to reflect on what happened when there was last a Labour Government. The hon. Gentleman said that he regrets the Government's severing the link between pensions and earnings and linking pensions to prices instead. Is it not the case that, when Labour was in power between 1974 and 1979, it gave an undertaking similar to that which the hon. Gentleman is now offering but, because of the state of the economy, on only three out of a possible five occasions was it possible to honour it?

Mr. Meacher: The hon. Gentleman is not right. The relevant consideration is what happened to pensions in overall terms. As I said, pensioners were 20 per cent. better off after five years of Labour government, but they are zilch better off after 12 years of Tory government. If the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Sir R. McCrindle) is satisfied with that, I hope that he will give that message to the electorate.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover) rose——

Mr. Meacher: No, I must move on.

Mr. Newton rose——

Mr. Meacher: The right hon. Gentleman has already spoken, but I will give way to him.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman cannot be allowed to get away with the line of argument that he has used in the last few minutes. What matters to pensioners ultimately is the totality of the effect on them of Government policies. The combination of the pension uprating and the inflationary, taxation, and slow-growth policies pursued by Labour meant that the standard of living of pensioners rose by only 3 per cent. under a Labour Government, whereas average net incomes have risen by 31 per cent. under our Government.

Mr. Meacher: Those figures have been used repeatedly, but they are fundamentally flawed in at least two respects. The growth in shareholding dividends that they incorporate—which can be considerable at a time of rapid growth—have been averaged out over all pensioners. That is absurd. There are some rich pensioners, and they have it all—but the majority of pensioners are poor, and some are very poor. What matters to the poorest of them all is what the Government have done in respect of the state retirement pension, or the additional pension through SERPS. Under the present Government, there has been no increase at all for the poorest 2 million pensioners. They are the people who really matter, because they do not enjoy the advantage of private pensions or of shareholdings. They are the responsibility of the Government and of our generation, yet they have enjoyed no real increase under the Conservatives. They enjoyed a 20 per cent. increase under the last Labour Government.

Families have had £750 million pounds taken away from them as a result of the four-year freeze on child benefit. As a result of all the changes to national insurance benefits since 1979, claimants have had an additional £1 billion taken away from them by successive cuts in benefits. That was revealed in a written answer given on 6 February in reply to an excellent question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle).

Vast changes in income flows are continuing, and are growing year by year. The Government have already timetabled huge additional cuts for the future—most notably the abolition of the additional pension for invalidity benefit, from which, in time, the Government will save no less than £1 billion per year, according to their own estimates. Staggering as it may seem, the Exchequer will gain more from cuts in benefit from the poorest one third of the nation than from the proceeds of all the Government's privatisations. That is not producing a classless society, but engineering the sharpest class division since the Edwardian era.

This year, there has been a new phenomenon—one that has not occurred even during 11 years of Thatcherism. I refer to the creation of a new army of debtors, dependent on the ultimate safety net of income support, yet forced by punitive Government measures to subsist, in large numbers, below the poverty line. According to the Government's own estimates, nearly 750,000 people on income support will be subject this year to deductions because of the poll tax.

The most recent Government figures that I have seen show that a further 430,000 people on income support have been forced to make social fund repayments averaging £5·25 a week. According to a number of parliamentary answers that I have received over the past two months, a further 250,000 families are repaying electricity and gas arrears averaging about £9 a week, 80,000 are paying back rent arrears, and 45,000 are repaying water charges. In all, more than 1·5 million people—one in seven of all those on income support—are now being forced below the poverty line by compulsory benefit deductions.

Even earlier Tory Governments, in their most repressive phases, never did that. I wonder how many of the Government's grinning supporters realise what it really means. Indeed, I wonder whether a single hon. Gentleman opposite can tell me how much income support is received today by either a single or a married adult. I shall gladly give way to any Conservative Member, or indeed Minister, who can tell me.

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, West): Does the hon. Gentleman want a gender-free House of Commons?

Mr. Meacher: I certainly do. If my terminology fails to adhere to that excellent principle, I apologise.

I was, however, making a much more important point. I think that it speaks volumes that more than 1·5 million people are in such a position. It is interesting that not one Conservative Member can tell me the current level of income support for a single or a married adult, although a Conservative Government are forcing 1·5 million people to live below the poverty line. Government policy has condemned those people to live on less—sometimes substantially less—than £36·70 a week in the case of single adults over 25, and £57·60 a week in the case of married couples over 18, yet not one Conservative Member can give me the figures.

Mr. Newton: Once again, the hon. Gentleman is using figures in what can only be described as a misleading way. Those figures take no account of the fact that either all or part of their mortgage interest—all of it, if they have been receiving benefit for any length of time—is being paid for those self-same people, amounting in some cases to substantial sums. If they are tenants, they will receive either a rent allowance or a 100 per cent. rent rebate, as long as they are also receiving income support. No one else uses the income figures in such a misleading way. Income support levels must be seen in the context of the meeting of housing costs—in full, in many cases.

Mr. Meacher: Actually, they should be seen in the context of people being able to survive to pay all the costs of normal daily living. Housing is certainly one of those costs, but there are plenty of others, including food, clothing, transport and everything else that people require to look after themselves. I see that the Secretary of State at least has the grace to be embarrassed by what I have said: the figures are indeed deeply embarrassing. They suggest that 1·5 million people are receiving substantially less than income support. I have said before, and make no apology for doing so again, that one Tory Member—Matthew Parris, who is no longer in the House—who was young and fit tried to live on income support for a week, but was unable to do so even for that long. These people are being forced to live on it for months and years.

Mr. Frank Field: I congratulate my hon. Friend on bringing the Secretary of State back to the Dispatch Box. Has he noticed that the right hon. Gentleman has changed his stance in less than five minutes? When he was talking about low income statistics, the right hon. Gentleman said that it was important not to use figures that took account of housing costs; he has now told us that it is important to think of income support as the amount remaining after housing costs have been met.

Mr. Newton rose——

Mr. Meacher: The right hon. Gentleman has already made his speech. I realise, however, that he should probably be given an opportunity to reply to that point—although it was extraordinarily effective and relevant.

Mr. Newton: It strikes me as the complete opposite of the real position. I complained before that the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) was concentrating on the figures after housing costs; I am now making exactly the same point—that he is concentrating on the benefit rates after housing costs, regardless of those costs.

Mr. Meacher: The central point, from which the right hon. Gentleman cannot escape, is that, for the first time since Beveridge or perhaps a little earlier—I do not go back to the 1930s—people are being forced to live significantly, and sometimes substantially, below the Government's safety-net level. It is almost impossible to live satisfactorily and healthily on income support for a long time, but to force people to live below it is unbelievably punitive.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Meacher: I will not give way again, especially in view of what the hon. Gentleman said to me earlier.

Only the present Government have punished people for being poor. This new army of 1·5 million people is at the bottom of the heap—along with the homeless and those who sleep rough, whose numbers are unprecedented. The cuts in living standards go far wider. In a parliamentary answer that I received about a week ago, the Government admitted that single pensioners are now £12·80 a week worse off, and £20·50 a week worse off than they would have been if they had not broken Labour's earnings link.

[Mr. Meacher]

The Secretary of State, of course, says that the Government have kept up with prices, and that pensioners are no worse off in real terms. Even that proves untrue when we consider, as we must, pensioners' increased outgoings, notably the poll tax. This year, the average poll tax is likely to rise by about £1·15 a week. Following the implementation of the orders, pensioners will have less disposable income in real terms this year than last. The same will apply to many of the 2 million people who are unemployed—whose numbers may rise to 3 million within a year—and to hundreds of thousands of low-income families who are now £1·30 a week worse off for the first child and £2·30 a week worse off for the subsequent children as a result of the four-year child benefit freeze.

Moreover—the Secretary of State touched on this—the latest evidence shows that thousands of elderly people, and people in residential and nursing homes, will be in even worse straits next year than this year. The most recent independent survey shows that the income support shortfall will rise this year—even after the increases proposed in the uprating orders—to some £25 a week in residential homes and some £52 a week in nursing homes. Evictions of elderly people and closures of homes can therefore be expected to increase. Even more ominous, the survey found that half of all registered homes now refuse to take elderly people who are receiving benefit and cannot afford to top it up from a private source at a rate of up to £52·60 a week. Those people will not receive the care that they need.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): Disgraceful.

Mr. Meacher: It is disgraceful. For the first time, I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Hughes rose——

Mr. Meacher: I have abundant evidence to support my comments.

Another group—applicants to the social fund—is, in increasing numbers being faced with a blank order to go without. Last year, three quarters of such people were refused help. One quarter were refused help because their local Department of Social Security office did not have enough cash left. According to the recent devastating National Audit Office report published a fortnight ago, refusal rates are up to 73 per cent. for loans, up to 79 per cent. for grants and up to 51 per cent. for crisis loans.

The Secretary of State said that the social fund allows assistance to be targeted on those most in need. That is Toryspeak for rationing. It is also a lie. Those most in need —those without any money—are the people most likely to be refused help on the ground that they cannot repay the loan. That must surely be the ultimate hypocrisy.

The social fund is an ugly throwback to the Poor Law. It is a state-funded charity under which officers ration patently insufficient money among desperate claimants who have no right to an independent appeal against refusal. I can tell the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister that there will not be a classless society, let alone any decency or civilised values of care and compassion, until the social fund and its authors are swept away.

Our social security system is a negation of all that it should be. It does not provide social security; it provides a growing level of insecurity for millions of our people. Much of it is not administratively efficient, but wasteful. The National Audit Office report found that one third of the social fund's budget is spent on administration. The huge savings made by the computerisation programme are not being used to harmonise or improve the quality of the service. They have already been forfeited to the Treasury in staff cuts.

The priorities of current policy do not reflect need, they reflect dogma. This year, £1 billion is being spent on tax reliefs for personal pensions while the neediest are turned away from the social fund in their thousands. The poorest pensioners and low-income families with children are being made even worse off this year and specific benefits continue to be cut—notably statutory sick pay, the motion about which we will certainly vote against tonight. Britain now has the lowest pensions in Europe in cash terms and as a proportion of average income. The same applies to many other benefits.

After 12 years of Tory rule, poverty is again high on the political agenda as it shames the conscience of the nation. If the Government will not act to restore justice and decency in public life for all our citizens, the Labour party soon will after the general election.

5.15 pm

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, West): I will be brief, as my colleagues want to challenge the picture of deprivation painted so poignantly during the past 45 minutes by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher).

The hon. Member painted a poignant picture of an army of millions of paupers in the United Kingdom, with thousands of people who are beggared by an uncaring Conservative Government. The hon. Gentleman should come to my constituency and witness the outstanding, first-class social services provision provided by a superb committee from county hall, and by first-class social workers.

We have superb social workers in north Devon who care for the poorer elements in our society, of which there are many, because people regard the area as a Mecca. They come to live in Devon, but do not want to work. Instead, they try to live off the taxpayers in Devon.

If the hon. Member for Oldham, West visits my constituency, he will see that the way in which society comports itself, even when it is in difficulty in relation to income, is different from the picture that he painted.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Miss Emma Nicholson: I will give way to someone who is not a cousin, but who perhaps should be.

Mr. David Nicholson: Did my hon. Friend note that the amazing tirade from the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) was witnessed by a massive audience of only three Labour Back Benchers?

Miss Emma Nicholson: That always seems to happen when Opposition Members believe that they can rant and rave to maximum effect. However, they only do that to empty Opposition Benches. That always happens on Supply days. It is extraordinary that so few Opposition Members turn up.

I wonder whether the hon. Member for Oldham, West realises how much the age profile in this country and in other western nations is changing. We have a rising age profile. We are all getting older and living longer because of the health and welfare services run by this Government. We are also working longer, because there is not such a strict ceiling on working. We are living to a healthier old age, but we are having fewer children.

I am not making a political point; I am trying to introduce realism into this debate, following the speech of the hon. Member for Oldham, West. As a result of the rising age profile, the growing band of old people must be supported by an ever-shrinking group of younger earning people. We should look most keenly at those people in terms of income. I have a large number of pensioners in my constituency, and there is a rising age profile in Devon. In fact, in that respect, we are in advance of the rest of the country. However, as we grow older, we will all need to be supported by younger people who are earning, and that proportion of people is smaller than it has ever been.

We should not think that pensioners today have paid for the totality of the health and welfare provision that they are receiving after retirement. They made the modest contributions that the state sought from them at the time. However, pensioners are now dipping into state benefits in a very big way, because so much more is available in terms of social benefits, and particularly in terms of health care, and the younger people are paying for that.

Mr. David Shaw: In the picture that my hon. Friend paints, does she agree that, with the expanding number of pensioners and a smaller group of young people supporting them, we would expect, with limited resources, to find falling living standards for pensioners? However, under this Government, the reverse is the case. More pensioners than ever before own consumer goods such as televisions, telephones and cookers. Under this Government, the total income of pensioners has increased to record levels.

Miss Nicholson: I agree. I have a note which tells me that, on average, between 1979 and 1987, pensioners' net incomes in total grew by 32 per cent. above inflation, which is more than five times faster than they grew under Labour, when there were fewer pensioners.

It is important to strike a fair balance in society between pressure on younger earners and the proper welfare and health benefits that we offer the older recipients of those younger people's earnings. It is important to recognise that and not continually to ask unrealistically for full benefits across the spectrum of pensioners.

More and more of us have second pensions. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State rightly says, more and more people have a much wealthier life style than the word "pensioner" implies. According to the hon. Gentleman, when we think of pensioners, we might think of someone who is acutely poor. Yes, there are people who are pensioners and who are in poverty, and we must consider them even more rigorously than we have managed so far.

Most pensioners are far better off than pensioners have ever been. They should be well off, and they should be able to have holidays in Florida, colour televisions, two cars, and a longer, healthier and wealthier life. Let us not run away with the idea, however, that that is every pensioner in the United Kingdom—it most certainly is not. My right hon. Friend has struck a fair balance, which is difficult to find, between pressure on younger earners and benefits for older pensioners.

The hon. Gentleman remarked that the Government are not judged by little concessions. I agree—but nor were the previous Labour Government. However, my colleagues and I judge the current Labour Opposition by the proposed concessions that they disdainfully offer to the most needy group in our society, which must be those who are disabled, either mentally or physically. I am appalled that disabled people do not feature at all in Labour's priority social security pledges. They are just not there. They are an invisible element of society.

Two weeks ago, the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), the Opposition spokesman on such matters, said that all promises to disabled people were contingent upon the capabilities of the economy. If disabled people are contingent upon the capabilities of the economy, and if the Labour party is in charge of the economy, there will be nothing for them.

Mr. Flynn: Having studied the regulations with some care, I know that the only way in which they are related to the disabled concerns the changes in the statutory sick pay legislation. The result will be that it is much more difficult for disabled people to get jobs.

Miss Nicholson: I refer to the excellent changes that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has offered for disabled people. I am delighted that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People is on the Front Bench. Far from being uncaring and insensitive, my right hon. Friend treats the disabled on an equal basis, without the patronage that we frequently see in the Opposition.

I am delighted to note the increase in mobility allowance, for example. That is no minor concession. The Government have increased the mobility allowance in real terms by 550 per cent. since 1978-79. The number of recipients has increased six times—it is well over 0·5 million and it is approaching 0·75 million. Also, £4 million of new money has been allocated to include the deaf-blind, and double amputees will be included from April 1991, with a new grant of £1 million to Motability to convert cars.

Those are not concessions; they are ways of providing independence of thought, mobility, and accessibility to the disabled. That is what counts. They are a huge group of people. By any account, they are people in need. They genuinely cannot help themselves. They are very unlike the family in my constituency of whom I was reminded when we heard from Opposition Members about all the beggars in the United Kingdom. Indeed, three generations of one family—the grandfather and grandmother, father and mother, and now the children—are now living off the state. Not once has any member of that entire family done a job. They are beggars par excellence. Would hon. Members give more to such a family?

It is acutely important that we give independence of thought, life and ability to work to the disabled. I am therefore very excited that we have now given far more money to help people to go to work if they are disabled. That is an important point, because the number of disabled people is rising. The Government instituted the first study of how many disabled people there are in the United Kingdom and of what their disabilities are. Also, there is a consultation paper, and we on the Select Committee on Employment did a special study and recently published our findings. The Government have proved their credentials time and time again to that most needy group in society. It is enormously important for employment and employment prospects for the disabled that matters such as the mobility allowance are taken into account and uprated as they have been.

I strenuously welcomed the establishment of the independent living fund. I am delighted that its funding for 1991-92 has almost doubled compared with that of the current financial year. The fund has the flexibility which is the hallmark of the Government's treatment not only of the disabled but of those on lower incomes. Provision can be tailored finely to meet individual needs. Treatment is sensitive, and people are interviewed in their own homes.

We now see the real divide between the Government and the Opposition. The blanket coverage that the Opposition desire and constantly demand for everyone in the United Kingdom whom they define in a patriarchal manner as in need is 1 million light years away from the truly thoughtful, sensitive, intelligent and accurate pinpointing of need by the Conservative Government. I believe that I have made my case in talking about what the Government have done for the disabled in this uprating, and I support my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

5.26 pm

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Unlike the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson), I shall speak briefly, because, if the House will forgive me, I have a meeting at 5.30 pm. Also, unlike the hon. Lady, I have two points to make, and they are about the orders. Before the hon. Lady makes too much of the independent living fund, I bring her bad news. I share her views about the fund, but it is the Government's intention to chop the scheme when community care is introduced. If she wants to conduct a little campaign, many Opposition Members would join her.

First, I refer to fees for residential care. Over the past 10 years we have witnessed a massive change from hospital care for our very elderly citizens to care in private residential nursing homes. That would not have mattered if the costs were not borne by some families. Many of my constituents not only fought through two world wars but, unlike the beggar family whom the hon. Lady frequently mentioned, worked every year that they could work, paid their contributions and expected that, at the end of their working lives, they would be looked after—if need be, in hospital.

Now, in all our constituencies, some homes refuse access to constituents on benefits. The Minister for Social Security and Disabled People may have seen the citizens advice bureau report which shows that, in some areas, no homes are taking constituents who are on income support. We have changed from a situation in which our older citizens could have expected care in hospital—I am not saying that that was a desirable aim, but there were no bills—to one in which people should be cared for in residential homes, and we are now finding that an increasing number are refused entry because they cannot pay.

Also, an increasing group of constituents—pensioners—are being asked to pay a contribution to their parents' fees in nursing homes or residential homes. As the Minister knows, some of his hon. Friends can give him examples of contributions of about £25 per week being made to meet their parents' fees from the children's pensions. We shall shortly reach the stage where some of our constituents will face eviction. I know that the Government hope that, before that stage is reached, they will have managed to hand over that entire responsibility to the local authorities—although some of us may use the word "dumped". However, it is not a good enough policy for the Government to hope that time will be on their side and that that responsibility will not be theirs, but one for the local authorities to accept.

I hope that, with the help of the careful information that he will have been given by his hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench, the Minister will to some extent share with the House his thoughts on this matter. We may be faced with evictions, and we should debate this issue now, rather than wait until it is raised in an emergency debate once evictions occur.

I am grateful for the increases that the orders make. They are necessary and go some of the way, although not the whole way, that we have been seeking.

In the single minute left to me, I shall concentrate on the second issue that I wish to raise, child benefit. As my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) said, we now have a new regime. The upratings relate to the old regime. I do not want in any way to detract from the credit that must go to the Government team for getting through this botched measure, because, although it is indeed botched, that is not its importance. What is important is that, when getting the increase through, the old regime was nailed to a commitment to continue child benefit. All hon. Members are grateful to the Treasury Bench for achieving that.

However, there are now some difficulties with the child benefit scheme, about which I asked a serious question, but did not receive a serious answer. Both the Tory party and the Government are debating the future shape of the scheme. It is right that there should be such a debate in those two organisations, but it should be more open. Between 7 million and 8 million mothers draw child benefit every week. I do not think that the Government should conduct a review about the future shape of the child benefit scheme, guaranteeing that child benefit should remain, but wanting to debate the way in which the money is spent, in private, without including mothers or some of their representatives who are among my hon. Friends——

Mr. Peter Bottomley: And among my hon. Friends.

Mr. Field: Yes, and among Conservative Members.

In his reply, perhaps the Minister could give us some idea about the way in which the Government see the future shape of the child benefit scheme. We do not want the old patter, which states that it will be there for ever. We are grateful for that, and we know that we are in a new situation. We want to take the debate further. As a result of the Minister being open and honest with us, we might have a really good debate in the country as a whole about what mothers would like the future shape of child benefit to be, instead of about what a few Ministers or Members of Parliament would like.

I said that I would be brief, and I have already taken two minutes longer than I set myself, but I wanted to raise not only the issue of the future shape of child benefit but also, despite the Government's brave talk about how much more money is being allocated to cover the costs of residential care, the real problems of residential care provision, to which we shall have to face up before frail and elderly people are evicted on to the streets.

5.33 pm

Sir Anthony Durant (Reading, West): My hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) said that the Opposition's proposals do not mention disability. I must correct my hon. Friend and advise her that the Opposition document refers to a scheme for a new disability benefit. However, what the Opposition have not told anybody is how much it would cost or how it would be introduced. We do not know how the Opposition's proposals will work and we have not been given any costings. Nevertheless, as disability benefit is mentioned in one of the Labour party's documents, I must correct my hon. Friend.

The Government's record on pensions is not bad at all. Pensioners' total incomes are up by 32 per cent., on average—and it is total income that matters to pensioners, not the amount of state pension, which is a different issue altogether.

There are three types of pensioner and the differences between them are growing daily. The first group comprises the 50 per cent. of all pensioners who now have a second pension. Indeed, more than 70 per cent. of people currently retiring now have second pensions, many of which are substantial. Those people have quite a good life. On top of that, the Government have legislated to ensure that private pensions should be automatically increased by 3 per cent. per year to take account of the inflationary spiral. That, too, will help pensioners tremendously. Hon. Members of all parties have wished to ensure that people of pensionable age are well provided for.

The second group of pensioners comprises those who have low incomes and few resources but who live in a property that they own. Very often, those pensioners do not know how to get out of that property or what to do about it as it becomes run down. The Government should have taken more seriously what my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) proposed to try to enable those pensioners to use some of the money tied up in their houses to do up the property and obtain some tax relief while so doing. They may wish to sell the property, or they may wish to continue living there, but in better conditions. That group of pensioners certainly exists in my constituency.

The third group of pensioners comprises the small and declining group who do not have a second pension and who depend solely on the state pension and other state benefits. They are the poor group in our society, and I accept that they exist. Although they are a diminishing number, they are getting more resentful. Many of them live in old people's homes, where people with second pensions may also be living, but rather more comfortably. As the state-dependent group does not have the same amount of money, pensioners in that group feel more aggrieved.

That is why I strongly support the Government's move to put money in that direction. The Government have started to do that, and the uprating proposes a further £78 million to increase the benefits for those on the lowest incomes. The right way to tackle pensions is to acknowledge that it is the total income which matters, not the basic pension.

The Labour party has promised an extra £5 per week for single pensioners, but it has not mentioned uprating the whole thing to put back the money that Opposition Members keep saying that pensioners have lost. They are careful not to promise that, because it would result in enormous bills, which they do not want. The Labour party has said that it will link the basic state pension to prices and incomes, as used to happen, but I wonder whether it will actually do that if it ever comes into office. Its promises on pensions do not always live up to expectations.

As I have said, we have three groups of pensioners. There are those now benefiting from a second pension, who are doing extremely well and are very comfortable. There are those who have problems with their houses, many of whom have low incomes and only a small amount of capital. Then there is the smaller group, which is declining all the time, which comprises those who are dependent on the basic state pension and other benefits. That is the group that we must assist and on which we must concentrate. The Government have started to do that, by providing a further £78 million today.

The Labour party always talks about looking after the poor and those on low incomes, but what really matters to pensioners is inflation and what always happens with a Labour Government—it will happen again if the Labour party takes office—is that inflation takes off. Inflation averaged 16 per cent. when Labour was last in office, which meant that pensions diminished in value. Pensioners would be unwise to think that they would get a better long-term deal from the Labour party. What it says sounds attractive and very nice, but the reality of the Labour party's last period in office was that inflation increased and pensions decreased. The present Government have a good record. I support what they are doing on pensions, and I am proud to sit on this side of the House and to be a member of the Conservative party.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I listened with interest to the hon. Member for Reading, West (Sir A. Durant). I understand and sympathise with the point that he made when he identified a group of poorest pensioners, which he described as small and diminishing. Although it may be a diminishing group, it is certainly not small. We should not make light—I appreciate that he did not seek to do so—of the problems that they face. What worries me more than anything else in the Government's policy is that they are not taking any steps to address the diminishing value of the state pension in relation to the income available to the rest of the earning community. I accept that it is a difficult matter which could involve large sums of money.

Irrespective of whether one believes that universal increases in benefits should be available to all, between now and the beginning of the next century the Government—whatever their colour—will have to address the fact that, year in and year out, the group of pensioners to whom the hon. Member for Reading, West referred is losing out in relation to the community fortunate enough to be in work. The hon. Gentleman said that the £78 million was welcome, and indeed it is, so far as it goes, but it does not begin to deal with the problem. This is not just a problem for the coming year, to which the orders relate, but one that pensioners have experienced for the past five years, and it will continue for the next 15, 20 or

[Mr. Archy Kirkwood]

25 years until all pensioners have second pensions. Everyone recognises that, when my generation comes to retire, people will have occupational pensions and second pensions, will own their own homes, and so on. There is indeed an urgent problem, but the hon. Gentleman is not right to say that the Government are addressing it adequately.

I wish to ask a few questions in the context of the background against which the orders are being introduced. I am worried by some of the admittedly anecdotal evidence from my casework and other sources that the problem of indebtedness is getting out of hand. The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) rightly mentioned debt, and the consequences of financial deregulation have had far-reaching effects throughout the economy in terms of monetary policy, banking and so on. One of the implications which is only now coming home to me fully is that people in dire financial circumstances can get hold of enormous amounts of credit without any security. Week in and week out, I see more and more evidence that that is exactly what is happening.

Even in my constituency, rent arrears are reaching worrying proportions. Poll tax arrears are also becoming extremely worrying. The House should remember that Scotland is a year ahead of the rest of the country. Mortgage repossessions throughout the country are further evidence of the debt problem. Fuel costs and water charges are exacerbating the debt problem. Welcome though the increases in the orders may be so far as they go, evidence is coming through that there is a real problem out there for a large section of the community and it has not been addressed by the Government.

I have dealt substantially with the points about pensioners made by the hon. Member for Reading, West. I trust that the Government will not take the problems of pensioners lightly. The Government gave pensioners the Lawson bonus 18 months or two years ago. A one-off payment of £2·50 was made to certain elderly pensioners. I am not necessarily in favour of such piecemeal payments because the problems are more urgent and need a more strategic long-term approach and to be dealt with adequately. However, I hope that one-off payments are not off the agenda as an immediate way to bring some urgent relief to a section of our retired population.

As the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) said, there is a debate in the Conservative party and in the Government about child benefit. That is of fundamental importance. It is happening in my party, too. In the approach to a general election, parties reconsider their policies. I detect from the tone of the debate today that the general election is not far away because of the manner in which manifestos and statistics were traded across the Floor of the House. Luckily, most of the political ammunition goes above my head, so I propose to keep my head down for as long as I can. The debate on the future of child benefit is crucial. Some 7 million mothers receive it and £250 million is paid out. It is a major plank in any Government's policy.

If any fundamental changes are to be made, they should be debated in the open, as the hon. Member for Birkenhead said. Also, any changes that are to be made must be expressly included in party manifestos. In the recent past it has worried me that some of the social security changes that we have witnessed were virtually not discussed during the general election campaign. That happened during the time of the present Administration, so my objection is targeted exclusively at the Conservative Government. My plea is that if there are to be changes in child benefit, they should be discussed openly beforehand and included explicitly in the election manifestos of all major political parties.

I have a series of short questions about the detail of some of the orders. I may have missed them, but I have not seen any published figures for the level of the social fund budget for the next financial year. I do not know when that will appear in the annual cycle of uprating statements, public expenditure announcements, White Papers, and so on. If the figure has not yet been published, I hope that the Government will do so shortly. Certainly, the grants and loans budget, even if it is only uprated in line with inflation, should be in the region of £230 million. My experience—I am sure that it is not unique—is that even that will not be enough to meet the demand. Certainly it is not enough to meet demand for community care grants and to move towards implementing the community care system of finance. The amounts paid in grants must be watched carefully during the period of these orders. I hope that consideration is being given to increasing significantly the community care grants within the social fund.

I cannot possibly make a speech on the uprating orders in relation to the social fund without saying a word about severe weather payments. We have been up hill and down dale since the beginning of the year on this. I understand perfectly that it is not an easy matter to deal with, and the Minister of State is on record as saying that a review is to be undertaken. I hope that the review will be undertaken quickly, because the experience during the recent unusually cold snap was not happy. Statistical evidence is beginning to filter through from reports that large numbers of people in Britain have suffered as a result of the cold weather this year and that that was not an accident. That needs to be addressed as a matter of urgency.

We may see substantial, indeed swingeing, increases in the level of the poll tax in the near future. I do not want to get into a battle about who is responsible——

The Minister for Social Security and Disabled People (Mr. Nicholas Scott): Before the hon. Gentleman goes on to his next point, I remind him that I am committed to reviewing the cold weather payments. He said that many people had suffered. We deemed the whole country as qualifying to trigger the cold weather payment during the period of the most excessive cold, and we made the necessary payments. I should be grateful if the hon. Gentleman would give me as much evidence as he has to assist my review. I want to listen to the constituency experiences of all hon. Members. If the hon. Gentleman will let me have any evidence that he has, I will take it into account.

Mr. Kirkwood: I take the spirit of that intervention as helpful. I was referring to the statistical evidence that our mortality rates during the winter months are worse than in other countries. I accept that the whole country was entitled to cold weather payment. That was welcome, but there was some confusion about the way in which the payment was introduced.

With regard to increases in the community charge, the House will know that in 1988-89 the Government compensated people on benefit for having to pay 20 per cent. of their community charge or poll tax. Substantial increases in poll tax are in the pipeline in Scotland—I do not know about other parts of the country—far in excess of any compensation that the Government ever envisaged. The Government decided to increase benefits by about £1·30 per week to compensate for the 20 per cent. payment. That will have to be reassessed in view of the current level of increases in community charge that people face, especially as water charges are not rebateable at all.

In Scotland, water rate charges have certainly been spiralling. Even with the recent relief scheme for the community charge, benefit increases do not compensate for the basic increases that have to be paid. If the Government could identify the level of compensation within income support that is earmarked to address the extra amounts that poll tax payers and water charge payers have to meet, that would help. The Government may not have realised that poll tax and water charges would spiral.

The Audit Commission report said that one of the most cost-effective things that the Government could do would be to sweep away the 80 per cent. enforced ceiling on rebates, because the net benefit annually to the average person paying a 20 per cent. poll tax contribution is £6, while the net collection cost is £15. It would save money if the Government did away with the 20 per cent. enforced contribution.

I support everything that the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) said about residential charges. The Price Waterhouse report suggested that Scotland was the second most expensive area outside London for ordinary residential charges; I am not talking about charges in nursing homes or specialist homes. The increase of £5 in residential home fees is not enough. I have evidence of friends, neighbours and family having to contribute in order to meet residential home charges.

I hope that the Government will do something about national insurance benefits for fishermen. I was given the opportunity to raise the issue by the Secretary of State's announcement about a change in class 2 payments. I welcome that, because it has been a bone of contention in the recent past for fishermen. The change in the weekly earnings rule, coupled with the new lower earnings limit, puts fishermen at a disadvantage in terms of unemployment benefit, particularly if half the eight day tie-up is in one week and the other half in the second week. Fishermen can earn enough in the working days of both weeks to take them out of benefit. That is an unfair consequence of the recent benefit changes, and I hope that the Government will review it.

In relation to non-dependant deductions on applicable amounts for housing benefit, can someone tell me why there have never been stiff increases? According to my arithmetic, the increase is 25 per cent. The sums were done by me, so they may be suspect. So far as I can see, however, the non-dependant deductions at the higher level have gone up from £10·85 to £13·50—a 25 per cent. increase. Even at the lower level there is a 25 per cent. increase—from £4·55 to £5·70. I do not understand that, and I would welcome clarification.

I have come across the case of two 19-year-old non-dependants with someone who was claiming housing benefit. I do not know what average local authority rents are in other parts of the country, but £27 per week is the about average in my area. If two non-dependant 19-year-olds both get assessed at £13·50, it means that the householder will be deprived of all housing benefit and will have to meet the full rent. If the non-dependants happen to be unemployed, that produces further financial and domestic problems. I do not understand why there should be a 25 per cent. hike when there are much lower increases in other areas. Is there a different way of calculating the non-dependant deductions? If so, I am unaware of it. I should like clarification.

I do not think that the Government's announcement and these upratings do anything other than the Government are statutorily obliged to do. There may have been small increases and insofar as there have been increases, I welcome them, but we need something more if the Government are to show that they recognise the stark financial reality faced by many poor pensioners and families.

5.53 pm

Mr. John Bowis (Battersea): I am pleased to support my right hon. Friend's proposals in the package of upratings of benefits. It is yet another step forward by the Government in looking after people who need our support. I had hoped that the debate would have been a serious discussion, with observations from both sides of the House on how to improve benefits still further, bring in new schemes, enhance existing ones and so on. Although I exempt the hon. Members for Roxborough and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) and Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who spoke briefly, I cannot exempt the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) from the charge of not really being interested in the welfare of the people we are seeking to help. He was much more interested in trying to make party political points in what he presumably sees as the run-up to a general election in the not too distant future.

The hon. Gentleman's speech was amazingly disappointing. I can only imagine that he looked at the proposals before him, realised that his party when in power had not produced such ideas, and tried to camouflage the fact that it had come up with nothing in the past and had no credible policies for the future. When one meets people who are in need or those who look after them, one hears of great respect for my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Minister of State who is responsible for people with disability. One does not hear much about the hon. Member for Oldham, West; having heard him today, we understand why.

The Government cannot solve overnight the problems of all the people in need. They have never claimed to do so, but when they perceive a problem and understand it, they bring forward solutions. Under the Conservative Government, we have had a remarkable and sustained improvement in the living standards of people in the groups about which we have been talking.

One has only to consider the overall position of pensioners. Of course one can find individual pensioners who have not done as well as others, but the broad band of pensioners have been much better off under the Government, partly because of the improvement in the economy, partly because of the Government's ability to get inflation under control and partly because of the benefits in cash and in kind that older people have received from the Government.

Pensioners are better off to the tune of over 30 per cent. in real terms since the Government came into power. That is the result of a combination of factors. Pensioners' income from savings has gone up phenomenally because of high interest rates. Occasionally, pensioners slightly regret a tumble in interest rates. Nevertheless, low inflation and sound investments mean that pensioners have done better from their savings. They have also done considerably better from occupational pensions.

Is it possible to tabulate comparisons with our friends and neighbours in the European Community? One often hears misleading statements about how we compare with other countries. In any given figures, the comparison is often of like with unlike. Perhaps the spouse is not covered by a non-contributory pension in the other country, whereas that spouse is covered here. Perhaps the comparison does not take account of benefits in kind from local or national Government. It would be helpful to have real comparisons instead of occasionally misleading statistical ones.

I am always ready to press my right hon. Friends to go further on that category of pensioner who is just above benefit level and tends to miss out. I do so for good reason, because I spoke about that in my maiden speech. Such pensioners do not get the basic benefit, and, on top of that, they miss out on consequential benefits. I am especially pleased that, this year, the Government have introduced an additional benefit for those pensioners on low income who receive enough from that income to be judged above the benefit level. I am sure that the extra £1 a week will help such pensioners, but I urge my right hon. Friends to go further.

It is good to note that the problems associated with child benefit are being solved. I refer to that tentatively as I remember the days when our late colleague, Sir Brandon Rhys Williams, tabled an amendment to Government policy to ensure that we did not forget the aims behind child benefit—to help children judged to be in need, especially those who may not be caught by other benefits. I supported the change advocated by Sir Brandon, and I am pleased to note that the Government have now found it possible to increase the benefit for the first child. I hope that they will continue to study how further improvements could be made—for example, benefits for children under five. Certainly there are merits in that.

I am conscious of the need to consider other ways in which to improve the income of families with children. The measures taken to encourage fathers who have deserted their families to make a contribution is welcome.

I am pleased to note the proposals on nursing and residential homes. The Price Waterhouse factor has, I am sure, led to the additional support for nursing homes in the uprating. The extra £45 per week, together with the London supplement, is welcome. I am also pleased to note the emphasis given to centres geared to people with alcohol and drug-related problems. I pressed for such improvements some months ago for the Davies centre, which is part of the Turning Point group. That centre helps people who have come out of detoxification units to go back into the community and without such support those people would find that difficult.

The Government should consider, however, voluntary hospices and the contributions that they invite, but do not demand, from their patients. Department of Social Security offices have disallowed those contributions to be taken as supplements to income support. I know the arguments about that, but that is a hard ruling, as it requires the voluntary hospice movement to make a charge when it has not done so previously. That ruling has affected people with a short lifespan. Many hospices are reluctant to make that charge, so they are losing out.

The House has a particular duty to look after people with disabilities. I welcome the various measures that have already been introduced, but it is important to continue to consider the various problems associated with living and coping with disability, mobility and the ability to work. I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for creating the independent living fund and I hope that, whatever the future may bring, that scheme, or something like it, will continue. I especially welcome the fact that that fund has been doubled this year. The improvements in invalidity care allowance, motability and mobility allowances are also welcome.

People with disabilities are always close to our hearts when we consider policy. We have reached the stage where we no longer lock away people with disabilities; rather, we encourage them and enable them to come into the community. Children with disabilities are no longer automatically sent to special schools or colleges—we have enabled them to join mainstream schools and colleges. People with disabilities now work in shops, offices, factories and even in this House. Those people no longer work in enclosed workshops in residential homes. We have enabled people to get to work under their own steam so that they do not have to wait to be wheeled out from their homes. We have enabled people to nurture hopes and ambitions to achieve things with their lives. The carers allowance also means that we look after those who look after people with disabilities.

If we accept that there is nothing that people with disabilities cannot achieve if the House, Government and nation so enable as a result of various measures, such as the allowances we are discussing today, we shall do right by them and by all the others for whom we have a duty of care.

6.5 pm

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport-West): Sir Thomas Beecham used to refer to the encores that he gave at the end of his concerts as "musical lollipops". They were always pieces of music that were light and attractive, but there was no great substance to them. Since the new Prime Minister took over, we have seen the advent of political lollipops. At various Question Times, the Prime Minister—the Secretary of State for Social Security did the same today—has contrived to award such a lollipop to the waiting, admiring population. Those lollipops have a mammouth publicity value, but are protozoan in terms of the money they represent.

Today the Secretary of State announced an incease of £10,000, equivalent to a 50 per cent. increase, in the award to the parents of vaccine-damaged children. That money will go to about five families a year, so the amount awarded is microscopic in terms of the available budget. Those families have suffered a particularly harrowing experience. Part of the grief felt by the parents for a dead child is guilt. That feeling is especially harrowing in the case of vaccine-damaged children, because the parents took a deliberate decision—with no blame to themselves—that resulted in that damage.

Everyone will welcome the award to those parents, but we are entitled to display some cynicism about it. The uprating of that award is below the level of earnings at which it should have been set—it is possibly above the level of inflation—and it is significant only because it applies to a small number of children. In other cases, tens of thousands, even millions, of children are involved, but there has been no such generosity or uprating.

One of the most important changes has been that to child benefit—rightly described as a "botch-up". I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) that it is good to see the log-jam broken, and that that benefit will no longer be allowed to wither on the vine. The £1 increase for the first child—it is not in the uprating order, but in separate regulations—is slightly more than the going rate of benefit. For the first child, that extra £1 is more than the 10·9 per cent. allowed for inflation for a one-child family, but the increase is less than that 10·9 per cent. for a two-child family—10·9 per cent. of £14·50 is £1·58. Those families are losing when one takes into account the inflation rate. The larger the family, the greater the shortfall. A four-child family would need £3·16 to compensate for inflation, but they shall receive only £1.

All lone parents not getting means-tested benefits will lose, including those with only one child. A one-parent family with one child now gets £7·25 plus £5·60 one-parent benefit, which is not being increased—a total of £12·85. The uprating on that amount would have been £1·40, and lone parents will only receive an extra £1. Therefore, a one-parent family with two children would need an extra £2·19 to compensate for inflation, but will receive just £1.

The reduction in the child dependency allowance increases by £1 per week per family to deprive them of the extra £1 benefit. There will not be four or five such payments a year, but 192,000. That is not included in the uprating order, but will be achieved subsequently by regulation. However, the order covers the partner's earning limits, above which the child dependency increases cease to be payable. They are to be increased in line with prices, when they should obviously be increased in line with earnings. They were introduced in 1984, when the limit was set at £80 for the first child, plus £10 for each subsequent child. Since then, average earnings have risen by 70 per cent., so the limit should now be £136, plus £17 for each additional child. Instead, the new limit will be £110, plus £14—a significant cut.

The £1,000 widow's payment remains the same, but there are not four or five widows in the country, but tens of thousands, possibly hundreds of thousands of widows who regularly claim benefit, which has been frozen for the third year running. It has been frozen for nearly six years since it was announced in June 1985—and it was not introduced until April 1988. It replaced the former widow's allowance, which used to be paid at a higher rate than other widows' benefits for the first six months of widowhood. If the widow's allowance had not been abolished, it would have increased over that period from £50·10 a week to £72·80—an increase of 45 per cent. On that basis, the £1,000 should now be £1,450—the Government have made enormous savings by cutting the amount given to widows.

In Committee, Social Security Ministers take an affable approach; we all find them persuasive and want to believe what we are told. But it is interesting to recall that, when the widow's allowance was replaced by a lump sum widow's payment in 1986, the present Secretary of State resisted an amendment providing for automatic annual increases and told the Standing Committee:

"When the final decisions on all rates of the new benefits under the Bill are taken in the autumn of 1987, we shall obviously consider whether it would be appropriate to change the level of widow's benefit stated in the Bill."—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 17 April 1986; c. 1439.]

Will the Minister say why it has not been considered appropriate to change the important benefit given to widows? In 1986, the Committee might well have taken a different view of the proposal if the Minister had admitted that the £1,000 payment was to be frozen indefinitely.

Although most of the means-tested benefit rates are increasing in line with prices—excluding the housing benefits—the disregards are not. In particular, the £3,000 capital disregard has been frozen, not only since it was introduced in 1988, but since it was announced in 1985 in a Green Paper on the reform of social security. Merely to compensate for price increases since then, the benefit should be not £3,000, but £4,350.

All these increases are subtle and hidden, they are not obvious. They are not introduced with a blare of trumpets and trombones from the Dispatch Box, but they represent deep cuts. Similarly, since it was increased in November 1983 the £500 capital limit for social fund payments has been frozen for everyone except those aged 60 or over. It was then the capital limit for single payments under the supplementary benefit regulations. Since then, prices have risen by more than 50 per cent., so the limit should be more than £750 just to keep pace with inflation, let alone with earnings.

The child benefit regulations provide £1 extra for the single family. I remember in another Committee discussing a comment by Beveridge, when he talked about certain anomalies and said he hoped that they were buried for ever and would never again rise from their dishonoured grave, but for us, another little nasty has been resurrected by that extra £1. An important advantage of child benefit compared to the pre-1976 system of family allowance is that it is payable at the same rate for every child in the family. The family allowance excluded the first child, and complicated rules were needed to decide, if parents were separated—unhappily, an increasing occurrence—whether the two children were members of the same family or different families.

The extra £1 reintroduces those complications, since it is payable only to the first child. Hence the incomprehensible provisions of regulation 2(b), about which I have written to the Minister—I longingly await his reply. If my interpretation of the regulation is correct, it will, in some cases, disqualify both parents from receiving the extra £1, which is obviously nonsense and cannot be the intention.

Further anomalies arise from the statutory sick pay regulations, upon which we shall vote tonight, and I believe that they will be the subject of a speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen).

Tonight, Social Security Ministers are working their old magic like the old illusionists they are and providing, up front, obvious little benefits—tiny lollipops; but under the welter of complex social security legislation, there are deep and serious cuts.

6.17 pm

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn), who produced his statistics more briefly than the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), who kept us for 42 minutes and spent hardly any time on the orders.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West forgot to remind us that it was a Labour Chancellor who, in 1967, was the first to try to take family allowance away from the majority of families. He also forgot to tell us about the child benefit cheat—when the House approved the move to combine child tax allowances and family allowances to produce a child benefit, with which the Labour Government refused to go ahead. He also talked about a Christmas bonus of £2,000, but forgot to tell us that the Labour party took away a Christmas bonus of £10. This strikes me as the sort of sterile speech which we are used to hearing from the hon. Member for Oldham, West, and the sooner he is moved on to other pastures to make way for the hon. Member for Newport, West, the faster we shall proceed in our debates.

There are some serious problems to tackle in the years ahead, and we should approve the orders. I shall spend a few moments talking about what has been called child benefit, but which I think should be called child cash allowance. In the mid-1970s, we discussed whether it would be more sensible to get rid of child tax allowances, whereby the rich received more and people below the tax threshold got nothing. No one then anticipated that the name "child benefit" would mean that it would always be argued about in the bilateral discussions between the Department of Social Security and the Treasury.

A problem was anticipated, which was why my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Surrey, East (Sir G. Howe), who became the Chancellor, and Patrick Jenkin, the then Member for Wanstead and Woodford, agreed in 1978 that child benefit would not be taken into account in social security spending but would, in effect, be netted off against tax.

We face two problems, for which I do not in any way blame the present Front Bench team or the Chief Secretaries over the years. It is in the nature of the bilaterals for the Chief Secretary to ask how he can squeeze down Government spending, while the Department of Social Security wants to concentrate help on those who most need it. Those are the two functions; the problem is a functional one.

I have a proposal that I do not expect my right hon. Friend the Minister of State to comment on in winding up. I expect that he will spend most of his time batting the hon. Member for Oldham, West round the court. I suggest, first, that the debate should consider whether there should be an allowance for the child. If the answer is clearly yes, taxable capacity is reduced and needs are increased. Plainly there should be a child allowance. Secondly, is it better for the allowance to be a tax allowance or cash? It should be a cash allowance and decisions about the level of such allowances should be removed from the Department of Social Security, thereby lifting one of the burdens from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. Decisions about child allowance should be made by the Treasury.

I have discovered a secret in the House. In answer to a question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Sir R. McCrindle), my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Treasury said that she would not answer any questions about child benefit because the Budget is on the way. That reply is contained in the Official Report of 31 January 1991, column 1094. The Minister of State gave the same reply to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn). I do not think that that was a coded signal, because I do not think that the next Budget will set the level of child cash allowances. If I am wrong and I have underestimated the speed at which the Treasury accepts the logic of an argument, I shall willingly apologise, by public press release and not secretly in the House.

The term "child benefit" is a mistake. It is sensible for the Treasury to ask the Department of Social Security to be the paying agency, but the allowance must be taken out of the public expenditure round. That is where things have gone wrong. It is wrong to say that, if my right hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) had continued as Prime Minister, we would not have had the same improvement. I believe what I have heard—that the previous Chief Secretary to the Treasury, now my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security had agreed and shown the results of their agreement to my right hon. Friend the previous Prime Minister before all the excitement.

The freeze for the three years before that was a mistake, and I said so when I was a Minister. If we are to avoid such mistakes, we must change the name of the benefit and transfer the responsibility. When we do that, we will make further progress and the child allowance will not just be indexed to inflation, but increased. There was newspaper speculation that the previous Prime Minister had some people in.

Mr. Newton: I had no intention of getting involved in this issue. I thought that I had listened carefully to the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn). If the hon. Gentleman seriously suggested or implied that the child benefit increase had anything to do with the change of Prime Minister and leadership of the Conservative party, he was talking utter nonsense. The uprating statement was made the best part of a month before the events in question.

Mr. Bottomley: I do not think that the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) said that. It was mentioned slightly earlier, when we were discussing new and old regimes. I hope that we can move the matter forward. Child allowance should be cash or a tax allowance. I hope that we will hear less from David Willetts until he comes to the House.

Sir Timothy Raison (Aylesbury): I cannot give an authoritative answer on these issues, but my hon. Friend should explain why he thinks that the Treasury would be more generous than the Department of Social Security.

Mr. Bottomley: The Treasury would have to consider the matter when it considered the proportion of mortgage relief granted to people with incomes of more than £20,000 a year. About 50 per cent. of that relief goes to those of us who are so poor that we have mortgages of £30,000 or more and pay tax at the rate of 40 per cent. or more. The value of the tax relief to two people, perhaps television producers or trade union officials, with a combined income of £70,000 a year, is equivalent to 12 child benefits every year and not just during the years when they have children. When the Treasury and the Inland Revenue look at the issue, they will come up with the answer that they used to give and not an answer relating to the structural problem and the name problem.

Having trespassed on the House's hospitality for the second day running, I had better stop. I hope that my speech has been noted. May I please be told whom to ask to get involved in these discussions—whether they are members of the party or the Government? Perhaps that information could also be given to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). That would enable all of us to move forward, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Sir T. Raison) before he moves off to advertising. I hope that the House can find some suitable structure.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): I am pleased to reply to my first debate on social security. This is probably the last uprating debate before the general election, and therefore the last time that I and my hon. Friends will speak on uprating from this side of the House. In that context, it is worth looking back at the social security dark ages, from which we shortly hope to emerge, and towards the enlightenment that is about to begin.

I reaffirm the whole notion of national insurance. It is to the credit of neither Conservatives nor Labour Governments that ordinary people now feel remote from and unconnected to national insurance, which has become an almost secret tax raising revenue of billions of pounds. One of our prime tasks in government will be to ensure that we not only address the level and scope of benefits but that we return to the whole idea of a communal insurance policy. We shall return that idea to the heart of the civilised values that we cherish.

There is such a thing as society, and our standard will be an honest national insurance fund separate from taxation and able to meet needs as they arise. That will be a monumental task, and that is evident when we look at the overgrowth of political expediency and short-termism which encrusts the present system. One of the worst abuses of that system has been the rip-off of our pension funds to the tune of perhaps £10 billion. That matter is still being investigated by the Public Accounts Committee, which will no doubt report in due course.

Mr. Scott: It is important for the hon. Gentleman to clarify his suggestion. Is he saying that the whole of the social security system as we presently understand it, with its contributory and non-contributory benefits, will be funded from a new national insurance fund? If so, how will contributions to that fund be paid by employers and employees, and what will be the level of contribution?

Mr. Allen: No, I am not suggesting that. If I am ever in charge of a review, I shall rule nothing in and rule nothing out.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying wide of the orders.

Mr. Allen: I shall resist any temptation by the Minister of State to go wide of the terms of the orders.

There is evident extravagance and profligacy about subsidising and sweetening private pension companies. Therefore, I hope that no Conservative Member is brainless enough to ask where all the money will come from to give decent pensions to the elderly and adequate child benefit to the mothers. The great SERPS robbery —a wholly party political racket—makes even the £1 million a day fraud by employers on insurance stamps look like a minor misdemeanour, yet both sets of villains have escaped attention—first, because of the technical nature of the offences and, secondly, because the victims are tomorrow's pensioners. Like the sleeping victims of a burglary, they do not know what awaits them and will not find out until morning.

Many of today's pensioners know better, because they have seen what the Government have done to the basic state pension. However hard the Conservatives wriggle, and whatever statistical wheeze they employ, the plain fact that hangs around their necks and will stay there until the election is that breaking the earnings link has robbed the single pensioner of £12·80 a week and a couple of £20·50 a week. That is not a one-off smash and grab, but a recidivist return each and every week so long as they shall live.

Much has been said today about child benefit. The uprating, such as it is, bears all the hallmarks of a "John'll fix it". First, there is a lack of will to tackle the real problem, thinly concealed by a half-hearted, half-baked and, above all, half-priced gesture. One can picture the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the last days of the Thatcher Reich—with high interest rates, a massive trade deficit and looming recession all around him—struggling with the knotty problem of which twin should be awarded the new first-born benefit—or should it have been the "Eastbourne" benefit?

Not that honest John would ever try to purchase short-term popularity for a by-election victory. I cannot help thinking that the phrase must have been put in the Conservative manifesto in 1987 by somebody, perhaps a junior Social Security Minister —some anal retentive determined to tell the literal truth, but misleading the gullible, rather in the way that the Prime Minister said recently that the last Labour Government did not have a cold weather payments scheme. That too is literally true, but it ignores the fact that, because of the generous extra needs payments and the electricity discount scheme then in operation, but abolished by the Conservative Government, such a scheme was not necessary. It is petty, it is cheap, and "it is coming to a social security office near you".

"Child benefit will continue to be paid as now"

Whatever way one looks at these uprating orders, one sees a shabby deal—a budget cut here, a corner cut there. The social fund is a very sad example. The fund is meant to help the most needy in our society—those from broken homes, ex-prisoners, former drug abusers, the mentally ill, the mentally handicapped, and the plain poor. Despite this, the budget is a fraction of the one under the scheme that it replaced, and two thirds of payments come in the form of loans rather than grants—loans, to people already trying to live on £30 or £40 a week.

The Conservative Government should be ashamed of themselves. Instead, they find someone else to blame. In this instance, they foist the blame on the local offices of the Department of Social Security, whose social fund budgets are so constricted that ridiculous anomalies arise. At the Public Accounts Committee on Monday, I drew the attention of the permanent secretary of the Department to a particular case in my constituency. A battered wife from the Nottingham, North women's refuge is not high enough on the priority list to get from the Nottingham social security office a grant for a bed, a table and some other furniture. Had she lived in nearby Alfreton, she could have received those payments. Such are the differences in priorities from one office to another.

[Mr. Allen]

Meanwhile, people surviving on income support are among those who are being squeezed hardest by increases in water, electricity and gas charges. Public utilities were privatised, in a "money no object" exercise, by the selfsame Conservative Government. The present Government can blow billions of pounds of North sea oil revenue, yet there are 130,000 individuals on transitional additions—130,000 people who have not had an increase in income support for three years.

Others who will judge for themselves the generosity of the uprating include the rising numbers of people being made redundant as a major recession steamrolls them. A few of the severely disabled are assisted by the independent living fund, which the Conservative Government still refuse to put on a statutory footing, despite the obvious and chronic demand.

I am very proud to say that the independent living fund is in my constituency. The officers who serve it do a magnificent job—a job of which the Secretary of State and his team and, indeed, the rest of us should be proud. None the less, it is a scheme created to put a problem—as the Government see it, a public expenditure problem—at arm's length. Next, I understand, there may be an agency, or the problem may be referred to local authorities. This is a way of sweeping a difficult situation under the carpet.

The creation of a social security benefits agency is another case in point. When Members of Parliament table questions about matters within the competence of that agency, the answers will not be printed in Hansard for the benefit of all Members, who might then ask questions relating to the benefits of people in their constituencies. Members making such inquiries will receive letters from the chief executive of the agency, and if other Members wish to see those letters, they will have to go to the Library. That undermines what little democracy and accountability this House has in respect of social security matters.

Mr. Ian McCartney (Makerfield): What my hon. Friend is describing is a broken promise. At meetings of the Select Committee on Social Security, it was made absolutely clear that the opportunities to question Ministers about the internal workings of the Departments would be undiminished.

Mr. Allen: My hon. Friend has made a very pertinent point. I hope that, even at this stage, the Secretary of State will reconsider the way in which social security matters within the realm of the benefits agency might be brought before this House. This is a central point of parliamentary accountability.

I should like to answer a query about the amount of money spent on state pensions. We can all bandy statistics. This is an area in which that happens all the time. Central to our commitment to social security expenditure must be the principle that those people who, in some way, are cared for out of social security expenditure should share in the prosperity of the nation. So far as I am concerned, the most startling statistic in this area is the reduction in expenditure as a percentage of gross domestic product. Between 1984-85 and 1989-90, expenditure fell from 12·2 per cent. to 10·3 per cent. That is a very significant and sad statistic. Perhaps the Minister of State will comment on it.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): What would the Labour party do?

Mr. Allen: The hon. Gentleman asks what we shall do. I do not want to stray too far from my brief, but I am pleased, in reply to a question from a sedentary position, to say that the hon. Gentleman will be made very well aware of our intentions. I do not know whether he has read the Labour party's documents. If not, I shall be very glad to send him copies. We shall, of course, insist on an immediate increase of £5 a week in the pensions of single people. That £5 will be over and above the increase that will be made in April. In the case of a married couple, the increase will be £8. Thereafter, there will be immediate linkage to earnings or inflation, whichever is the higher.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): How much will it cost?

Mr. Allen: The hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes), also from a sedentary position, asks how much it will cost. I shall gladly give him figures provided by his own Government. The pension rise will cost £2·3 billion, and the increase in child benefit will cost £0·75 billion. I make this commitment. Indeed, it is in the Labour party documents for all to see. [Interruption.] There is no hidden agenda here. Child benefit will be restored to the level of 1979. In other words, we are prepared to invest in children and in the future of this nation.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Is the Labour party committed to restoring child benefit to the record level of 1983, or does it consider the lower level of 1979 as the limit? Is it committed to expenditure in any other areas? What proportion of the total increase in public spending promised by the Labour party is made up of increases in child benefit? Is it 100, 50, or 30 per cent. of additional spending?

Mr. Allen: The hon. Gentleman has a cheek. He was a member of a Government who have presided over a reduction in child benefit during the past four or five years. I shall say slowly, for the benefit of the hon. Gentleman, that the next Labour Government will return child benefit to its value when Labour was last in office. That would mean a very much higher level—£2·30 higher than it is under this Government, in which the hon. Gentleman served for many years.

I must make it clear that, much as I would be pleased to make commitments about spending in other areas, the hon. Gentleman must know that no additional commitments can be undertaken until such are considered appropriate in the light of economic developments and economic growth [Interruption.]. Hon. Members must allow me to finish my remarks. I should love to answer questions on health, but unfortunately my remit does not stretch that far, just yet.

There can be little doubt that, as the election comes closer, the Prime Minister is seeing in his private opinion polls confirmation that the Conservative myth that being the party of the family is buried under an incontrovertible mountain of payment books. In view of the Prime Minister's style, I guarantee that behind the grin there will be more social security fixes, more opportunist gifts, a little Budget sweetener here and a little panic response there. The day of reckoning is coming sooner than Conservative Members think. For those dependent upon pensions and benefits, that day cannot come soon enough.

The Minister for Social Security and Disabled People (Mr. Nicholas Scott): As the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) came towards the end of his speech, we had some insight into the scale of commitments that the Labour party will offer in its next election manifesto. It may wrap the manifesto in weasel words, but today we have had a commitment on pensioners which appears to amount to some £3 billion. In Committee on the Disability Living Allowance and Disability Working Bill, we discussed a variety of Labour amendments that would have amounted to a further £3 billion expenditure. There is also another range of commitments on child support.

Every time I face the Labour party across the Floor of the House, I am reminded of the comment of my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) about the last Labour Government promising the earth and delivering the International Monetary Fund. I am afraid that that is exactly the position in which any future Labour Government—remote though that possibility may be—will very quickly find themselves.

Today, we are discussing a series of orders, the most important being the uprating order, which provides additional resources of £5 billion for the social security system. The Labour party may say that it is possible to have generous increases across the board, but our approach to social security is to protect the generality of people in receipt of social security benefit from the impact of price increases. Within that overall approach, we wish to ensure that additional help goes to the most vulnerable groups in our society. I should like to refer briefly to each of those groups.

We must, of course, consider the position of pensioners in our society. Any society owes a debt to those who have spent their lives working in the community, for society, and who then look to the state and to the companies which employed them to look after them in their retirement. As was said earlier, the real standard of living of pensioners as a whole has increased dramatically in recent years. Since 1979, it has risen by 31 per cent. in real terms compared with a 3 per cent. increase under the last Labour Government. Indeed, pensioners' incomes have risen twice as fast as the incomes of the remainder of the population.

I know that it is part of the Labour party's attitude of mind that it should think only about the benefits that people receive from the state. We believe that we should consider pensioners' standards of living as they are affected both by their occupational pensions and by the savings that they have accumulated during their working lives, as well as in the context of state benefits. As I said, there has been a 31 per cent. increase in pensioners' standards of living since we took office in 1979, compared with a 3 per cent. increase under the last Labour Government.

I recognise, as any hon. Member recognises, that I am referring to the general position, and that it disguises the fact that some people have had increases in their standards of living greater then 31 per cent., while others have had a lesser increase. We can all identify with the pensioner who has lost out.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley): Because of the poll tax.

Mr. Scott: I am not disguising any facts. There are a number of pensioners whose savings were destroyed by inflation during the 1970s. Those people spent most of their working lives at a time when occupational pensions were not so widespread or so generous as they are today. Many working careers were interrupted by the second world war. Our approach, over successive years, has been to give additional help to poorer pensioners. We have provided millions of pounds in additional help for them——

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: What about the poll tax?

Mr. Scott: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to intervene, he should stand up. I would happily give way to him.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: Will the Minister tell the House about the cost of the poll tax to pensioners? Is it not 10 to 15 per cent. of their income? Even pensioners on low incomes have had to suffer that sort of increase.

Mr. Scott: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point. The poorer pensioners benefit from community charge rebate and from various other help that we have given to those paying the community charge. That help was extended recently. I recognise that there is a group of poorer pensioners, and we have concentrated help on their specific needs rather than making the sort of grandiose promises made by the Opposition.

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): I regret that I have not been able to contribute to the debate. The Secretary of State made great play of the fact that housing costs were no longer included when working out the uprating statement. The difficulty is that the housing costs element of the retail prices index includes other crucial items such as the poll tax and water rates. People must pay a minimum of 20 per cent. of their poll tax, and must also find the money to pay rising water rates. Is it not true that the uprating of means-tested income support takes no account of those vital increases?

Mr. Scott: If the hon. Gentleman would use his influence with some of the council leaders in socialist authorities to hold down the level of community charge, he might be making a sensible contribution to the debate.

In winding up the debate, I seek not to wind up Opposition Members, but to make a serious contribution. I wish to identify groups of people in our society who need some sensible additional help in sustaining their living standards. I want to mention one group that is especially close to my heart, and comes within my job description, and that is disabled people. Again, during our time in office we have more than doubled the provisions for the long-term sick and disabled. We are now spending more than £10 billion on benefits for the long-term sick and disabled—an increase in real terms of £5·6 billion since we took office. It is easy to talk in such global terms——

Mr. Allen: And to be inaccurate.

Mr. Scott: I am being both precise and accurate. We are talking about the impact on the living standards of the disabled and about the spread of benefits to more and more disabled people during the period of this Government.

Mr. Allen: Is the Minister aware of the difference between an increase in benefits and an increase in the take-up of benefits?

Mr. Scott: That is precisely the point that I was making when the hon. Gentleman sought to intervene. Surely he welcomes as much as I do the fact that many more disabled people are now receiving the benefits to which they are entitled. Those people did not become disabled under this Government; they were there under the Labour Government. They were not receiving the benefit then, but they are now.

Despite the smirk on the face of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) I hope that he will recognise that that is a real point. The last time he was at the Dispatch Box he criticised me in a rather snide way for "marketing" benefits. Of course we want to do that. We want to make people aware of the benefits to which they are entitled and ensure that they take them up. We will go on marketing both our existing benefits and the new ones that will come into operation in April next year in order to ensure that they go to the people who need them.

Mr. Allen: I, too, would criticise my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). I do not believe that the Minister is marketing some benefits as well as he could. Were he to do so, the Financial Secretary and the Chief Secretary would come down on him like a ton of bricks because of the financial implications. Perhaps he will market family credit a little more effectively.

Mr. Scott: With the greatest possible respect to the hon. Gentleman, who is comparatively new to the subject—I am not being patronising—he knows that this area is demand-led. If people apply, they receive the benefit. It is nothing to do with the Chief Secretary. People get the benefits for which they apply and for which they are entitled. We have seen a dramatic increase in the take-up of benefits and we shall go on seeking to ensure that that continues.

Mr. McCartney: Will the Minister explain why one benefit has been taken away from disabled people—the reduced earnings allowance? Most disabled people become disabled as a result of accidents at work. In areas such as mine, where there is mining and heavy engineering, a considerable number of people who were once entitled to that benefit can no longer claim it. Yet they originally received it in recognition of the fact that they had become disabled because of their activities in industry, either as a result of an accident or because of the environment in which they worked. The Government have abolished that allowance.

Mr. Scott: I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman makes. Last year, I took through the House the Bill that made that change in the benefit system. It is increasingly right that at this time we should concentrate state help on those people who are disabled early in life, perhaps congenitally or as a result of some accident early in life, and who do not have the opportunity to build up entitlements to occupational pensions, compensation from their employers or in other ways. Philosophically that is right. It would be difficult, even for the hon. Member for Oldham, West, who is muttering on the Front Bench, to disagree with that as a principle.

Mr. McCartney rose——

Mr. Scott: I do not want to get bogged down. I am trying to answer the debate.

Mr. McCartney: To take that to its logical conclusion, what does the Minister say about the young 21-year-old who has an arm amputated and can no longer claim reduced earnings allowance? There are many such specific cases. Thousands occur in industry each year. There is no reason for withdrawing that important benefit from the industrially disabled, other than to reduce public expenditure.

Mr. Scott: What we have done, in essence, is to alter the priorities within the provision for disabled people while increasing it substantially. I do not want to weary the House with the figures. The philosophical approach that I have sought to outline would need widespread approval.

We are concerned too about the needs of low income families and families generally. We are anxious to look at the whole pattern of provision in that area and if hon. Members would like to contact my right hon. Friend or myself and come forward with ideas for improving the pattern of family support as it presently exists, we would be only too happy to listen to them.

The social fund has proved to be an effective, fair and flexible way of meeting needs that are outwith the normal scope of the social security system. I do not disguise from the House my feeling that that is a difficult area. The single payment system did not work particularly well. It was capricious in the extreme. It was doubling in cost every two years, I think, and it was becoming unsustainable. The social fund has proved a sensible way of providing grants and loans to people with exceptional needs at exceptional times while keeping the pattern of expenditure under sensible control. It is straightforward and it is becoming understood by claimants, and I believe that it works in an effective manner.

Mr. Allen: The Minister will be aware of the recent survey conducted by the National Audit Office which showed that one quarter of income support claimants did not know what the social fund was. Once again, wearing his marketing hat, perhaps he could do something about that.

Mr. Scott: If the hon. Gentleman looked back to the pattern of single payments and the geographical and social spread of take-up under that, he would see that there was even less understanding of the single payment scheme than there is now of the social fund. There is an increasing awareness of the social fund and its capacity to help.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Has the Minister's attention been drawn to The Independent today where it says that there were 2,347 deaths during the latest spell of sub-zero temperatures.—[Interruption.] Am I entitled to ask a question, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or are the hooligans on the Tory Benches determined that the issue will not be raised? The social fund has been extremely unhelpful when it comes to hypothermia. What does he intend to do about that?

Mr. Scott: I think that the press report to which the hon. Gentleman was referring was mentioned earlier. The Government have responded flexibly and in a common-sense manner to the last period of excessive hard weather in Britain.

Mr. Battle: Are we to get a statement every time it snows?

Mr. Scott: If necessary. If we have a period of general and excessively cold weather, it is sensible for the Government to respond to that in a flexible and common sense manner. We have done it twice already. I admire and respect the hon. Gentleman considerably, but if we had stuck rigidly to the rules, he would have been criticising me. The fact that we responded in a flexible and sensible manner should be a matter of congratulation rather than criticism.

The hon. Gentleman made some complimentary remarks about the independent living fund. In Committee, he has been trying to persuade me to turn that into a completely regulated system removing all the flexibility, all the attention to the individual needs of the claimants judged by social workers in order to produce a package of care. That would not and could not work.

Even the Labour party knows that it is not possible to direct more help to the most vulnerable groups in society while promising vast increases in the generality of provision within the social security system. There are many needs in our society, but it is much better to be able to meet them by identifying particular groups and concentrating help on them.

Social spending today is 40 per cent. higher in real terms than in 1979. Most of that growth is the result of the general increases that have protected people against the impact of price increases. Many of them have come about also because of our ability to concentrate help on those most in need. The Government have shown themselves to be caring, and concerned with the needs of the most vulnerable in our society and have produced substantial extra resources to look after them—no lollipops, but real extra money for those who need help most.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Allen McKay and
Mr. Jack Thompson.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Statutory Sick Pay (Small Employers' Relief) Regulations 1991, which were laid before this House on 20th February, be approved.—[Mr. Newton.]

Killingholme Generating Stations (Ancillary Powers) Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Have you received a request from the Government Front Bench for a statement to be made about the current position in the Gulf? You may be aware that developments in the past few hours suggest—I use the word advisedly—that the ingredients for a ceasefire may now be available. This is clearly a matter of the greatest interest to the House, and the whole House would expect the Government to make a statement at the earliest opportunity about a development of such significance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I am not aware of any requests for a statement, but I am sure that what the hon. and learned Gentleman has said will have been heard by those on the Front Bench.

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I want to know whether the Bill is valid. I do not wish to question the Chair, but you will recall the same question being asked in relation to the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill. Despite its lengthy consideration in Committee and the fact that no amendment was allowed to be made to it, when that Bill went to the other place it was found to be defective, and to contain an erroneous date. Can we have an assurance that this Bill is valid, has been vetted and is perfectly in order and that, if that is not the case, it will be slung out?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Bill is in order. I hope that we can now get on with the Second Reading debate.

Mr. Jimmy Hood (Clydesdale): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I heard what you said, but may I refer you to what the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman) said when he introduced the Bill on 14 January? He said:

"Those works will serve generating stations being built under powers already granted by the Secretary of State for Energy."—[Official Report, 14 January 1991; Vol. 183, c. 667.]

It is widely reported that the Government are on a three-line Whip to support the Bill. How can it be described as a private Member's Bill when it is intended to give two power stations enabling powers that, according to the hon. Member for Stroud, have already been granted by the Secretary of State? Surely this is a Government Bill and, if there is a three-line Whip on it tonight, as there was on another Bill last week, it cannot qualify under the private procedure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman means, of course, a private Bill, not a private Member's Bill. His point would be entirely in order if made during the Second Reading debate.

7.18 pm

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Despite what has just been said, the detail of the Bill was substantially discussed at the time of the revival motion on 14 January. If the hon. Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood) had quoted me a little more extensively, he would have come up with the answer to his question.

The Bill is extremely mundane, dull and technical, so it is entirely appropriate that the dullest grey Member, in the dullest grey suit should put across the message. Indeed, he is ideal. In the debate on the revival motion I said that National Power plc and PowerGen plc are already building the power stations that are the subject of tonight's debate. No matter what fuel is used, water will be required for cooling purposes.

Mr. Hood: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Has the building of the power stations gone ahead without approval for the measures in this Bill? Is that not a contempt of this House? If one of our constituents was to build an extension to his house without the proper approvals, I am sure civil servants would tell him to take it down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman can make his points in the debate. Perhaps this is a good opportunity for me to remind the House that the Bill does not deal with the building of generating stations. It deals with auxiliary works and, as a consequence, it is comparatively narrow.

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You have given a ruling which to some extent may circumscribe our debate. In the context of the proposition that the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman) is about to advance, we shall consider the generation of power by gas. That has implications for this country and for the European Community. I hope that I have not misinterpreted you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and that you will not circumscribe the debate. After all, we are discussing the implementation of our power generation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Bill does not deal with power stations. It deals with auxiliary works. I do not want to restrict unduly the scope of the debate on a private Bill. Let us see how we get on.

Mr. Knapman: My hon. Friends and I had high hopes that Opposition Members would have read the Bill since we debated the revival motion.

Mr. Redmond: Before the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman) was interrupted by those points of order, did he say that this simple and mundane Bill related to constructing lagoons? Does it deal with extracting water into lagoons?

Mr. Knapman: I am sorry, but I did not hear the hon. Gentleman's last sentence.

Mr. Redmond: I assume that the hon. Gentleman will read from a prepared speech. Perhaps he could go back a few sentences because I was distracted earlier and missed his opening comments. I think that he mentioned the word "lagoons".

Mr. Knapman: I may well have been ad libbing. That might surprise hon. Members. I described the Bill as mundane and technical. Opposition Members may disagree because they think that it deals with the building of power stations. It does not.

The Bill is required for the construction of the necessary cooling water works and, in that case, only to overcome certain prohibitions in the Humberside Conservancy Act 1905, which no doubt Opposition Members have read with care. The Bill does not seek to circumvent any planning permission procedures. The power station developments already have consent and deemed planning permission after full local consultation.

We look forward to hearing from the Under-Secretary of State for Energy, my hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory).

Mr. James Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): We look forward to his words of wisdom.

Mr. Knapman: Indeed, and we appreciated his wisdom during the debate on the revival motion.

The objections to the Bill are rather sad.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): Would my hon. Friend care to rephrase that? There are no objections to the Bill because there were no petitions against it. There are no objections from my constituents in the area where the power station is to be built and there is no objection from the Labour-controlled Humberside county council.

Mr. Knapman: My hon. Friend has made a very good point and the way in which he has looked after the interests of his constituents contrasts starkly——

Mr. Redmond: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There was one petition against the Bill, but it was withdrawn. Is the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) suggesting that hon. Members cannot raise objections to private Bills?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order. I suspect that the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond) will catch my eye later and it would be in order to make that point then.

Mr. Knapman: We fully understand, particularly at this time of political consensus, why Opposition Members have to say what they say, but we believe that it is a little sad that hon. Members have to act as delegates rather than representatives. We understand the reasons for the objections, but the Bill has nothing to do with coal. It deals simply with inlet and outlet pipes on the River Humber.

Mr. Hood: There was one objection. Who objected and why was the objection withdrawn?

Mr. Knapman: I understand that the Coalfield Communities Campaign objected on the general principle of how the proposal would affect coalfield communities, but it withdrew the objection. It realised, even if the hon. Gentleman does not, that the Bill has nothing to do with coal.

By using the blocking motion as a field on which to fight this mother of all legislative battles, the Opposition are on thin ground. Whenever an issue involves competition, privatisation or capitalism, the Opposition erect a mental Maginot line. The right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) recently said that the Labour party must learn to run capitalism better than the Conservatives. That news does not seem to have percolated through to the Opposition Members who are present tonight.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): What my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) advocated will not be too difficult in view of the state of the economy under this Government.

Mr. Knapman: The Leader of the Opposition will not have an opportunity to put his ideas into practice. If, however, the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) wants to make a start in that direction, he should support the Bill.

The hon. Members for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) and for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes) objected to the Bill in the House. That did not do them credit, because they have caused much delay and a great deal of expense. What is the point of that?

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): The hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman) is, like me, an official of the all-party conservation committee. The main reason for my view of the matter is that it is scandalously unwise to use our relatively limited reserves of gas for steam raising when, in only a few years or generations, we will bitterly regret that waste of a prime resource.

Mr. Knapman: I understand that the power stations use roughly 0·1 per cent. of our proven gas reserves annually.

I wonder why the hon. Member for Wentworth does not take account of the views of the Labour-controlled county council. There have been wide consultations on the Bill. Most recently, the Central Electricity Generating Board, acting on behalf of National Power and PowerGen, sent details of the Bill to 32 interested parties. One was Glanford borough council, which I should have thought might have known what was needed in the area. It replied to the Central Electricity Generating Board on 11 December 1988, saying:

"Further to my letter dated 16 November 1989 I am now able to inform you that on 7 December the Borough Council's Planning Committee resolved that Glanford wishes to raise no objections to the proposals contained in the Bill."

Then there is the Humberside county council, which my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) has already mentioned. It is Labour-controlled and it has no objection to the Bill. It does not seem to share the Opposition's views. At the time of the revival motion, the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond) said that people would not be aware of what is going on—unaware, presumably, that he was criticising the county council and the borough council, which, in any case, are Labour-controlled. I am sure that he would not wish to criticise his colleagues in such numbers.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Knapman: Many hon. Members wish to speak. However, I shall give way once more.

Mr. Barnes: There is also the House of Commons. My hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond) did a service in tabling a blocking motion because it enables the Bill to be discussed fully and properly. It provides an opportunity to present in great detail what the hon. Gentleman regards as the fantastic benefits of the Bill. I wait for that to be done so that my colleagues and I can begin to take on board the arguments for the Bill. We do not have to accept Bills on the nod. As has been said, specific arguments must be examined by the whole House. This Bill was never in front of any council.

Mr. Knapman: I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's keen interest in this matter. He was probably not present at the time of the revival motion.

Mr. Barnes: I was here then. I did not speak, but the same point was made against my tabling a blocking motion. I remember that.

Mr. Knapman: We would have greatly looked forward to the hon. Gentleman staying in the Chamber for longer during the debate on the revival motion. In view of all the interest that has been expressed, I wonder why local constituencies that are represented by the Labour party are not taking a more active interest in the matter. Where, for instance, is the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley)? Is he representing the views of his constituents? What are his views? Do some people believe that the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe agrees with the Humberside county council, which is controlled by Labour, or does he agree with his hon. Friends that the Bill should be defeated? We do not know because he is not here.

Mr. Hood: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am asking you for some help. The hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman) is referring to Opposition Members having no interest in the matter and wanting to interfere in what he thinks is a local county council matter. Am I correct in asking him to provide the House with information about why he sponsors the Bill? Is he being paid for sponsoring it?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It would not be right for me to ask the hon. Gentleman for information but, if he would like to provide it, it would be in order for him to do so.

Mr. Knapman: I have an apology to make. I should have disclosed an interest. The hon. Gentleman asked me about this matter during the debate on the revival motion. I purchased 150 shares in the London electricity distribution company. I might be due for a profit, if I sell them tomorrow, of about £100, but the expenses might outweigh the profit. I am trying not to let that prospect colour my judgment too strongly. What I said about the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe also applies to the hon. Member for Great Grimbsy (Mr. Mitchell), whose constituency can be only two or three miles away from that of the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe.

Mr. Michael Brown: I have nothing but the most superb relations with the—Labour—hon. Members for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) and for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), both of whom are excellent constituency Members of Parliament. The fact that they are not here and have not signed the blocking motion demonstrates exactly what my hon. Friend has said. Indeed, it is interesting that the only Humberside Members of Parliament present are my hon. Friend the Member for Boothferry (Mr. Davis) and me.

Mr. Knapman: I assure my hon. Friend that I am not trying to do anything to upset the good relations between him and his Labour neighbours. However, the hon. Members for Glanford and Scunthorpe and for Great Grimsby have a constituency interest, because many of their constituents work in the power stations that are now being constructed or will have jobs when they are constructed. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby is not here. He is not usually short of words, but we realise that he may have other commitments.

The borough and county councils, negotiated with the parish councils, about 29 other bodies were consulted, and not one has any objection. It is true that, as a result of consultations, a number of amendments were made, but they were in the form of protective clauses for third parties.

The site was chosen for various reasons, including the fact that it had previously been shown to be suitable for power station development. That has been true since the Killingholme Generating Station (Ancillary Powers) Act 1972, not least because the site lies within an area designated in the Humberside structure plan as an estuary-related industrial area, but there are other obvious reasons why it should be a suitable site. It is an existing area of industrial development. The stations can be built without significant environmental effect. The area is obviously well located in relation to North sea gas. It is suitably located for connection to the national grid system. Above all—this is the crux of the matter—it is close to a source of cooling water. It is obvious that the resources of the River Humber estuary make it the most suitable, convenient and economic source of cooling water for the two power stations.

Hon. Members will know that the 1972 Act specified only one intake and only one outfall, but the number of conduits in each intake and each outfall were unspecified. If only one pipe had been constructed, the diameter of each would have been about 3 m or 4 m. Under this Bill, the pipes would have to be between only 0·6 m to 1 m in diameter.

In the 1972 Act, there was a direct cooled system. The heat was rejected directly to a body of water. In an indirect system, such as the one proposed in the Bill, heat is rejected to the atmosphere by evaporative cooling in the cooling towers, and that is required only to replace that which is lost by evaporation and to prevent the concentration of dissolved salts. It is obvious that a great deal less water is required. Under the Bill, the longest specified pipe is only 390 m, and the longest outfall is 290 m long. Those figures are little more than half the length of the pipes that were envisaged in the earlier Act. As a result, none of the proposed cooling water pipes will extend beyond the jetty line or into the main navigable channels.

In response to repeated requests from Opposition Members, I shall now give more detail about the number of works requested under the Killingholme Bill. The Bill provides for six sets of intakes and outfalls, although only two sets are presently required. Subsequent design alterations mean that PowerGen and National Power do not need all the sets at present, although the site is large enough to accommodate further developments. To develop the full potential of the site, both companies may require extra cooling water pipes. The Bill will enable that to be realised without wasting more valuable parliamentary time.

From the environmental point of view, which weighs heavily with my hon. Friends, the pipes will be buried in the bed of the River Humber so that the crown of the pipe is at least 2 m below the existing river bed level. Although the final construction details are to be confirmed by the companies' turnkey contractors, one possible method is to dredge a trench in the Humber, join the whole length of pipe on the land, and float it out into the river. An alternative method of installation would be to join several lengths of pipes on land and attach them to a frame. The Bill, the substance of which has already been before the House, merely seeks renewed approval for pipes to be laid in the Humber estuary.

I hope that the House will feel able to grant the Bill its Second Reading so that National Power and PowerGen can continue with their construction programme without any further unnecessary and costly delay.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): I am privileged to have the opportunity of saying a few words in this debate. Although I recognise that it is a narrow debate and I shall try to respect that fact, I am sure that you will appreciate, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that when such a Bill will have a major effect on another industry and on thousands of jobs, debate on it should allow hon. Members to express their fears about the distress that it may cause to that other industry and to the many thousands of people who work in it.

Clause 29 refers to protection for the British Coal Corporation. That seems ironic, given the fact that the past few years—and even more recently—have seen the devastation of British Coal. It is worth noting that National Power and Associated British Ports, which are mentioned at length in the Bill, have recently become happy bedfellows.

It is right that the Bill should receive the strictest scrutiny, because the recent history of Associated British Ports leads one to demand such scrutiny. When the Associated British Ports Bill was going through the House, sponsored by the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown), who is now busy chatting to the Whip, both the Committee and the House were deliberately deceived. Indeed, without that deceit, the Bill would never have got through the House.

At the time, two Bills—those relating to the Immingham and the Killingholme ports—were being considered by opposed Private Bill Committees. The Committee requested that the Killingholme Bill should be amended to prevent the company from being sold in less than 10 years. Because that was not acceptable to the company, the Bill did not see the light of day again. However, during the debate on the Immingham Bill, no such assurance was given, and the Bill passed through the House. The Committee issued a special report, which hon. Members will no doubt remember, highlighting the fact that the Bill was acceptable to the Committee only if the Government took action to protect British Coal and the jobs there. The Government have never taken any such action.

Under this Bill, the two power stations will be run on gas. That is a further nail in the coffin of this country's coal industry. As a result of the Immingham Bill, Associated British Ports will now be the happy bedfellow of National Power and PowerGen, because they are to take over 80 per cent. of the company that has been set up to equip and run operations at the port. That fact was never mentioned during the Committee's deliberations.

Incidentally, it was never mentioned in the many debates on these matters in the House by the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes—[HON. MEMBERS: "Did he know?"] Of course he knew. I am not suggesting for one moment that, at any stage during the Committee's deliberations, National Power and PowerGen had any association with Associated British Ports. However, I am accusing Associated British Ports, the sponsor of the legislation and the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes, of a complete con and a deceit. I repeat that the House was deceived. Without such deceit, the Bill would never have seen the light of day.

During those deliberations, assurances were given by no less a person than Sir Frank Layfield that the major improvements to the port at Immingham

"were not designed specifically in any sense of the word for coal purposes. They depend mainly upon general industrial and other consumers' current needs and the need to eliminate present existing wasteful difficulties and practices. If passed it will have that effect in our submission."

However, that is not the case now——

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): It never was.

Mr. Lofthouse: As my hon. Friend says, it never was. The port has been erected and extended purely and simply to allow foreign coal to be imported. That has been done on behalf of National Power, which, according to Mr. John Baker, is to import 50 per cent. of its coal after 1993. The Bill, however, will allow the building of two gas generating plants—[Interruption.] This is a serious matter, despite the smirks on the faces of some Conservative Members.

I am pleased that the Chairman of the Select Committee on Energy, the hon. Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark) is now in his place. In the past week, the Select Committee has taken evidence from expert witnesses, one of whom told us that National Power is negotiating not only to import foreign coal—we heard that evidence from Shell, with which National Power is already negotiating—but, if the witness is correct, to purchase foreign coal mines.

What a ridiculous situation when there have been another four, five or six pit closures in recent weeks, including one at Allerton Bywater. About 500 of the 800 men who work there live in my constituency. I am surprised that the hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) is not in his place, because Allerton Bywater is in his constituency, and I should have thought that he would be here to defend it.

Mr. Hardy: I am sure that my hon. Friend will recall that, during Energy questions on Monday, Conservative Members boasted about the enormous sums of money that had been invested in the coal industry during the lifetime of this Government. Have they no thought for the public money that they have invested when they encourage actions that render the investment useless?

Mr. Lofthouse: I share my hon. Friend's views.

The Bill must be scrutinised as thoroughly as possible. I do not trust anything that Associated British Ports has got its fingers in. As I have already said, National Power, PowerGen and Associated British Ports look as if they have a cosy little arrangement. It is not beyond the realms of possibility that National Power and PowerGen will welcome British Coal being run down to a size—which I have forecast in the past few months—of about 10,000 men and 10 to 12 pits by the mid-1990s. They will gladly get their greedy hands on those pits, if, God forbid, the Government get back into power and the coal mining industry is privatised.

Any Conservative Member who supports the Bill supports a measure which encourages the burning of gas at the expense of British coal and sterilises millions and millions of tonnes of coal in Britain—millions of tonnes of natural energy within our own shores. Yet they know full well that, in less than a decade, we shall not be able to meet the demands of power generators in Britain. They will allow us to become completely dependent on our foreign competitors to supply our main source of energy once the gas is no longer there and the oil is not always there any more. Yet hon. Members know that, once a mine is closed and the coal is sterilised, one can never return and mine the coal.

It is nothing short of criminal. The Bill will help to make us dependent for our energy supplies. In my view, National Power and PowerGen are making it clear that they have no great concern for the interests of Britain. All they are interested in is the commercial side of their operation, short-term fluctuations and a short-term buck at the expense of long-term supplies. The Bill goes some way towards helping them to do that.

It is fairly obvious that our pleadings and warnings over many years about the national supply of energy have fallen on deaf ears. How long can it go on before Conservative Members realise what is happening? There cannot be any other reason for running down the British coal industry than Tory dogma. There is no logic in the arguments. One cannot make an economic argument in the medium term, although it can be done for the short term. The only reason is that, throughout recent years and especially since 1984, the Government have been so blinded by political dogma that they cannot see anything beyond their blinkered desire to close down British mines.

Britain will eventually pay the penalty for the Government's stupid policies. I assume that the Bill will be accepted tonight. I hope that the Opposed Private Bill Committee will make sure, in view of the cosy arrangements between National Power and PowerGen and Associated British Ports, that guarantees are written into the Bill for British Coal, which is referred to in the Bill. I hope that the deceit which occurred after the Associated British Ports Bill passed through the House will not be repeated. So far, no one has denied or disproved that that deceit took place.

I do not want to embarrass the hon. Member for Rochford, the Chairman of the Energy Select Committee, or the Chairman of the Opposed Private Bill Committee on the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill. But the hon. Member for Rochford must think privately that he was in some way conned when he chaired that important Committee, in which he had to give the casting vote time and time again. Knowing the hon. Gentleman as I do, I believe that, when he considers the evidence given to him, he must think about the decisions that he made on the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill and that he was conned. I wonder what he would do now if he were chairing the Committee and had in his possession the information that we have now.

My view—I do not expect the hon. Member for Rochford to comment on it—is that the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill would not have passed through the House or even seen the light of day. I hope that the Bill before the House today will be scrutinised to the highest degree before the Committee and the House allows it to proceed.

7.55 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): The hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) has sincere, deeply held views in support of the coal industry. He has done so for many years. He knows that I have always been most supportive of the coal industry in the Energy Select Committee, on which we both serve. I spent many of my early years in industry in an associated company within the coal-fired power station industry.

There is no doubt that since the miners' strike the coal industry has responded tremendously well, increasing its productivity by about 87 per cent. The future of that industry lies to a great extent within its own hands. The men on the coal face are responding well. They will always have a strong place in our nation and will always have my continued support. Having said that, we must think about continuity and security of supply. We must think about options.

Opposition Members who feel like voting against this Bill may not by so doing put first the interests of the north-east, and certainly those of the whole country, remembering the national grid. Indeed, they may not put first the interests of their own families and of industrial companies in their constituencies. Whatever else happens, we have a responsibility in Britain to keep the lights burning and the factories running. The only way in which we can be certain of doing that is by having a good mix of forms of power stations, so that we can always draw our power generation from sources which are not under threat.

Mr. Allen McKay: It appears that the difference between the hon. Gentleman's views and our views is narrow. He talks about a mix. The Opposition have always talked about a mix of energy supplies. But we have talked about a national mix—not a market mix, which is entirely different. There should be a national energy policy which takes into account the whole system of energy supplies in Britain and eliminates current waste.

Mr. Dickens: That is a different matter altogether. I am not a Minister, so I cannot deliver a national energy policy, but there is some merit in what the hon. Gentleman says.

We must remember that we generate power by natural gas and by coal, and perhaps later by coal gasification. We must consider oil and nuclear energy. Unfortunately, wind, wave and solar energy are not sufficiently advanced to make any great impact on our supply of power.

The Bill concentrates on putting water pipes for cooling purposes into the river Humber. The battle about whether there should be a power station is long past. Permission has been given. If Opposition Members seek to frustrate the Bill, they will simply deny the power stations the cooling water they need, and they will do so merely in an attempt to fight their corner for the coal industry. It is a bogus argument in that sense, because the battle has been won for two gas cycle turbine generators to be built, one for PowerGen and one for National Power. All that we are discussing is whether we should allow water pipes to pass into the River Humber to take a small amount of water for cooling purposes.

Mr. Jack Thompson (Wansbeck): Is the hon. Gentleman aware of any studies on taking water out of the Humber, putting it through the generating plants as cooling water and returning it to the Humber? There are two power stations in my constituency, both coastal, one at the northern end and one at the southern. It is said that significant ecological changes are taking place in the North sea because of the discharge of water from those power stations. Because of the movement of water in an estuary, I imagine that the effect would be more significant in this instance than in the North sea.

Mr. Dickens: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising that important point, and I will deal with it later.

As to the type of water extraction and discharges in the power stations to which I have referred, the extractions and discharges required for cooling would be on a significantly smaller scale than those already taking place at coastal and estuary major power station sites, such as those to which the hon. Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Thompson) has referred.

Cooling is required at power stations to condense steam which has been exhausted from steam turbines at low pressures. The cooling may be direct or indirect. For direct cooling, water is extracted from the source of cooling water, passed through condensers and returned to the source of the water. For indirect cooling, the water passing through the condensers is cooled by air, using cooling towers, and the same water is recirculated. Only the water which has evaporated in the cooling towers and the small quantity of purge water need to be replaced. Purge water is water taken from a recirculating cooling system and returned to the river in order to control the concentration of materials in the water. Normally, direct cooling would be used, but at Killingholme the distance from the water makes the capital cost of indirect cooling systems less than that of direct systems.

Combined cycle gas turbine power stations generate only one third of their electricity from the use of steam in steam turbines. The other two thirds is produced by generators driven directly from the gas turbines. In comparison, 100 per cent. of the electricity generation is from steam turbines in coal, oil or nuclear power stations.

The Killingholme development will use indirect cooling systems. The combination of indirect cooling and combined cycle gas turbine technology means that the requirements for cooling water are significantly reduced. In fact, it requires only 5 per cent. of that for direct cooling at existing power stations, like Fawley, Kingsnorth or Sizewell, per unit of electricity generated. That is important.

On the environmental aspects, the aspects of effluent discharges from power station cooling systems that require consideration are chlorine and temperature. There is no legislation relating to these two effluents since they are regulated by the National Rivers Authority in considering the term of the discharge licence.

Some form of biocide is usually necessary in cooling water circuits to deter the settlement and growth of organisms, such as barnacles and mussels, and to control algae, slimes and bacteria. At present, chlorine is used in one form or another.

Mr. Jimmy Hood (Clydesdale): The hon. Gentleman is getting very technical. I would appreciate it if he could help the poor lay Opposition Members. Will he explain the process involved with biocides, what they do and how they work?

Mr. Dickens: I will indeed—I shall be coming to that soon.

Since chlorine has been used for many years, its use is very well understood, except on the Labour Benches. It has the best balance of advantages compared with disadvantages.

The main disadvantage of any biocide, including chlorine, is that it must be applied to the entire water volume. Biocide dosing is carefully controlled and minimised for both environmental and cost reasons. Power stations therefore operate with chlorine at the limits of detection in the water discharge. The chlorine reacts chemically with organic materials throughout the cooling system and its concentration reduces as it reacts. As stated previously, the dose level is regulated so that it has virtually completely reacted and is only just detectable at discharge. In addition, the purge water discharge will be very rapidly and significantly diluted by river water at the point of discharge. The combination of low concentration, further continuing reaction and major dilution virtually eliminates traces of free chlorine at a very short distance from the discharge point. I was pleased to have the opportunity to explain that.

Mr. Hood: I thank the hon. Gentleman very much for the explanation. I now understand a biocide and its use as clearly as mud.

Mr. Dickens: My hon. Friends understand it. That is why we are prepared to stay late to deal with the Bill when we could have rushed back to our constituencies.

Mr. Jack Thompson rose——

Mr. Dickens: I want to make more progress before giving way to the hon. Gentleman.

The temperature of the water discharged will vary with ambient temperatures. The maximum temperature differential between the water discharge and the estuary will be 7 to 12 deg. C. That will be of interest to the hon. Member for Wansbeck, so I hope that he is listening carefully. The quantities of water discharged from the power stations will be very small compared with the flow of water in the estuary, and dilution effects very rapidly bring water temperatures down to background river levels. It has been found that the effects of heat gain from the sun can far exceed warming effects from cooling water discharges. That is exceptionally important.

Mr. Michael Brown: There is only one problem about that—in the Humber estuary, we are lucky if the sun ever shines.

Mr. Dickens: If we succeed with the Bill, I think that the sun will shine brightly.

At Fawley, where direct cooling is used with a traditional oil-fired power station in a particularly sensitive marine environment, there is no evidence that the discharge of chlorinated warm water has had any adverse effect on the European Community-designated shellfish waters surrounding the discharge outfall.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): The hon. Gentleman is making a number of interesting points. I should like him to go back to the application of biocides. Can he tell us more about the biocides in chlorine, how temperature-sensitive they will be, what effect dosages of biocide would have on wildlife in the Humber estuary, and what measures will be taken to prevent any such discharges?

Mr. Dickens: I am pleased that that point has been raised. That very point has been of great concern to some of the interested parties. Most of them examined closely the point about leakage which my hon. Friend has raised. I mean the hon. Gentleman, of course—I nearly called him my hon. Friend because we went to Japan together.

The interested parties consulted included Glanford borough council, Humberside county council, North Killingholme parish council, Anglian Water plc, the Electricity Council, Lindsey oil refinery, Shell UK, British Telecom—I do not know why that is in the list—the Department of the Environment, the Duchy of Lancaster, the local Members of Parliament and the European Parliament, the National Rivers Authority, the North Eastern Sea Fisheries, the port manager of Associated British Ports at Grimsby and the harbour master of Associated British Ports at Hull, British Rail's eastern region, Trinity House, the Crown Estate commissioners, Immingham town council, British Coal Corporation, Simon Storage Company Ltd., Conoco Ltd. and so on. I shall not detain the House by listing the others.

That list of interested parties demonstrates the care and sensitivity of the promoters of the Bill, National Power and PowerGen—the successors to the Central Electricity Generating Board—who have ensured that everyone is in harmony and understands what is intended. We have no complaints.

Mr. Terry Patchett (Barnsley, East): I am awfully impressed by the hon. Gentleman's knowledge of the Bill. In what part of the Humber would he discharge the water?

Mr. Dickens: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman understands the pipework involved. If not, I will give him a talk on it.

Mr. Patchett: Right now?

Mr. Dickens: Yes, if the hon. Gentleman wants me to detain the House.

At the moment, entry into the Humber is being sought quite close inshore, just underneath the seabed. It is likely that each power station—hon. Members will be aware that we are talking about two power stations on adjacent sites—will use two pipes. That is what is required. The Bill, however, gives permission for 12 if others are required to deal with breakdowns.

The construction programme for the power stations is worthy of note as it reveals the rate of progress and when those power stations are expected to be operational. The power plant contract for the National Power station was placed on 6 July 1990. The preliminary work started on 2 January 1991 and the main site work is due to start on 1 August 1991. It is hoped that full commercial operation will commence on 31 July 1993, which will mean that much more electricity is produced for the lucky people of the north-east.

The preliminary works contract and power station turnkey contract for the PowerGen station was placed on 1 February 1990. The preliminary works were completed on 13 June 1990 and the main site work started in September. It is hoped that the first module will be fully commissioned and its acceptance tests completed on 1 October 1992. The second module should be fully commissioned and its acceptance tests completed by 1 February 1993.

Mr. Jack Thompson: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is something suspect about organisations which make an application and receive permission to build two power stations then having to come to the House for permission to put the pipes in? If the House turns down the application for those pipes, what will happen to the power stations?

Mr. Dickens: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman raised that point, because we are trying to replace an archaic permission that was given some time ago—a permission given in the event of an oil-fired power station on the same site. Tonight we are simply trying to ensure that those power stations have access to cooling water. It is a purely technical matter and no harm will be done to the Humber, the sea or local residents.

This Bill has been introduced because the promoters could not bring themselves to believe in a million years that some hon. Members would be so bigoted and entrenched for other reasons as to oppose the installation of the pipes. The promoters thought that their request was simple and straightforward. Hon. Members should please note that all we want is to give the people of the north-east and the rest of the country electricity. All we want is permission to put pipes into the Humber for cooling purposes. We shall achieve that today.

8.15 pm

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): I listened with great interest to the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens), and he certainly enlightened me on the technical aspects of the Bill. The sponsor, the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman), failed to reach such technical heights.

The Opposition intend to oppose all private Bills that seek to facilitate the generation of power until we have a national energy policy, which we need for the benefit of the entire country. If we leave the production of power to market forces, consumers will be held to ransom by the high charges that the power companies will want to impose. Now that the CEGB has been broken and privatised, it is all the more important to ensure that prices to the consumer are reasonable.

I do not believe that the two proposed power stations will benefit the country. I am at a loss to understand why the hon. Member for Stroud has sponsored the Bill. I should have thought that it would be easier for that hon. Member whose constituency is adjacent to the site to act as the sponsor, as he has local knowledge. Perhaps the promoters' experience with the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown), however, made them a little reluctant to let him get his hands on another private Bill so soon.

We have been asked why we are seeking to go against local Labour-controlled authorities. I can understand why any local authority approached for planning permission for a power station grants such permission, given the number of jobs that that would create for local people. I can understand their keenness for those power stations. I cannot accept, however, that I have no right to express views contrary to those of my Labour colleagues, Conservative colleagues or anyone else. I have a right to my opinion and to express it, even if it is not accepted by others.

We are concerned about British Coal and the number of jobs left in that company. I have one pit left in my constituency—I believe that it is a long-lifer, if there is such a thing today. There are many jobs connected with the pit: likewise, the proposed power stations will generate ancillary jobs. I am not bothered about differences of opinion: all I believe is that there is a need for a national energy plan.

The Bill does not meet that need, so I cannot understand why companies should go to the great expense of building two power stations and then come to seek to promote a private Bill, which they should have done when they submitted the plans to the local authority and the Secretary of State. I can well understand the urgency of Conservative Members, the companies involved and the Private Bill Office in seeking to rush the Bill through to ensure that there is no hold-up in the erection of the power stations and the pipework that requires the water to ensure that both come on stream at the same time to start producing electricity.

As far as I am aware, there have not yet been any accurate forecasts of future energy demands. The forecasts always seem to go over the top. I remain to be convinced of the need for the additional generation.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): Will my hon. Friend comment on the quality of management of the companies involved in promoting the Bill, bearing in mind the fact that they have commenced work on building power stations without having gained permission for the effluent pipes, so aply described by the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens)? I also wonder about the quality of management of the companies that will import half their coal from foreign sources, when we have a record balance of payments deficit. Are not the Opposition right to question closely the Bill's merits?

Mr. Redmond: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct, and he has made his argument in such a fashion that I cannot enrich it.

There is a question mark over the judgment of the people involved, who seek to erect power stations which they might not be able to use because they failed to submit plans to enable them to receive the necessary water. There is a need for the Opposition to continue to examine the issue in great depth, both here on the Floor of the House and, in detail, in Committee. As a point of order, I wonder whether the Bill is correct. I remember the gerrymandering that went on over the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill, which the House approved only to find that it had a slight technical defect which went unnoticed until it reached the other place.

I listened carefully when the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman) introduced the Bill. He mentioned that it was also designed to construct lagoons. I tabled a question on 25 January 1990 to ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he intended to give planning permission to PowerGen and National Power to construct a lagoon to provide cooling water for the proposed combined cycle gas turbine developments at Killingholme, and if he would make a statement. The reply was:

"If either company wishes to construct such a lagoon they will need to apply for the Secretary of State's consent under section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989. When granting such a consent he may also give a direction that planning permission be deemed to be granted under section 90(2) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990.

No application for consent under section 36 to construct such a lagoon has been received."—[Official Report, 25 January 1991; Vol. 184, c. 325.]

I was a little at a loss, because the hon. Member for Stroud said that we were merely talking about pipes to take water from the Humber, circulate it around the cold water towers and pump it back out. I do not accept that. There are some signs that lagoons will be built.

Unless I misunderstood or misheard the hon. Member for Stroud, he mentioned lagoons, so I asked him to give way. I do not doubt that the Hansard reporters have picked up the word "lagoons" mentioned by the hon. Gentleman. If we are talking about lagoons, that subject should be within the Bill, which should include the words "pipes and/or lagoons". I should be grateful if the hon. Gentleman could clarify that point.

Mr. Knapman: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman. I think that I said that I did not quite catch the final sentence of his intervention. If he mentioned lagoons, I did not realise it until now.

The application is for the intake and outlet pipes only. That is the Bill's whole purpose. As far as I am aware, no one involved with the Bill dreamed that there would be objections to it, because it is designed purely to allow pipes to and from the power stations. However, private Bills sometimes have an unpredictable course, and there are a number of other options, but the one proposed in the Bill is by far the best environmentally, commercially and in every other way. The Bill does not refer to a lagoon as such.

Mr. Redmond: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for enlightening me, but I am sorry—once the Bill receives Royal Assent, the companies will not need to come back with another private Bill if they want to construct lagoons. They can simply go to the Secretary of State. If that is not the case, the hon. Gentleman can correct me, but I believe that the Bill authorises the Secretary of State to accept a further application from the companies without them having to resort to section 36 of the Electricity Act.

Mr. Knapman: The Bill is needed only because of the provisions of the Humber Conservancy Act 1905. If someone wanted to construct a 50-storey engineering block or a lagoon, he would have to go through the planning procedures in the normal way.

Mr. Redmond: I am extremely grateful to the hon. Gentleman, but if the Bill were to mention extraction from the Humber into lagoons or standby lagoons, that would be all right. However, the Bill is a cheat and is not truthful; hence my question to the Minister. I was not satisfied, because I knew that discussions had taken place between the Minister and National Power, and it seemed appropriate to try to get the position clarified.

I wrote to National Power and received a letter dated 12 February 1991, which stated:

"I refer to your letter to John Baker on the lagoon option at Killingholme Power Station. As he and a number of other Executive Directors are out of town at the moment, in connection with the flotation of National Power, he is unable to reply personally.

Ever since the inception of our Killingholme project we have considered various ways of securing the necessary cooling water in the light of the 1905 Humber Conservancy Act. Naturally, we have discussed our ideas with a number of interested parties, including officials of the Department of Energy. We have concluded that the proposals put forward in the Killingholme Bill represent our preferred solution and we remain fully committed to . . . this."

The hon. Member for Stroud says that the issue of lagoons never entered the argument. The Bill clears many of the obstacles and gives the Secretary of State carte blanche to grant all sorts of planning permission. There is no point in anyone trying to kid me. There is connivance between the two power companies and the Department of Energy. If everything is straight and above board, why can they not come forward and state their precise intentions?

It is right for the Opposition to look in great detail at proposed legislation and to lift stones, because we may find something nasty underneath. We have a right to examine the Bill in depth if we feel that that is necessary. The sponsor is being less than honest in not presenting all the facts about short and long-term plans. Because people are economical with the truth, we shall have to wait a long time for evidence to emerge. Of course, by then it will be too late; when the Bill becomes an Act, we will not be able to touch it, as it has received all sorts of approval. This is the only opportunity that we have to look in depth at the Bill.

Is there a plan to build lagoons? If so, why has that not been mentioned? I am sure that the hon. Member for Stroud will apologise for misleading the House when such lagoons are eventually built. The hon. Gentleman lectured us about pipes and pollution. It was far too much for me to take in, and I should be grateful for a repeat of his speech.

Mr. Malcolm Moss (Cambridgeshire, North-East): The hon. Gentleman advances an interesting argument about lagoons. Where in the Bill is there mention of a lagoon? I have looked, and I cannot find one. He says that, although a lagoon is not mentioned in the Bill, one will be built, because the Bill gives permission for something.

Mr. Redmond: I said at the start of my speech that lagoons were not mentioned in the Bill. However, I know that they were discussed and will continue to be discussed for some time. Are the companies being deliberately misleading or deceitful about that matter, which obviously has implications for the environment and for the Humber Conservancy Act 1905? Perhaps, if lagoons had been mentioned in the Bill, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and other conservation bodies would have taken a greater interest, made objections and organised petitions. Lagoons have been mentioned in private. Any hon. Member seeking confirmation of that should ask the hon. Member for Stroud whether lagoons were discussed.

The letter that I read to the House shows that pipes are the preferred option, but it does not state categorically that there will be no lagoons. I am sorry to labour the point.

[Mr. Redmond]

The Bill permits the abstraction of water from the Humber, and it will allow the Secretary of State to take decisions without having to come to the House. I am willing to allow the hon. Member for Stroud to give a categorical assurance that no lagoons will ever be constructed on that site. Obviously the hon. Gentleman cannot give that assurance. I shall move on.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): That is a good idea.

Mr. Redmond: I did not intend to be at cross purposes with such a charming lady, Madam Deputy Speaker. You are extremely tolerant and understanding. However, because of the leeway extended to Conservative Members, I sought to develop the point and seek clarification. It is clear that I am right and that the Bill's promoter is wrong.

Pipes will take water from the Humber and that water will circulate in the system and then be pumped out. We are told by the experts on pipes, the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth, that that will cause very little pollution in the Humber. I do not know what pollutants the water will pick up on its travels round the cooling system. Will there be some mechanism to extract pollutants before the water is returned to the Humber?

Mr. Dickens: I am certainly not an expert on pipes. I asked for some briefing material before I came to the Chamber. From the briefing material that I have read and my study of the subject, I know that the issue of lagoons does not arise. Containers or catchment areas are not needed. In my speech, which the hon. Gentleman will be able to read and study tomorrow at length, I dealt with the imperfections and materials in the water. They are taken care of because there must be a clean system.

Mr. Redmond: The hon. Gentleman is too modest. His speech showed that he was articulate and had a good knowledge of the subject. What he said about pollution raised the question whether filters would remove pollutants before the water was discharged. It was said that there would be some pollution, but that, because of the controlled way in which the water was released, pollutants would be slowly dispersed in the Humber, and tidal waters would carry them far away.

There is bound to be pollution. A power station somewhere in the north causes pollution about which the Irish complain.

Mr. Dickens: Perhaps I can clarify this point. The water released into the Humber would be no more polluted than the bath water in which we immerse ourselves—warm, chlorinated water. Indeed, bath water is soapy, and that is dangerous.

Mr. Redmond: There would be pollution, and the effect would be long-term. Only after many years have we begun to understand the effects of pollution on the ecosystem. I assume that the water being discharged would be warm. No doubt my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) will comment on the effects on mussels and other wildlife. It is necessary that the extent of the pollution be understood, but no one has asked any questions about its nature. Obviously it is necessary to be wary. If the Bill goes to Committee, the Committee members will want to examine this matter very closely.

Then there is the question of sludge. It is necessary that water discharged into the Humber be free of silt.

Mr. Jack Thompson: I have not heard any answers to the questions that my hon. Friend is asking. We have not heard whether the water would be discharged by gravity or by means of a pumping system. The discharge of water under pressure has significant safety implications. Eddies are created, and the estuary bed is disturbed.

Mr. Redmond: My hon. Friend makes a very important point. The promoters of the Bill have made no reference to this matter. I assume that water would be discharged under pressure. Of course, I cannot be sure about that. [Interruption.] Apparently it would be.

Mr. Michael Brown rose——

Mr. Redmond: The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes wishes to intervene. On a number of occasions when I sought to intervene, he refused to give way. However, as I am a gentleman, I shall give way.

Mr. Michael Brown: Of course, I am only a secondary modern schoolboy and probably did not have as good an education as the hon. Gentleman. I shall have to be trained in these matters.

If the hon. Gentleman is concerned about pollution, let me tell him that this power station would emit virtually no sulphur dioxide and about half the carbon dioxide and one quarter of the nitrogen oxide emitted by the power stations that I drive past when I am going round the Ferrybridge area.

Mr. Redmond: Pollutants of that sort will be produced from South African coal. But I shall not be diverted by the hon. Gentleman.

We could argue about whether there are solutions. The Government ought to put their hands in their pocket and provide the necessary cash to help eliminate the problems. The technology needed for their elimination is there; what is needed is the cash. We can find billions of pounds to wage war overseas, but the war against pollution has to take a back seat. It is right that we should be concerned about pollution.

Clause 13(2)(a) says:

"the Secretary of State may by notice in writing require the appropriate company".

It should be noted that the word is "may"; it ought to be "will". Because of such wording, one has grave reservations about whether the Bill should be given a Second Reading. I hope that, in spite of the three-line Whip, Conservative Members will see the need to reject it.

Clause 12(4) refers to "21 days' notice in writing". Throughout the Bill there are variations—seven days, 21 days, 28 days. There really ought to be some consistency. Perhaps the period provided throughout the Bill should be 28 days. I hope that the promoters will take note of that point.

I am also unhappy about clause 14, which is entitled "Provisions against danger to navigation". There have been difficulties, but I think that the situation is picking up, and I hope that it will go from strength to strength. The more ships that use the Humber, the greater will be the danger to navigation. One must take into consideration any additional obstacles created by this Bill. We know only too well how serious can be the pollution caused by damage to a ship.

Clause 16 says:

"The Secretary of State may at any time,"— again "may", where the word should be "will"—

"if he deems it expedient, order a survey . . . and any expenditure incurred by the Secretary of State in any such survey or examination shall be recoverable from the appropriate company."

My understanding is that the Secretary of State would be able to say to a company, "The survey cost £5,000. I now require that amount from you." That is as it should be. It will enable the Secretary of State to monitor activities, and also to ensure that the companies are sticking to the terms of the Bill.

Clause 16(2) states:

"The rivers authority may at their own expense at any time carry out a survey".

I should have thought that, if the companies were genuinely concerned about pollution, they would be only too pleased to pay the rivers authority any necessary costs to ensure that everything is above board and complies with pollution laws.

I am aware that other hon. Members wish to speak, but I felt that it was important to express my anxiety about the omissions from the Bill. I am also concerned about private Bills that give carte blanche authority to private companies compulsorily to purchase land. I do not believe that any private company should have that right, or the right to extinguish rights of way. People have enjoyed rights of way for many years, yet companies, in their pursuit of profit, want to take them away.

The Bill will go to Committee, where we hope that it will be considered in even greater depth, line by line. I hope that the Committee will check and double-check. Our experience of private Bills is that there is some kidology, some gerrymandering and some deliberate misleading of the House through the omission of the true intentions behind a Bill.

Mr. Hood: My hon. Friend's speech is informative. As he has reached only clause 16, I plead with him not to sit down and miss out the remaining 21 clauses. I would much appreciate it if he would continue with his speech and give us the benefit of his wisdom.

Mr. Redmond: I would do so, but I am gasping for a pint. I also have a dry throat.

Mr. Illsley: Perhaps I could give my hon. Friend the opportunity to catch his breath. Before he ends his excellent speech, will he elaborate on his point about the Bill being misleading? We owe a debt to the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) because he pointed out the companies' intentions about biocides, the injection of chlorine and so on. My efforts with the "Oxford English Dictionary" failed to reveal any such word as "biocide". Although we obviously understand the meaning behind the hon. Gentleman's speech, we cannot find any definition of "biocide" or, indeed, any examples of "biocides" by their chemical names. Should not the promoters of the Bill come to the House with more detail of the chemicals that the companies intend to put through the pipes, the permission for which we are discussing tonight?

Mr. Redmond: I regret that I am not as conversant as the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth with all the technical details, so I am unable to answer my hon. Friend's questions. Perhaps the proceedings should be stopped to enable the sponsors of the Bill to clarify those points. My hon. Friend desperately wants to know the answers. If we can be given that information, it is possible that the Bill could then sweep through unopposed. I suspect that, because of the half-truths in the Bill, we will not know the whole truth for a number of years. If you, Madam Deputy Speaker, would like to stop the debate to allow clarification of those points, I should be only too happy to comply with your ruling.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is an invitation that I must refuse to accept.

Mr. Redmond: I am sure that that is why my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) did not put it to you, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I could make many, many more points that would call into question the true intent of the Bill. The Committee must go through it line by line. It must cross-examine the companies' representatives who, I am sure, are listening to the debate. The Committee must ensure that the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth is presented to the House.

8.56 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory): When this matter was last debated on 14 January, I gave my view about the Bill, and nothing has happened since then to change it. However, for the sake of completeness, I shall summarise my position. In January and April last year, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave his consent and investment approvals for two power stations of the combined cycle gas turbine design. Having given those consents, after due consideration, it would be perverse if my right hon. Friend or I did not support a Bill seeking to provide the necessary ancillary works, which in this case are the cooling water works in the River Humber.

The projects have been exhaustively considered by my right hon. Friend and also by the planning authority, as we have heard. The thinking behind the Bill had been set out by my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman), and we have had a most accomplished technical exposition from my hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens). In the light of all those considerations, I am happy to support the Bill in its present form.

8.57 pm

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): When we last debated the Bill, the Minister spoke from the Dispatch Box for only 10 minutes and failed to answer a number of questions that I and my hon. Friends asked. In view of his even briefer time at the Dispatch Box today, I invite him to intervene during my speech to answer my questions.

The Bill seeks planning permission to complete a multi-million pound project, much of which has already been built. If I had been spending such large amounts of money, I would have done my homework beforehand to ensure that the money was being spent wisely.

When the Bill was debated on Monday 14 January, I said that the Opposition were reluctant to give their approval to the Bill without the House having given due consideration to the implications of increasing the gas generation of electricity.

Contrary to the way in which some Tory Members misrepresented Opposition policy that night, our reluctance is based on Britain's need for a strategy for electricity generation rather than a hotch-potch of new power stations built to suit private generators or the two generating companies that we are told are now in fierce competition with each other.

Once again tonight, the private Bill procedure is being used to make major strategic energy decisions which should properly be made by Ministers of the Department of Energy—a criticism which the Government have again declined to answer tonight.

The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) was the sponsor of the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill. We have never been told why he is not sponsoring this Bill. The Committee which considered the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill expressed its concern about being asked to make what were intrinsically policy decisions which should have been made by the Government. Its comments in its special report could equally be applied to this Bill. The Committee said that it was unanimous that the arguments raised complex matters of energy and trade policy for which the Government must take ultimate responsibility. The Government have still to explain their policy on electricity generation.

However, we have heard about some of the casualties. My hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) spoke briefly but forcefully about the likely casualties of the change in electricity generation that has taken place during the past two years under the Government. The Bill may not be directly related to that issue, but no one who is listening to the debate or who reads it subsequently should be surprised at the attitudes of my hon. Friends to private Bills promoted by these two companies.

Like my hon. Friend, I believe that the Committee which considered the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill —and the House when the Bill was debated on the Floor of the House—were deceived. This Bill may not be directly related to the earlier one, but no one should be surprised at people's attitudes in relation to this Bill.

Mr. Michael Brown: Do the views expressed by the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) represent the views of the hon. Members for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) and for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), who are directly affected by the Bill? It is interesting that they are not here.

Mr. Barron: Hon. Members can take part in debates in the House if they so wish. My hon. Friends the Members for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) and for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) have not contacted me on the issues involved in the Bill but, like most hon. Members, they are against deception, and that is what I believe took place in the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill.

I accept that there is a case to be made for burning gas in certain circumstances, based on efficiency and cleanliness. The environment is important and it should not be ignored. Contrary to what some Tory Members suggest during debates on the coal industry, for example, the Opposition are concerned about the environment, but cleanliness and efficiency are not the only criteria, nor do they override other considerations that we as legislators should take into account.

Applications for the construction of gas generating stations should be based on a range of criteria, such as the efficiency of energy conservation, the use of power generated and the source of the gas.

There can be no question but that we would support the use of gas if it was for combined heat and power development, which would achieve the highest practical efficiency. The short-term advantages of using gas purely for electricity generation are outweighed by the long-term considerations.

Mr. Hood: Some take the view that gas provides a cheap form of electricity generation, and that if we go for gas turbines, everything will be hunky-dory. I remind my hon. Friend of the current situation in rural communities, which rely greatly on bottled gas—the price of which has increased by more than 35 per cent. since the invasion of Kuwait on 2 August. Suppliers of bottled gas have been able to rip off rural communities because of their market monopoly. What guarantee is there that gas turbine generators will not do the same?

Mr. Barron: The worldwide tie-in of gas prices to oil prices ought to bother all right hon. and hon. Members, and the consequences of events in the middle east should concern everyone in the country.

The Secretary of State seems to hand out permission for new gas power stations without giving any thought to their location. If they must be built, it would make more sense for them to be built in parts of the country where there is little or no power generation, rather than in areas that have a large share of power stations—some of which could be displaced.

Over the years, we have frequently argued about the building of power stations in south-east England, which has a major need for electricity. The Government have an involvement because of the need to extend planning permission through the private Bill procedure. Other areas are denied such permission, to right the imbalance in electricity generating capacity.

Mr. Knapman: Has the hon. Gentleman contacted the Labour-controlled Humberside county council to discover why it is in favour of the Bill?

Mr. Barron: I have not, nor has the council contacted me about my Second Reading speech or my actions in that connection. I should be more than happy, however, to receive representatives of that authority—as I did in respect of the legislation involving a new coal terminal that involved the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes.

Gas is a premium fuel, and to burn it to produce electricity is wasteful. The United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association's evidence to the Cullen inquiry estimated in mid-1988 that there were 25 gasfields in production or under development and that another 35 had been discovered but were not yet developed. The report stated:

"gas production which was currently about 4,500 million cubic feet per day, was projected to halve by the end of this century."

A recent report from the stockbrokers Kleinwort Benson entitled "Natural Gas to set Europe alight" reported:

"substantial new gas will need to be contracted by British Gas from 1995 onwards—but even if gas from new fields in the North Sea is contracted by 1998-2000, there will still be a deficiency between supply and demand."

That has major implications for electricity generation and for all the consumers who are supplied from British Gas mains. The unchecked development of gas generating stations will increase our dependence on imported fuel. Last year, we imported gas to the value of more than 40 million tonnes of coal equivalent. That is a massive fuel trade deficit for a country that is so energy-rich.

The Kleinwort Benson report predicted that increases in European demand will be met in the first instance by the European group of 10, which it describes as a secretive and anonymous group of gas producers who are

"top class, admittedly monopolistic bodies who efficiently control production, transmission, and distribution of natural gas."

That is an obvious extension of the free market that the Conservatives have been forcing down our throats for the past 11 years. According to the report, after 1997, the percentage of imported gas from non-European countries will increase markedly. Surely it is the height of irresponsibility to encourage the dash for gas for electricity generation that we have seen in the past two years.

During our previous debate on the Bill, I mentioned press reports that the two new generating companies had gas contracts with the Caister field, which is scheduled to last for only another seven or eight years. I asked where the gas would come from to supply the turbines after that, but I received no answer—as we have received no answer from the Minister tonight. I ask the question again: will the gas come from the Gulf or the Soviet Union? They are hardly stable, secure sources of supply in current circumstances or, perhaps, for a long time to come.

Mr. Dickens: Perhaps I can assist the hon. Gentleman. The Select Committee on Energy conducted an extensive, in-depth study of gas depletion. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman is doing himself justice by arguing that gas supplies will not be sufficient. Let me set his mind at rest. If he gets a copy of our report from the Library, he will find that his argument is bogus.

Mr. Barron: I do not agree. If the hon. Gentleman himself gets a copy of the report from the Library, he will seee that my name is attached to the gas depletion policy contained in it, because I was a member of the Select Committee that drew it up. If he was present and listening to what was said then, he could be in no doubt that, by the turn of the century, Britain, and western Europe as we now know it, will be dependent on gas from eastern Europe as we now know it. That was one of our more simple findings. I need no lessons from the hon. Gentleman. He had better have another look at exactly what the report says.

Our competitors must think that the Government are crazy to squander our resources in this fashion. If honesty ever overcomes the Department of Energy and its Minister, I believe that they will accept that. Britain should not depend on imported fuel—it should not depend on the undependable. The proper use of our own resources would prevent that.

I want to say something to the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens), not about his lengthy discourse about the finer aspects of planning applications, but about his comments on security of supply. I agree with him. I think that security of supply is vital. Every electricity user will have put it at the top of his list. A couple of weeks ago, I visited a country that is experiencing an energy crisis. The electricity went off every four hours. The crisis has devastated the country's economy. It imports fuel, and until it can again establish its own source of supply, its economy will go from bad to worse.

Security of supply, however, does not necessarily mean diversity of supply. No-one has ever asked me whether the light bulb at home is lit by nuclear fuel, oil, coal or gas —perhaps methane from a land waste disposal site. People are much more concerned about security than about diversity, as they have every right to be. We, as legislators, should ensure that times of change do not interfere with our ability to keep the electricity burning.

I warn the House that, before we merrily give permission for new generating stations, we must have the opportunity to debate the Government's strategy for—or should I say their lack of interest in?—the careful management of the country's resources. We will not have to face the difficulties—nor will the Tories, because there will not be a Conservative Government in two years' time —but generations to come may have to pay for the decision to import energy.

9.14 pm

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): This debate is very simple, and the issue is straightforward for my constituency. There is no reason why the House should not give the Bill an unopposed Second Reading.

The power stations are being constructed not as a result of powers required from the House, but as a result of powers that were granted, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman) said, some time ago by the Labour-controlled Humberside county council and Glanford borough council.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud said, it is significant that the hon. Members for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) and for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), who are assiduous in representing constituency interests, are absent from the debate. If they were concerned about the Bill, they would have been present today. Their absence shows clearly that they will be hoping and praying for the Bill to make progress. They will be aware that the construction companies will create much employment in the area and many members of the work force will come from Grimsby, Scunthorpe and from my constituency. The fact that those two hon. Members are not present today shows that they do not share the view of the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) or his hon. Friends. They will be concerned to learn that there is a difference of opinion between the hon. Member for Rother Valley and the Labour-controlled county council which they loyally support.

Mr. Hood: Why did the sponsors not have a local Member of Parliament to promote the Bill? Why did they go all the way to Gloucestershire?

Mr. Brown: The Bill's sponsors, National Power and PowerGen, are national companies. They may have decided that my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud is an excellent advocate—something that he has shown today. I cannot compete with him when it comes to advocacy and persuasion in this House. The sponsors choose wisely.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud will be the toast of the people of south Humberside for what he has done for my constituency today. I give him full marks for the superb way in which he introduced the Bill. He will be championed by my constituents as well as by the constituents of the hon. Members for Great Grimsby and for Glanford and Scunthorpe. I confidently predict that my hon. Friend will receive hundreds of letters from grateful constituents. On behalf of my constituents, I express my gratitude to my hon. Friend for the powerful case that he made today in favour of the Bill.

As I have said before, the Labour party has something against the people of Brigg and Cleethorpes. I do not know why that should be. The Labour party consistently opposes any form of industrial expansion, whether it be docks one year, power stations the next, or construction of pipes the following year. There is something about south Humberside that the Labour party does not like. The Labour party does not want the people of south Humberside to enjoy the benefits of industrial expansion.

Just before the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill reached the statute book, the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) warned me in the House—this is in the official record—that if a Labour Government are re-elected——

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield): When.

Mr. Brown: All right—when a Labour Government are re-elected, said the hon. Member for Bassetlaw, if there is any construction with regard to the Associated British Ports development, the Labour Government will scrap it. Are the Opposition of that view? I want to know whether the Labour candidate who is to stand in my constituency in the next general election—councillor Ian Cawsey, a delightful young man—will have to say that a vote for the Labour party to sit on the Government side of the House will mean a Government who will knock down, destroy and vandalise the power stations in Luddite way, just as they are committed to knock down the dock development.

The hon. Member for Bassetlaw did the Labour party no service. The poor chap who is the Labour candidate, Councillor Ian Cawsey, has a millstone around his neck because the Labour party are saying that, if it is ever in government, it will knock down the dock development which it opposed when in opposition. If the Bill is passed into law before the next general election, will the hon. Member for Rother Valley as Energy Minister introduce legislation to knock down gas-fired power stations?

Mr. Barron: The hon. Gentleman mentioned Councillor Ian Cawsey when we debated the matter on 14 January. He says that Councillor Cawsey will have another millstone around his neck. He went on to say that the Labour party wants to kill jobs at Killingholme after the power stations are built. I invite him to withdraw that, because I did not say it then and I have not said it today —and nor have any of my hon. Friends.

Mr. Brown: Before I withdraw anything that I have said, perhaps we can get the matter straight. I will withdraw what I said if the hon. Gentleman will confirm that he is saying that, in the event of the Bill passing into law and the power stations coming on stream, a Labour Government would not knock down the power stations and abandon the principles in the Bill. If that is what he is saying and I have misinterpreted him, of course I will gladly withdraw.

But if the hon. Gentleman did not say that, why are we wasting our time today? The hon. Gentleman is implying that, if the Labour party was in power, it will accept the legislation that we have passed, acknowledge that the power stations were a reality, that the gas would be taken out of the North sea and the water out of the River Humber; but his hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw is recorded as saying in relation to the Associated British Ports Act 1990 that a Labour Government would stop construction and end the project.

Mr. Barron: When we debated the revival motion, and again today, I said that the Labour party was reluctant to approve the Bill without the House having considered the implications of increasing gas generation. If the hon. Gentleman does not understand that, I do not know what he does understand. I invite him to withdraw. In the previous debate, he said that we were out to kill the project.

Mr. Brown: So there we have it—fair enough. If the hon. Gentleman is saying that, if the Labour party wins the next general election, it will consider the legislation and all the arguments that we have deployed—[Interruption.] He added the qualification about being satisfied. However, as I said, if that is the case, I shall gladly withdraw. The hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) and his hon. Friends do not want any gas-fired power stations on South Humberside in any circumstances.

Mr. Lofthouse: It is obvious that the hon. Gentleman was not listening to my speech. At no time have I said that. At no time would I agree that, when legislation has passed through the House, we would do anything to alter it, apart from through the normal democratic procedures of the House, or decide on the legislation for the period of the life of that Government. I ask the hon. Gentleman not to misquote me again. I ask him to withdraw and apologise. At no time did I even remotely suggest what Labour's policy would be on this issue. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will withdraw what he said.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman has said that at no time in his speech did he suggest what Labour's policy would be. I do not know what he is saying—[HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."] I am simply saying that, if the hon. Gentleman is saying that there are no circumstances in which the Bill would be repealed once it is an Act—[Interruption.] Is that what he is saying? I thought that the whole purpose of an election was that one Government could repeal the legislation of the previous Government. If the Labour party has no intention of repealing any of the legislation passed by the Conservative party during this or the previous two Parliaments, I suppose that we can view the prospect of a Labour Government with some hope.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Steady on.

Mr. Brown: Indeed.

Opposition Members seem to be protesting tonight that they want to see the Bill on the statute book—[Interruption.] Well, I believe that that is what they are fumbling their way towards. They are trying to say, "Look, we have been making speeches in which we have pretended to be against the Bill, but underneath all our threadbare arguments—of course, we really have no arguments—we recognise that gas-fired power stations are the way of the future. We recognise the power of the argument deployed by the hon. Member for Stroud"——

Mr. Redmond: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Perhaps you could draw to the attention of the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) the fact that he should not turn his back on the Chair, and especially not on a lady.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I can frequently see the pleasant face of the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown).

Mr. Brown: May I reassure you, Madam Deputy Speaker, that, even more frequently, I can see your pleasant face when you are in the Chair? Indeed, it is always a great privilege to face you when you are in the Chair.

Opposition Members seem to have been fumbling their way towards saying——

Mr. Illsley rose——

Mr. Brown: I should like to develop this point, but I will consider giving way in a moment.

Opposition Members seem to have been belatedly fumbling their way to saying, "We have been making threadbare speeches this evening, but we realise that we have no argument whatsoever for opposing gas-fired power stations. We recognise that they are far cleaner than coal-fired power stations. We recognise that they emit only half the carbon dioxide of equivalent coal-fired power stations, virtually no sulphur dioxide, and only one quarter of the nitrogen oxide emissions of an equivalent coal-fired power station. Therefore, on environmental grounds, we recognise that there is no way in which we can stand in the way of such power station developments." If that is what Opposition Members are saying, I do not understand why they are likely to seek to divide the House at the end of the debate.

Mr. Meale rose——

Mr. Malcolm Moss (Cambridgeshire, North-East) rose——

Mr. Brown: I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss).

Mr. Moss: Does my hon. Friend think that Opposition Members might also take on board the fact tnat generating electricity from gas costs about 2·5p per kWh, compared with coal which costs between 3p and 3·5p per kWh?

Mr. Brown: It was clear from the Opposition's protestations earlier in my speech that, if the Bill is enacted, there is no way in which a Labour Government would seek to repeal it. Clearly, one reason for that is the one outlined by my hon. Friend. Gas is one of the cheapest ways of generating electricity. The hon. Member for Rother Valley has said that the general public do not concern themselves with the manner in which electricity is provided, but I know that, when they receive their electricity bills, the general public do concern themselves with the manner in which the electricity is passed through the electric lights in their houses. I have received many letters from constituents who are worried at their high electricity bills. Even Opposition Members know that there is the prospect of lower electricity bills with gas power generation.

Mr. Barron: The hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman), who is sitting next to the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown), has shares in one of the electricity companies. Will the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes join us in condemning the proposed 13 per cent. increase in electricity shares in the privatised companies in an attempt to protect his constituents, just as we wish to protect ours?

Mr. Brown: If the Bill becomes law as quickly as possible, it may be possible to reduce electricity charges more quickly. I hope that many private Bills of this nature will come before the House in the next Parliament, whether there is a Conservative or a Labour Government, because the way to bring down electricity costs is to ensure that we do not pay the unnecessarily high costs of electricity generation that we pay now. Gas-fired power stations are one of the most environmentally beneficial ways of producing electricity. They are also——

Mr. Illsley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I will just finish this sentence and then I will give way to the hon. Gentleman—I am sorry that I forgot my promise to give way.

Gas-powered electricity generation will in the long run be extremely cost-effective for the consumer.

Mr. Illsley: The hon. Gentleman said a few moments ago that Opposition Members opposed jobs being created in South Humberside. Why did he oppose the Nirex depository being sited in his area? That would have brought jobs to his constituency. How can he accuse us of not wanting to bring jobs to the area?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman clearly did not attend any of the interminable debates between 1984 and 1987 when I was constantly in the House speaking on the nuclear waste issue. If he had been in the House and had listened to the reasons that I gave for opposing a nuclear waste site in my constituency, he would know that I said that no jobs would accrue to my constituents. I also drew attention to the fact that the site which Nirex, the subsidiary company of the Central Electricity Generating Board, wanted to use in 1986-87 had been intended for a power station ever since the end of the war in 1945.

During our battles against Nirex in 1985-86 and 1987, the fundamental basis of my argument was that the site had always been reserved for a power station. Indeed, in 1972, there was a proposal to build an oil-fired power station. In 1972, a Bill was brought before the House to provide the powers to build it. I opposed the use of the site as a dump for nuclear waste, because it was intended for a power station.

It is as a result of my winning the battle against the nuclear waste dump that this private Bill is before the House today. But for my victory on that issue in 1986, we should not have the Bill. The hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) should refer to the Hansard reports of those debates and examine the arguments that I deployed.

Mr. Meale: Talking of consistency, perhaps the hon. Gentleman, who has just explained why people should support the construction of a gas-fired power station, will tell the House why he supported the construction of a private port in his constituency to import coal from abroad.

Mr. Brown: It just shows that I always put the consumer first. I am concerned ultimately about competition. My constituency will be available for people to bring their wares through the port of Immingham. My constituency has a wide variety of industry. We have an oil refinery and a large port and now we are to have two power stations. My constituency is in the vanguard of producing alternatives for the benefit of the consumer in the energy business. Customers can look to Brigg and Cleethorpes and see electricity, gas, power stations and the Conoco oil refinery. My constituency offers a choice to consumers of various ways of generating energy and power. I commend the Bill to the House. I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud will be the toast of my constituents for the way in which he presented it.

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) reminds me of Dickens's Artful Dodger; every time he is asked a question, he dodges it. He always seems to be ungracious; when it is pointed out that he has referred to things that have not been said, he does not have the courtesy to withdraw. His speech was practically verbatim the speech he made last time. He will have to get a speech writer, because he has run out of ideas on what to say in debates.

In the preamble, the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) talked much sense. For example, he said that we should be concerned about security of supply. I think he also mentioned concern for our children and grandchildren. When he was giving his discourse on when a pipe is not a pipe, he reminded me of an experience I had when I was in Seattle to give a lecture on alternative sources of energy.

I cannot remember all the details, but before I gave my lecture, a young Congressman spoke to the packed audience. He said that he was very busy as a Congressman and that he had to have a speech writer, but that there were dangers in having a speech writer. He described to the audience what had happened to another Congressman.

As that Congressman went on to the platform to address a meeting, a speech was thrust into his hands. He proceeded to read it. It was an appeal to the electors which went something like this, "Vote for me and I will reduce taxation on motor cars and petrol; vote for me and education will be entirely free; vote for me and pensions will be doubled or trebled." He came to the end of the page and turned to the next page where it said, "Now let me explain how I am going to pay for it all." Underneath it said, "You sonofabitch, I found out that you have been seeing my wife. Explain it all yourself."

The hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth delivered his speech with good humour. I tried to explain to him that there is always a danger when one is delivering a written speech.

Mr. Dickens: I should like to thank the hon. Gentleman for the kind things that he has said about my speech. I was careful to give credit to Labour Members for their deeply held views on and support for the coal industry. I think I also said that I stand square with them in their support of the coal industry. The promoters of the Bill are also very committed to the British coal industry. The hon. Gentleman must not lose sight of that.

Mr. Eadie: I am not trying to be critical of the hon. Gentleman in any way. He has made many comments in the House with which I disagree, but I know that he has been very supportive of many aspects of the coal industry. I hope that he will not take offence. I did not think that, particularly in his preamble, he was offensive to me or my hon. Friends or about the coal industry. It is important to examine the hon. Gentleman's preamble, because, when talking about security of supply, we must consider energy provision.

I know that the Bill will be debated at length in Committee, but when it first appeared, mistakes were made. I do not have the time to go into them now, and the House would not want to listen. Since the first appearance of the Bill, however, massive changes have occurred relating to energy provision. For example, the Gulf war —I do not want to go into that now—has made an impact on that provision.

The use of gas for electricity power generation is irresponsible—I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) about that. We do not have enough indigenous gas to meet our needs; we must import it.

I know that the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth supports the coal industry. When we talk about energy provision a la security of supply, we are fortunate, because we have enormous supplies of indigenous coal. In that case, should we be considering security of supply? I agree with the hon. Gentleman that we have a responsibility to our children and grandchildren to ensure that we have safe, adequate supplies of energy. I have often addressed the House on the importance of having an indigenous provision of energy. That means everything to us, because, if we do not have energy provision, we shall die. It is of crucial importance.

We are entitled to scrutinise the Bill carefully. My only concern is that many of my hon. Friends who want to speak will not have the opportunity to do so before someone shouts for a vote at 10 o'clock. I do not believe that that does us damage, but, should it happen, it greatly damages Parliament, because one of the criticisms of this place is that we do not spend enough time debating legislation. I do not minimise the importance of this debate, as we are talking about something that sustains life.

When I was considering what to say in this debate, I recalled what Dr. Ernst Schumacher, the extremely talented German chief economic adviser to the National Coal Board from 1950 to 1970 said on pit closures. It is well worth remembering how he described the policy of closing mines that had not been exhausted—my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford has already described that policy as one of vandalism and irresponsibility. Dr. Schumacher said:

"It is a policy of doubtful wisdom and questionable morality for this generation to take all the best resources and leave for its children only the worst. But surely it is a criminal policy if, in addition, we wilfully sterilise, abandon, and thereby ruin such relatively inferior resources as we ourselves have opened up, but do not care to utilise. This is like the spiteful burglar who does not merely pinch the valuables but in addition, destroys everything he cannot take".

My hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford mentioned the tremendous amount of investment that the Government have made. No one can argue about that, but as quickly as they invest, they destroy. Nowadays, comparatively new pits are closed, which means that the investment is, to some extent, a fraud on the nation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood) will know that, at present, I am battling for the reopening of Monktonhall colliery, which is mothballed, is not closed and contains millions of tonnes of coal. The local authorities have completed a study and produced an argument to show how it could be viable. I regret that they have had trouble meeting Ministers or the chairman of British Coal to discuss the plan, which was drawn up by independent consultants. I am sure that the House will agree that it would be difficult to make a more eloquent critique of the Government's present policy, not only on coal but on energy provision, than the words of Ernst Schumacher, whom I quoted earlier.

During the debate, figures have been bandied about on the provision of natural gas. It is generally conceded that its provision is limited. I hope, if I have time, to come to the issue of price, which was quoted by Conservative Members to further the Bill's Second Reading. I wish to introduce into the debate a western European, rather than merely a British, dimension, because that is relevant to us today.

The war we are waging in the Gulf involves a coalition of forces. One hopes that there will be a coalition of forces and forms of collective security to preserve the peace. But if we talk about collective security in relation to defence and war, we should talk about it in relation to energy provision. There is nothing inconsistent in that.

Western Europe has 31 years of proven natural gas reserves at the 1989 production rate, although half the reserves are held by non-EC countries such as Norway. Western Europe's proven oil reserves are much smaller —only 13 years at current production rates, with Norway holding half of them. The preliminary remarks of the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth were valuable, because he too has been thinking about that dimension. The world reserves of gas and oil are only 55 years and 44 years respectively. The House should use those figures when talking about security of supply and energy provision for our people. The EC probably has a minimum of 200 years coal reserves at current production rates. That is a viable insurance policy as oil and gas run out. In the EC, there are hundreds of years of technically recoverable reserves of coal.

Coal is probably the most complex of our hydrocarbon resources, it can be converted into many petroleum products and substitute natural gas. That will become necessary in the early part of the next century. When I was a Minister, I was proud to sign an agreement with Sir Derek Ezra, then the chairman of the National Coal Board, to set up three pilot plants to make oil from coal. Different systems were used, but I shall not bore the House with the details. We abuse our scientists far too much because Britain is good at technology. We are an inventive nation. We decided that the best of the three pilot projects would be examined to see if it was commercially viable.

I am sorry to say that the 1979 general election intervened. My successor said that that was the right way to deal with science and technology, but, despite a promise that the projects would carry on, I am afraid that they were buried, because the Government are anti-science and anti-technology. I am sorry to say that, because such an attitude affects the whole nation and in future may affect its wealth.

A rapidly declining coal industry cannot sustain the level of research and development that is needed to prove new technologies of coal liquefaction and gasification. The coal industry continues to decline, and we ruthlessly close pits. As my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford has said, when a pit is closed, there is no way of regaining access to that God-given wealth. How can we develop the new technologies when we are destroying our indigenous capacity to produce coal?

Mr. Jack Thompson: In areas such as mine, and on the eastern coast of Scotland where the mines extend under the North sea, closed mines are certainly written off, because there is no way in which one can gain access to them. That is because the North sea has flooded the workings and the cost of getting back at those reserves would be prohibitive.

Mr. Eadie: I am obliged to my hon. Friend. I know his area well. There was talk in his area about gas and oil. The coalfield in his constituency is very old, and I had a suspicion that all the coal had not been worked. I proposed a working party to examine my hon. Friend's coalfield, because we had discovered from examinations that in many areas there is sometimes more coal than was ever mined. It was possible to discover that because North sea oil exploration has introduced new seismic studies. I do not know whether that applies to my hon. Friend's area, but I had proposed that a working party carry out an examination of that area. I believe that that is the function of Government. After all, as I said earlier, we are talking about wealth.

In recent years, Britain has been the only net exporter of energy in the EC. In 1988, United Kingdom primary energy production accounted for 39 per cent. of all the primary energy produced in the EC. United Kingdom coal accounted for 10 per cent. of the total. This was one of the few secure long-term resources of the Community.

We must look at this matter in a European and global context. When I was gathering these figures, I was surprised to learn that the EC is now nearly 50 per cent. dependent on imported energy. That figure would increase to 55 per cent. if the United Kingdom were to abandon its deep-mine industry and instead import coal, gas and oil. If all EC hard coal production were to cease, and if current consumption rates were to continue, the level of dependency would rise to over 60 per cent.

Mr. Meale: I do not want to disturb the direction of my hon. Friend's speech, but may I ask him to dwell for a moment on the question of the people who work in coalfields throughout the world? I am thinking of the ages of workers, and so on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I find it a little difficult to relate the remarks of the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) to the contents of the Bill. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will take note of that.

Mr. Eadie: I understand the point that you are making, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I appreciate your tolerance. However, I am dealing with points that have already been raised in the debate. As has been said, it will be a scandal if a vote is taken at 10 o'clock. Many of my hon. Friends want to speak.

There has been reference to gas imports, and some very optimistic scenarios have been put forward. It is only right that I should comment on some of them. In 1990, gas imports amounted to 81·4 million tonnes equivalent. Most scenarios anticipate that, by the year 2010, that figure will have doubled. At the end of 1990, the European authorities removed the restrictions on the use of gas in power generation. It is likely, therefore, that there will be many new gas-fired power stations, but where will the gas come from? That question is indeed relevant to this Bill.

We could also ask about the price. For some time, it has been assumed that, except in the case of Norway, the gas will come from the Soviet Union and, to a lesser extent, from Algeria. As the energy crisis in the Soviet Union deepens, this assumption becomes questionable. For that reason, as well as for others, we should question this whole proposition. In 1989, for the first time, Soviet gas production, at 796 billion cu m, failed to meet the planned target of 820 billion cu m. The increase of 26 billion cu m from 1988 did not make up for the drop in oil, gas and nuclear production.

The collapse of Soviet oil output from the record 624 million tonnes in 1990 is forcing the Soviet Union to use more of its own gas supplies. Falling production and the deep crisis in the nuclear industry places even more pressure on the gas industry. In the wake of a series of minor strikes, coal production fell by 32 tonnes to 740 million tonnes in 1989. It fell by a further 4·8 per cent. during the first seven months of 1990, compared with the equivalent period in 1989. There has also been the Chernobyl disaster.

We must appreciate the true position about gas. The EC—that includes us—has only 2·2 per cent. of the world's gas reserves. Western Europe as a whole, at 1989 production levels, has gas reserves of 31·3 years, which is the smallest amount per region, after north America. That shows that it would be a scandal if the Bill, which would mean the burning of gas, were to go through unchallenged.

I can give the figures for gas reserves region by region. North America has 12·6 years, which is a 6·5 per cent. share of the total. South America has 75 years, which represents 5·8 per cent.; western Europe has 31·3 years, which represents 4·9 per cent.; the USSR—on which people have pinned their faith—has 53·2 years, which represents 37·6 per cent.; eastern Europe has 14 years, which represents 0·7 per cent.; Africa has 110 years, which represents 6·7 per cent.; Algeria has 72·3 years, which represents 2·9 per cent.; Asia/Australasia has 55·3 years, which represents 7·1 per cent.; the middle east has 350 years, which represents 30·7 per cent. The source for those figures is British Petroleum.

The middle east has 350 years of reserves, of which Iran has the largest share, with 12·5 per cent. of the total, followed by Saudi Arabia, Qatar and Abu Dhabi, each with 4 per cent. of the total. Declining reserves and the growing import tendency are now being combined with uncertainty about prices. The belief that gas prices are being decoupled from oil prices is no longer sustainable because of the price increases following the third-world shock.

I was astonished that one Conservative Member, who argued in favour of the Bill, tried to promise that, if we allowed the Bill to go through, it would mean a decrease in electricity prices. An examination of the facts shows that to be a bogus claim. In 2010, we will be confronted with a 40 per cent. increase. Solid fuel is to some extent different. Security of supply is a central issue. Oil reserves in western Europe have only about a 12·6-year life at current rates of gas production. Reserves stand at only 31·3 per cent., increasing the insecurity of supply.

Mr. Meale: Will my hon. Friend dwell a little more on the implications of the insecurity of the Gulf, the Soviet bloc and South America for maintaining supplies at gas stations such as the one in the Bill?

Mr. Eadie: For the convenience of the House, I skipped many of my figures, but I showed that, if gas is a diminishing supply—of all the fossil fuels, it contracts—the future of power stations is bound to be jeopardised.

Gas is a wonderful fuel. A lot can be done with it. We are fortunate to have the reserves we do. Unfortunately, we are consuming more than we are finding. The world is consuming more than it is finding. At one time, it was thought that the best way to use natural gas would be in developing the petrochemical industry—the by-products that could be obtained from it. However, we have changed our minds quite a bit on that.

Gas reserves were originally believed to be more limited than is now thought to be the case. It used to be thought that, come the late 1990s, gas reserves would be exhausted. There have been more finds, which we welcome, but there have been no really magnificent finds.

Those who are hell-bent on using gas as a means of generating electricity place much faith in the belief that, although they confess that we would not have enough indigenous gas, cheap gas would be available from the Soviet Union which could be transported by pipes running below the North sea. But that will not materialise. There is much instability in the world at the present. To some extent, the Gulf war is part of the energy production crisis.

Mr. Hugo Summerson (Walthamstow): The hon. Gentleman is right to say that gas and coal reserves will eventually be exhausted. Does he not agree that the generation of electricity by nuclear power will become more important in future?

Mr. Eadie: I have taken part in many debates on the topic of nuclear power generation. The hon. Gentleman must face up to the problem that——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The real problem seems to be that the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) is being led astray by that intervention.

Mr. Eadie: I understand why the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Summerson) asked that question, but the alternative of nuclear power is not the one before us. I was only going to remark that nuclear power is just too unforgiving at present, and I cannot see myself ever being able to forget that.

The security of supply argument was advanced at the start of this debate in support of the Bill. Western Europe's oil reserves have a life of only 12·6 years at current production rates, and gas reserves will last for only 31·3 years. The European scenario has been projected as far ahead as 2010. World oil and gas reserves will also be quickly depleted over the next 20 years. That inherent insecurity will add to the problem of external supply, and is a central issue in formulating not only a national energy policy but an EC-wide policy.

Apart from the moral question whether or not western Europe should continue to monopolise 31 per cent. of world oil imports, the central issue of security must also be considered.

Mr. Knapman rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question put, That the Question be now put:—

The House proceeded to a Division:

Mr. Hood (seated and covered): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will take the hon. Gentleman's point of order, but I suspect that it is more a point of frustration. It might be better if he put the point to me after the Division, when it will be easier both for the House and for me to hear.

Mr. Hood: I assure you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that it is certainly not a point of frustration. At the beginning of the debate, I raised a point about the credibility of the private Bill procedure. It seems strange that the three-hour debate that we were originally allowed should be cut short. The Bill has 37 clauses. Surely it is not in the interests of the House to allow such a short debate on Second Reading, and I ask you to extend it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman was not able to speak in the debate, and I am sorry about that, but he did manage to make some interventions.

The hon. Gentleman's point is not a point of order for the Chair, but one that he could have made during the debate had he been called. I am sorry that he and a number of other hon. Members on both sides of the House could not be called before I accepted the closure motion.

The House having divided: Ayes 154, Noes 50.

Hill Livestock

10.25 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Curry): I beg to move,

That the draft Hill Livestock (Compensatory Allowance) (Amendment) Regulations 1991, which were laid before this House on 13th February, be approved.

The regulations apply to Great Britain and will bring into effect an increase in hill livestock compensatory allowances used in less-favoured areas. An identical order for Northern Ireland has already come into effect. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is present on the Government Front Bench.

The regulations concern 65,000 farmers, 52,000 of whom are in severely disadvantaged areas. The regulations would increase the rate for cattle in severely disadvantaged areas to £63·30, and for hardy breed ewes, which includes herdwicks, which have become famous as a breed in upland areas, would increase the rate to £8·75. Hardy breed ewes account for 58 per cent. of all ewes in less-favoured areas. For other ewes, the amount will increase to £4·90. In disadvantaged areas, which are slightly less difficult but still less-favoured, the rate for cattle will be £31·65 and for ewes it will be £2·45. That represents a 14 per cent. increase and a global amount of £17·5 million. It takes total public expenditure on hill livestock compensatory payments to £142 million.

I shall not rehearse the history of the payments, but I will concentrate on three or four matters that will interest hon. Members. We had some difficulties in bringing in the new proposals. The Agriculture Council agreed by qualified majority, with the United Kingdom voting against, amendments to the structural regulations in November 1989. Three of the amendments effectively concerned HLCAs. The first was the imposition of a limit of 1·4 per livestock units per hectare as a limit for payment, and a livestock unit is one cow or 6·66 recurring sheep. It also introduced a limit on full Community funding—25 per cent. in the case of Great Britain and 30 per cent. in the case of Northern Ireland—to 60 livestock units per holding, and half that amount was between 60 and 120. Finally, it permitted member states to lay down certain environmental conditions for the grants and for livestock compensatory amounts. The United Kingdom already imposes a limit of six ewes per hectare in severely disadvantaged areas and nine in disadvantaged areas, for environmental reasons to do with the intensity of grazing.

We were obliged by the Community regulations to apply the limit from the 1991 payment, but the payment in our legislation reflected 1990 numbers. In that sense it was retrospective and we had to be satisfied that the regulation concerned was directly applicable. Once that was settled, we were able to print the application forms and the guidance notes, and they went out to farmers in the week of 11 February. We have made special arrangements at the divisional offices and at the Guildford computer centre to process the applications. We can start making payments as soon as the instrument is passed in this House and in another place tomorrow. People are working weekends and overtime to process the applications as fast as we can.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): The regulations come into force as the Minister said, but when will the payments be made? Will he state the time scale, because farmers are desperate to have the much-needed cash in their pockets? Will the allowances be paid by the end of March or before?

Mr. Curry: I was about to come on to that. How much we can pay depends on how many applications we receive. Farmers have to send back their applications. In England, we have received almost 1,300 claims from the midlands and western region and we have processed 41 per cent. of them. We have received 2,600 claims from the northern region and we have processed about 26 per cent. of them. From the south-west we have received about 650 applications and have processed about 23 per cent. Altogether, we aim to have about 55 per cent. of the total payments out by the end of March. We shall turn round the others as soon as they come into the offices. That is the key.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): On the same point but in relation to Wales, when can we expect payments to farmers in Wales to be completed? As the Minister knows, farm incomes in Wales are in a particularly poor state.

Mr. Curry: The forms went out on 7 February. I cannot tell the hon. and learned Gentleman when payments will be completed, for the simple reason that that depends on farmers returning the application forms to us. They have all received their forms. As soon as they fill in the forms, we shall turn the applications round as rapidly as we possibly can. We recognise the cash flow problems, and our purpose is to get the payments out to farmers as fast as we possibly can. We have therefore put our offices on standby and they will work overtime and weekends if necessary in order to get the payments out to the farmers.

We have not increased the maximum amount payable per hectare, which is set at £62·48 in the severely disadvantaged areas and £46·86 in the disadvantaged areas. We have held that rate for two reasons. First, to have increased it would have benefited those with the highest stocking rates at the expense of the others, as the actual increase per head would have been lower. Secondly, we wished to have regard to the environmental implications of stocking rates.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): One of my constituents reckons that he has lost about £2,000 through that rate being held. How long has the figure remained at £62·48? Is it not the case that the Minister could have put it up to a ceiling of £77·33? Even if one accepts the environmental principle, that could be preserved by index-linking the figure that he has chosen. That would at least allow some much-needed income to those who have seen a drop of £100 per head in the price of their cattle.

Mr. Curry: We faced a choice. We wanted to get the money to people who faced the most difficulty. We therefore chose to allocate the resources—which, as in all Government business, are finite—to producers in the highest hills and to increase the headage rate rather than the maximum payable per hectare. We shall of course review these matters in the autumn, as we do every year.

On the differential between the severely disadvantaged areas and the disadvantaged areas, we brought the disadvantaged areas into the scheme in 1985 and paid them at the half rate. We have maintained that differential, which reflects the severity of the natural handicaps. As I said, a review is due in the autumn and we shall reconsider that differential with an open mind. However, I am not willing to give any guarantees on it.

With those preliminary remarks, which I have deliberately kept limited so that the maximum number of hon. Members could participate, I commend the regulations to the House.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): We welcome the fact that we are having this debate on hill livestock compensatory allowances, and we realise why the Government have allowed us to have it. We appreciate that they are in some difficulty in the upland constituency of Ribble Valley and that they feel that by blowing their trumpet tonight and extolling the virtues of their payments, they may be given some credit in that part of the world.

We welcome the debate for a much deeper reason. It allows us an opportunity to highlight the plight of the upland farmer, who is the most pressurised of farmers—and most farmers are pressurised under this Government. The Minister has made great play of the increases in payments this year. We applaud those increases. It would be churlish not to do so, but it is right to put on record the fact that they do not make up in real terms for the four years when the Government froze HLCAs. The payment that farmers get after this increase will be less in real terms than they got four years ago. Those are the years when the damage was done to upland farming and when the income of upland farmers took the greatest strain.

According to the Government's own figures, the income of upland livestock farmers dropped by a dramatic 60 per cent. between 1988 and 1990. That is too large a fall for any farmer to absorb. Income falls can be absorbed for a year or so by delaying maintenance payments, but that can go on only so long. In the upland areas it has gone on far too long. Farmers in such areas rely heavily on HLCA payments, and the difficulties are beginning to show.

The Minister almost anticipated the questions that would be pressed on him from the Opposition. Why was there a delay in payment this year? The Minister gave us a lot of baloney about European this and European that, but he knows that that is simply not on. In last year's statement, looking ahead to 1991, the Minister of Agriculture Fisheries and Food said:

"This will be our review, on our terms, about our hill problems, and we will not automatically carry through the views that have been approved by the European Community contrary to our wishes."—[Official Report, 30 January 1990; Vol. 166, c. 160.]

Why the delay? The Minister made it clear that he would be master in his own house and that he would decide what was what. Now, the Under-Secretary of State tells us that the delay is all because of Europe. There has been a history of delay in payments. When the right hon. Member for Morecambe and Lonsdale was Minister, he used to make the announcement in November or December each year, so that farmers knew where they were from the beginning of the incoming year. Under the present Minister, the announcement was made on 30 January last year, and this year it was made on 11 February.

I could not understand the significance of 11 February until I discovered that, on 12 February, the Minister was to address the annual general meeting of the National Farmers Union. That was perhaps a happy coincidence, but the farmers in the uplands must be glad that at least the NFU has an annual general meeting.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): It is only a small point, but did the hon. Gentleman mean Morecambe and Lunesdale or Westmorland?

Dr. Clark: I meant the right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling), the previous Minister of Agriculture but one.

This is yet another example of the Minister playing a game of petty politics. He ought to treat upland farmers more seriously.

Normally, the forms are sent out at the end of December and farmers start to receive payments about the end of January. As the Minister has admitted, this year the forms were held back and were not sent out until the middle of February. As we have heard, if farmers are lucky, they will get some payment by the end of March. The Ministry gave no warning to farmers about the delay. Indeed, it was left to Opposition Members to raise the issue persistently to try to find out what was happening. Why were the forms not sent out to farmers earlier? The information required to calculate the payment is based on the details of farms as recorded on 1 January, so why the delay?

The Minister represents many upland farmers and I know that he appreciates the hardship that they face, so why was it not possible to issue part of the HLCA at the end of January and the rest later? There is a precedent for that. In the November before HLCA payments were issued in 1986, the right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale, then Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, issued the following statement:

"I am well aware that, following the exceptionally bad weather earlier this year, many farmers in the Less Favoured Areas are facing cash-flow problems. To help this, I am preparing to introduce special procedures for the 1986 HLCA payments under which all claimants will receive about 75 per cent. of their claim very shortly after submitting their application, with the balance being paid as soon as possible after 1st April 1986".

That was a sensible decision, as the right hon. Gentleman anticipated the cash flow problems of 1986. If the Minister does not already know it, his farmers will tell him that, because of the Government's economic policies, farmers today, especially those in the uplands, have similar cash flow problems. Why has the Minister not treated them as sympathetically as they were treated in 1986?

Earlier today, I followed the Minister to the forest of Bowland and I had the great pleasure of meeting a farmer, Mr. Dinsdale, of Cuttock Clough farm. He has 130 hectares of difficult marginal land that goes up to the top of the trough of Bowland. On it he has 300 hardy ewes and 20 suckler cows. He is typical of many upland farmers throughout the United Kingdom. It is vital that they stay in business.

In common with many farmers in my hon. Friends' constituencies, Mr. Dinsdale has diversified to increase his resources. He has a caravan park and a clay pigeon shoot, but he is struggling to make even them pay. This year he will get a subsidy of £8·75 per ewe; last year it was £7·50. Last year he got £1,800 for his wool, but this year he will be lucky to get £1,100. As the Australian and New Zealand wool boards are pulling away from their guaranteed prices, that figure could be even lower. Mr. Dinsdale will get only between £14 and £17 for each of his ewes because, as the Minister will be aware, the hardy breed ewes are small and usually have only one lamb at a time. Last year, such ewes fetched £34. The year before they fetched £54. This year Mr. Dinsdale will be lucky to get £17 per ewe. This year alone, Mr. Dinsdale's income will be cut by £6,000, yet the Minister will compensate with a payment of £375 extra for his sheep.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Clark: I hope that this intervention is more relevant than the previous one.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman is talking about matters relating to the Ribble valley, an area I know well as I was at school there for about 12 years. I therefore know that trough of Bowland well. Contrary to the hon. Gentleman's view that the problems of upland farmers are the fault of the Government, the MacSharry proposals, which come from the European Commission, will work against those who have as much as 130 hectares. In other words, the Government are trying to defend people such as Mr. Dinsdale, but the Commission and the MacSharry proposals will have the opposite effect.

Dr. Clark: I thought that the hon. Gentleman's previous intervention was superficial, but that one was worse. The MacSharry proposals are about the future. The hon. Gentleman has failed to grasp that we are talking about the past and the present. The MacSharry proposals have nothing to do with tonight's debate on current HLCA payments.

Mr. Dinsdale's standard of living has fallen. He has not farmed badly. He is a good farmer, but the economic conditions under which the Government have operated have made it impossible for his farm to be a healthy investment. Agriculture in the United Kingdom this year and the Government's publication confirm how steep the decline has been for Mr. Dinsdale and other upland farmers. I stood on his farm today and he told me of two neighbours who have already quit. They are only two of the 16 farmers who are leaving their farms and land each day the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food sits in Whitehall place.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): Will it be Labour party policy to make up the £6,000 which was the hon. Gentleman's estimate of what Mr. Dinsdale and his neighbours have lost?

Dr. Clark: I congratulate the hon. Member on making a sensible point and anticipating my very next sentence.

Why does the Minister resist the Labour party's idea of paying such farmers a green premium for managing their farms in an environmentally friendly manner? They look after their landscape; the community wants that sort of landscape and will pay for it. Last year, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food gave me hope. He specifically mentioned his hopes to add environmental conditions to the HLCAs. Why has he not done so? The only conditions we have are those imposed by Europe.

The Government's White Paper on the environment referred to integrating environmental and agriculture policies. It stated:

"EC support schemes will be required in return to protect and, where possible, enhance the environment on their holdings . . .

The conservation of the countryside can be an inherent part of good practice in livestock farming, and agricultural policy aims to ensure that basic support for agriculture will provide environmental benefits."

Bearing in mind those promises and the fact that the technical amendments in the sheep meat regime proposals from Brussels for the 1991 price review are likely to lead to a considerable cut in production subsidies for upland sheep farmers, it is imperative that other support, such as environmental payments, is brought forward. By failing to do what they promised, the Government have let down the farmer, the environment and the consumer.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I have a number of hill farmers in my constituency, and only 10 days ago I met my local National Farmers Union branches and the High Peak Livestock Society, which has many members in the hill district of my constituency. When I met my hill farmers, they appeared to be content with the announcement made to the House by the Minister. But at that meeting, and subsequently, they expressed reservations and advised me that investigation of the rates of the hill livestock compensatory allowances revealed that everything was not as it seemed. It is important that the Minister should clarify those issues tonight.

In order that the House should fully understand the points that I am about to make, I should say that I understand that some rates that applied before—for example, an upper limit payment for six ewes per hectare and a controversial financial limit of £62·48 per hectare —still remain. But the Minister announced a new financial limit of 1·4 livestock units per hectare. I think that I am right about this, but if I am not I shall give way to the Minister. I understand that the limit is for the severely disadvantaged and disadvantaged areas at the relevant rates.

Under the old system, the farmer calculated the number of sheep and drew the relevant rate up to a maximum of six ewes per hectare, The difference between the sheep payment and the financial limit of £62·48 was then taken up by the suckler cow to the maximum financial limit. My farmers were led to believe from a copy of the Minister's announcement in the House that there was a new financial limit of 1·4 livestock units per hectare.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor) indicated assent.

Mr. Winterton: The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) nods agreement.

A livestock unit is defined as one bovine animal, namely a cow, or 6·7 ewes. It is therefore natural to assume that the new financial limit was 1·4 livestock units times the new rate for cows, which is £63·30, which comes out at £88·62. My farmers were under that impression when we met that Saturday morning at a large meeting in my constituency.

On checking with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food regional office in my area, Berkeley Towers in Crewe, and with Nottingham and Wolverhampton and with the Ministry in London, my farmers were told that the old limit of £62·48 per hectare stands, and that is the figure from which they will operate. One accepts that any farmer who does not carry the number of stock required to take him to the financial limit will have an increase under the new rates, but any farmer who is stocked to the maximum rate using the HLCA criteria will not receive any increase.

Mr. Livsey: The hon. Gentleman makes a powerful and correct point. We should find out from the Minister whether the 14 per cent. increase that he mentioned is 14 per cent. within the parameters that the hon. Gentleman describes. Has the Minister done his sums?

Mr. Winterton: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman, and I hope that the Minister will clarify the matter when winding up.

One must bear in mind the fact that the size of farm is immaterial, because the limit is financial and is attached to the area. That means that the small farmer will be hit proportionally harder. As the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) said, the small hill farmer must be encouraged because, in the context of conservation, such farmers are important and will continue to be so.

I and, I think, many hon. Members are uncertain, and there is no doubt that many farmers in disadvantaged hill areas are also uncertain. Hill farmers in my branch of the NFU and members of the High Peak Livestock Society accept that it is one thing if rates are not raised but that it is entirely another to create the illusion of a substantial rise when that is not the case. I am sure that all hon. Members who represent farming constituencies, and especially those with hill farmers, are aware of the fall in farming incomes in less-favoured areas. They have dropped by 60 per cent. in real terms over the last two years.

That is not my figure, but the official figure published by the Ministry. The controversial figure of £63·30 has been in place since 1984. Since that time, we have encountered grave problems. One of these is inflation, much of which has been generated, directly or indirectly, by Government policy.

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, West) rose——

Mr. Winterton: I will not give way. My hon. Friend is always angry when I speak the truth. [Interruption.] Well, if she wants to be helpful, I shall be happy to give way.

Miss Nicholson: Does not my hon. Friend agree that, whereas it is not good that some other product subsidies should be linked to output, a link between this subsidy and output is a very good thing in the modern world, as the upland farmers are producing the sort of meat that every dietitian says we should eat?

Mr. Winterton: I am tickled pink. I am delighted that my hon. Friend is taking my side in an argument. I entirely agree that > "The mountain sheep are sweeter,

> But the valley sheep are fatter".

I forget who wrote those lines, but they are part of a famous poem that I learned at school many years ago.

The situation facing the sheep farmers in the marginal areas of this country is very serious indeed. Will they get an increase, or will many of them get no increase at all? They require an honest answer from the Government. In the last two years, they have suffered huge income reductions. When will they be assisted? As well as producing food for the nation, they maintain the countryside—and the Government often profess that maintenance of the countryside is one of their high priorities.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. We have less than an hour to go, and a number of hon. Members still wish to speak. I, too, shall be tickled pink if Members take to heart my appeal for short speeches.

10·57 pm

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): The hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), with his usual ferocious independence, has told the truth. We look forward to hearing a head-on reply to the points that he has made so eloquently.

[Mr. Alex Carlile]

Speaking for the Labour party, the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) said that he wanted to applaud the Government for the increase that is reflected in these regulations.

I should prefer to say that we are thankful for small mercies. Small mercies they are. The last thing that the Government deserve for any part of their agriculture policy is applause. It was amazing to hear a Labour Front Bench spokesman speak in those terms.

It is crucial that we look at HLCAs in context. I can use my constituency as a good example. Proportionately, Montgomery is the most agricultural constituency in the United Kingdom. Its dependence on HLCAs and other agriculture support mechanisms is probably as great as that of any other constituency. Let us look at what is happening to constituencies like mine. In recent years, Montgomeryshire has had low unemployment. Now, my constituency has the largest unemployment increase percentage in the whole of Wales. Between January 1990 and January 1991, unemployment rose by 48 per cent.—four times the Welsh average. The figure for men was 53 per cent. In Wales, we in Montgomeryshire have an unenviable lead of 20 per cent., but other agricultural constituencies are also badly affected. Monmouth has experienced a 26 per cent. increase in unemployment in the last year, and the figure for Brecon and Radnor is 25 per cent.

Examples are to be found also in English constituencies with a strong agricultural base. Perhaps the best one to choose is Huntingdon, which is of interest to the Government. Unemployment in that constituency has increased by 44 per cent.——

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): How many hill farmers are there in Huntingdon?

Mr. Carlile: Huntingdon has a strong agricultural base, and it has had a 44 per cent. increase in unemployment in the past year. The Government should face up to that.

As has been said, Welsh farming income has dropped dramatically. In 1990——

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Carlile: I shall heed your injunction, Madam Deputy Speaker—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. and learned Gentleman is not giving way.

Mr. Carlile: In 1990, there was a 23 per cent. fall in Welsh farming incomes, following a 28·2 per cent. fall in 1989. Those decreases do not take account of inflation. The Welsh fall is greater than the United Kingdom average. Finished cattle prices are running at about the same level as 1990, and that means that they are below 1989 prices. Finished lamb prices are well below 1990 prices.

We are extremely concerned about the continuing delays in payments to Welsh farmers. The suckler cow premium was paid several weeks later, just before Christmas. We know what an awful mess the Government are in with the forms for hill livestock compensatory allowances. It is not good enough to blame Brussels. The Government could have produced forms that requested all the information that they needed to make HLCA payments well before the uncertain time that they are now offering. They failed to do so. They know the effects of such delays in an industry that as many as 6,000 farmers left in 1990.

Part of the context of the regulations is, of course, the MacSharry proposals. We support the Government's rejection of those proposals as being highly discriminatory against the United Kingdom, as the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) said earlier. As the Government have suggested, the original MacSharry proposals penalise the more efficient producers. We are extremely concerned about the knock-on effects, especially on the livestock sector, and about changes in other sectors.

We will be interested to hear from the Minister what the Government are saying about the new proposals that have emanated—and I use the word advisedly, for they are nothing short of an emanation—from Brussels today. The proposals spell further decline in sheep, beef and milk—a 2 per cent. reduction in the support price for lamb; a 2 per cent. cut in the milk quota; a minute reduction in the green pound, which will do practically nothing to help the British farmer; and the virtual removal of the safety net for beef farmers.

Let us hear from the Minister how this very small HLCA increase fits into that context. He must confess to the House that, overall, there will be a further decline in the position of farmers in the hills of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Curry: Does the hon. and learned Gentleman believe that the budgetary discipline guidelines should or should not be observed? Is he recommending that we should or should not go through the budgetary discipline guidelines? The proposals from Mr. MacSharry, which emanate—whichever verb the hon. and learned Gentleman wishes to choose—are in response to the problem of agricultural budgets exceeding their targets. Does he believe that we should or should not go through those? If he does not, we must exercise restraint; if he does, we want to know that.

Mr. Carlile: We now hear from the Minister what appears to be an acceptance of the appalling revised proposals made today. It is no use telling the farmers of Wales or any of the other uplands in the United Kingdom that they must make do with half an agriculture policy, which is all that he is offering them. We need an agriculture policy that ensures the survival of farming in the hills, for without that there will be nothing on or at the bottom of the hills, as he well knows. It is essential that the Government start planning for the future by introducing new mechanisms within the United Kingdom that include farm management contracts for farmers, country management contracts, and all the other aspects of our 10-point plan that my hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) described so clearly in the House in our agriculture debate a few days ago.

Mr. Curry: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman answer my question? There is a problem of an overrun on the budget. Does the hon. and learned Gentleman believe that there should be measures to bring the budget back within its guidelines—yes or no? That is the question that Mr. MacSharry has to face. That is the question which every member of the Agriculture Council will have to face. It will not go away. It has to be answered.

Mr. Carlile: I will tell the hon. Gentleman again: the Government must produce a policy which will ensure a future for British farmers. If the budgetary disciplines are accepted in the form in which it appears we must accept them, he will have to take steps to produce a policy for the future of upland farms. He has produced no ideas at all, either in this debate or before it. I see some approval from Conservative Members for that statement. No steps at all have been produced to that effect.

Mr. Cash rose——

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Will the hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Carlile: No, there is pressure on time.

We give a guarded welcome to the announcement for HLCA rates for 1991. We are thankful for small mercies. But there are two extremely disappointing aspects. The first is the financial limits. Those financial limits have not been increased from £62·48 per hectare in the severely disadvantaged areas and £46·86 per hectare in the disadvantaged areas. That means that many producers will not be better off because of the increased rates. The EC maximum rates are £77·33 and £58 per hectare respectively. We believe that the financial limits should be moved closer, if not up to those maxima. Let the Minister tell the farmers why the British Government will not increase the limits to or near those maxima.

Mr. Curry rose——

Mr. Carlile: I shall not give way. The Minister can reply to the debate later, and I look forward to hearing him.

Many farmers are in a catch-22 situation. They will not benefit from the increase because of their stocking densities. The new rate for hill cows is higher than the maximum stocking density per hectare. That means that hill farmers stocking more than one cow per hectare will lose out on the increases. What sort of support is that for hill farmers? Many will be blocked from benefiting from the increased level of payments. The scheme has been changed far too much and it is now full of inconsistencies.

Another severely worrying matter relates to the disadvantaged areas. The 50 per cent. rule has been retained on disadvantaged area payments. It means that producers in those areas will get only small increases which do not keep pace with inflation over the years. Again, that is an unsatisfactory aspect of the proposals.

Those of us who represent hill farming areas warn the Government that farming is in as serious a decline as that faced by the steel industry years ago and the coal industry too. We see communities faced with break-up and massive unemployment. The Government must do far more than pat themselves on the back over a small increase in HLCAs. They must come forward with a full policy for upland areas, or they will have no credibility whatever in the farming industry.

11.8 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I only wish to take up the point that has just been made by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) and to support the Government in what is an extremely difficult position which has been brought about by proposals emanating from the European Commission, not from the Government. I have the greatest sympathy with the Government's position.

The fact is that the whole of the CAP is in need of significant reform. The fund's structural problems, the way in which the hillstock farmers' difficulties have been addressed, and the problems concerning Mr. Dinsdale, which the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery mentioned, turn on the way in which the situation has been orchestrated. The rules relevant to the 1950s and the 1960s are not relevant to the 1990s and the year 2000.

This afternoon, the Select Committee on European Legislation, of which I am a member, examined proposals to reform the common agricultural policy. It is essential and in the interests of British farming that we get to grips with the real problem—votes in France, Germany, and Italy. Until we address that aspect, we will not resolve the GATT problem, which could bring world trade to a grinding halt. We must appeal to our friends and colleagues in Europe—although sometimes they are not so friendly—to address the issue of helping the farmers of this country, so that we may resolve the issues that arise in the GATT talks.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery would not allow me to intervene in his speech, but I draw to his attention the people who are getting substantial subventions from the Community that neither the Commission nor the Community's budget can justify. They are Bavarian pig farmers, those running small or uneconomic farms, those looking to the Commission for a social wage, and those who are not farmers at all but who run farms on a part-time basis.

The problem will not be solved by reducing it to an argument about technicalities. It is a political problem, and one that must be resolved by Community policies directed at the Community, not at the specific interests of individual countries. It will not be resolved until the Community and the Commission are prepared to grapple with the problem, and Mr. MacSharry is prepared to consider the interests of the Community as a whole, not just his own Irish farmers.

I hope that my points will be taken on board by the Commission, because there are those in this House and throughout the country who are no longer prepared to countenance the current situation.

11.12 pm

Ms. Hilary Armstrong (Durham, North-West): The constituency that I represent is not predominately agricultural, but is has some significant and beautiful agricultural land. Much of it is in the north Pennines and is therefore used for hill farming. My constituency also includes land that was formerly given over to industries such as steel and coal, which have suffered from a lack of the intervention which agriculture has enjoyed.

The situation in Weardale is different from that in hill farming areas represented by other right hon. and hon. Members. That community has suffered many economic problems, and they have been intensified by those now confronting hill farmers. The Government's agricultural policies are threatening the future of their communities and their land.

Weardale has traditionally considered itself a working dale, embracing manufacturing and industrial activity as well as agriculture. This week sees the demise of the last of

[Ms. Hilary Armstrong]

Weardale's industrial works, in upper Weardale, and the closure of its mineral works, where mining of fluorspar has been an important activity for many of the families who, although their livelihood is based on farming, have topped up their incomes by involving at least one member in industrial work. During the past three weeks, more than 200 workers have been made redundant and the last 35 will go this week.

I have met the hill farmers numerous times. They held a meeting last night, and have written to me of their concern about the future of wool. Other hon. Members have already mentioned that, and I do not want to go into the details, but the farmers feel that that is another example of the way in which their livelihood is disappearing. Some of the hill farms in Weardale have already been sold off to Saudi Arabian princes who are interested in the shooting rights. I am not sure what the events of the past few weeks will mean for the future of that moorland; there is a slight irony there.

I want the special character of the uplands to be protected and developed, not abandoned. All the farmers tell me—and I believe them—that, unless the land is tended by farmers, it will decline, and I already see signs of that.

Many of the points made by the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) and my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) have been raised elsewhere. There is considerable confusion about the nature of the financial reward that the Government's proposals will supposedly bring, and great concern about the delay in the provision of money and about the future structure of support and development. Many farmers genuinely feel that they have been abandoned; they are clutching at every straw presented by the Government, because there is nothing else, but every facet of their livelihood and their life in the community has been stripped away.

I cannot emphasise strongly enough to the Minister the extent of the crisis facing the communities of upper Weardale. Tonight's debate deals with just one aspect of that crisis, but it points to the critical need for a Government policy to deal with the current decline, which affects not only individuals and their families but whole communities and the future of land and land use. I hope that the Government will see the debate in the context of a range of other issues; I have not mentioned interest rates, but they are having a major effect as well.

Mr. John D. Taylor (Strangford): The Minister mentioned that sitting beside him is the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley), who is the Minister responsible for agriculture in Northern Ireland. He has been sent over from England to look after the people of Ulster. He and I recently attended a conference at Greenmount agricultural college on the subject of the family farm. One of the main guest speakers was the EC Commissioner, Mr. Raymond MacSharry, from Sligo.

One of the startling facts that emerged from the conference is that 25 per cent. of farmers in Northern Ireland are now trading at a loss. They are losing money per animal. Most of that 25 per cent. farm in what are known as less-favoured areas. It is against that background that we must consider the regulations that have been recommended for Great Britain and which will apply subsequently to Northern Ireland.

The background is also coloured by the fact that, with one exception in the past five years, there has been no increase in HLCAs. As several other hon. Members have said, there has also been a considerable reduction in the real income of farmers in recent years. Farmers' incomes in Northern Ireland have been reduced by 45 per cent. in the past two years.

Agriculture is in a serious state throughout the United Kingdom. We understand the point that the Minister was trying to make to Liberal Members earlier—a point that they would not accept—that there are budgetary restrictions in the European Community and that we have to evolve policies within those restrictions. It is all very well to say that we must help farmers to do this, that and the other, but we must operate within a parameter. Is the policy right within that parameter?

We have two agriculture organisations in Northern Ireland. One, the Northern Ireland Agricultural Producers Association, condemned the new HLCAs. Its spokesman, Mr. Bradley, described them as "nothing more than a pittance. It is disgraceful. It doesn't take any account of inflation and the fact that hill farmers are worse off today than they were five years ago . . . Farm incomes have fallen by 45 per cent."

The larger of the two organisations is the Ulster Farmers Union. It welcomed the increases for cows and sheep, but it expressed some reservations.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the smooth ministerial statement today disguised the pain and suffering that will come soon to farming families who have already experienced lower incomes from livestock sales? Now, because of financial limits, our efficient livestock farmers will have lower incomes disguised as an increase.

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point. When the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland tried to sell the increased HLCA payments, he said that they would mean an extra £2·7 million for the farmers of Northern Ireland. He ignored the financial limit per hectare. There might not actually be a £2·7 million benefit to Northern Ireland. The hon. Member for Antrim, East (Mr. Beggs) was right to emphasise that point.

The Ulster Farmers Union stated that it is "extremely concerned that the United Kingdom Government has not increased the Financial Limit per hectare in either the old or new less favoured areas. This will probably pose a problem for smaller farmers with intensive stocking rates."

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: That is the point.

Mr. Taylor: I am glad that Tory Members agree with me.

I am not sure whether the Minister is speaking only for Great Britain tonight or for the United Kingdom as a whole, but I want to ask several questions that apply to the United Kingdom. The Minister's presentation of the deplorable delay in the introduction of the increases in HLCAs was a little too smooth. We should had have them towards the end of last year, but we are getting them three months later. We must have a thorough explanation tonight because farmers are not satisfied with what they have heard and with the reasons that have been given for the delay. Is the delay due to the Government's ineptitude, or is it entirely the responsibility of the European Community? We need a firm answer. Farmers are losing money. Some 25 per cent. of them are running their farms at a loss, and the delay in the announcement of HLCAs is deplorable.

How quickly will the payments be released to our applicants in Northern Ireland? Will it be done in a matter of days or weeks? As there has been such a delay, we want a special effort to be made to ensure that payments are released as quickly as possible to try to aid the cash flow in hill areas in Northern Ireland and in less-favoured areas.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): My concern is obviously about Scotland, but my colleagues in Plaid Cymru have expressed their great worry about problems in Wales. Hon. Members have heard tonight that there are common problems throughout every part of hill and uplands agriculture. That industry is crying out for Government action. I hope that we shall hear more than we have heard tonight if matters are to be handled properly for that important sector of the economy.

I hope that the Government realise how imperative it is to get money into the hills and upland areas. Farmers are now facing their lowest incomes in real terms since the second world war, at a time of high interest rates and rising costs. The result is that record numbers of people are leaving the industry. Nowhere are the problems more evident than in the livestock sector, which is being hit hardest. Farmers in the hills and uplands have no alternative but to produce livestock.

Given the importance of that sector in terms of employment, the economy and its role in rural communities, why is there no commitment to those areas and why is there no support? I am concerned that, because of the state of the industry, we may be about to see modern-day clearances of the hills and upland areas of Scotland and elsewhere in the United Kingdom. We must add to those problems the shadow of the general agreement on tariffs and trade and the common agricultural policy proposals. The industry is in trouble, and it is looking for support and action, but it has seen no sign of them from the Government.

Instead of a clear policy, through no fault of their own, our farmers get high interest rates to suit the overheated economy of southern England. Instead of getting assistance, they find that they are hit with falling incomes and rising costs. The allowances are welcome, but they are inadequate to meet the needs of the industry if we want that industry to remain and thrive in rural communities. Hill and upland farmers are crucial to the survival of Scotland's rural communities. They are entitled to ask what future and what commitment the Government see for them. There has been precious little so far.

Why have the HLCAs been delayed yet again? The industry is crying out for income to tide it over its current massive cash flow problems. The Government are perfectly willing to spend massive amounts on weapons of war or on sweeteners for privatisation and all the other items that they consider a priority. It is time that they considered hill and upland farmers and agriculture to be a priority. Much smaller amounts could then bring about massive rewards for the country in terms of food production and a saving in imports and thereby ensure the future of rural communities. Why has the staggered delay been allowed?

I have asked the Minister when payments would be made, and he said that he expected that 55 per cent., of payments would be made by the end of March in England and Wales—that is, if I heard him correctly. He is saying that nearly half the payments will not be made for more than one month. That is totally unacceptable, given the cash flow difficulties facing the industry.

The Minister said that part of the problem was that the farmers had not submitted the forms, but he admitted that the processing figures showed that there was a major difficulty in the Ministry's bureaucracy. He said that, as at 22 February, only 41 per cent. of the forms received in one region had been processed. By definition, therefore, 59 per cent. had not been processed. In two other English regions, 73 per cent. and 77 per cent. respectively had not been processed. In the light of the bureaucratic problem, can the hon. Gentleman guarantee that the payments will be made as soon as possible? A delay until the end of March is too long, given the cash flow problems facing the industry.

Because of the cash flow problems in the industry, I am worried about how far the HLCAs will stretch. Problems are linked. As the Minister is aware, knackeries are closing. Hill and upland farmers in many areas are faced with the problem of getting rid of dead or fallen stock when there is no local knackery to which to send the animals. The extra costs will be borne by the industry. What are the Government doing to assist it?

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: What about transport?

Mr. Welsh: Indeed. Yet another problem is offloaded on to the industry, but there is no sign of any Government action or any acknowledgment of the problem. The United Kingdom is in the minority of European countries in not providing some form of government assistance. It is a matter of priorities. If the Government consider that agriculture, especially the hill and upland sectors, is a priority, the industry could be given a shot in the arm and the future of the industry and the rural communities that it serves could be secured with expenditure of a relatively small amount.

My plea is that the Government should get cash to the hills and uplands as fast as possible. The livestock industry is in trouble and deserves urgent action.

11.31 pm

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): Although I represent Cannock Chase in the heart of the midlands, which rises to an elevation of 800 ft, I do not claim today to speak on behalf of a constituency interest. I hope that the House will allow me this indulgence. As I come from a borders farming family and am the grandson of a borders farmer, over the past eight years I have had my ear bent by my family——

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: And by a close neighbour.

Mr. Howarth: Yes. It therefore did not seem inappropriate to raise these points. The Douglases have been the longest-serving tenants on the Duke of Roxburgh estate—I think that the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) knows only too well what I mean—going back beyond 1700. When I go to the borders, I feel a sense of participating in a long and honourable tradition.

[Mr. Howarth]

As we all know, whatever constituency we represent, farmers have been having a tough time in recent years. Over the decades, they have been urged by us all, and particularly their political masters, to produce ever more food, to invest, to mechanise and to become more efficient, and they have done so with considerable effect. My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) told us where the problem lies—not with the efficiency of the United Kingdom agricultural community but with our continental partners' desire to subsidise inefficient farming practices on the continent. I am sure that we all agree.

I requested my uncle's views and, writing to me shortly before Christmas, he said:

"Since 50 years ago we have been begged, pressed and, sometimes, forced to increase production and I suggest that no industry has done just that any better. We were also encouraged to borrow vast sums of money to enable us to do that, and many of us have done so. Suddenly about four years ago the country and Western Europe wakened up to the fact that most of what we'd been pressed to produce was not over-produced, with the result that we've been faced with colossal drops in prices, coupled with payments for interest on borrowed money at rates of interest far in excess of anything that could be foreseen when the money was borrowed."

My uncle adds that his Member of Parliament, the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), will be able to substantiate what he has written. I know that the hon. Gentleman will not be participating in the debate, but I am sure that he will acknowledge what my uncle wrote.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Does my hon. Friend agree that the British farmer has contributed to the surpluses to an extremely limited extent? Farmers in other countries in the Community have created the surpluses.

Mr. Howarth: I think that my hon. Friend is right, but I do not claim to be an expert on these matters.

It is to the Government's credit that they have sought to tackle the problem of excess production while representing to the best possible extent the interests of the British farmer. It has not been easy to combine those tasks.

We know that prices to farmers have fallen dramatically, while their costs have increased relentlessly. At the same time, farmers have become more efficient. The example of my own family is that, in 1928, two farms employed 10 people but today they employ only three. It is the farmer who undertakes most of the work on the farms. No one can accuse farmers of having been inefficient.

I am sure that the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire will be aware that average stock prices at Hawick auction show that between 1989 and 1990 the price of black-faced warranted ewes fell by no less than £5—a 20 per cent. fall in one year. The price last year was lower than it was in 1984. That shows the difficulties that the farming community has been facing.

Difficulties have arisen because farmers have switched to lamb from beef. My hon. Friend the Minister knows only too well that beef has been more difficult to sell than lamb in the recent past, although I eat beef—and British beef to boot—and I understand that we in the midlands are eating beef once again.

I say to the House what I have said to my family face to face—that, when manufacturers find that there is no market for their products, they also find that there is no intervention fund to buy their surplus products. The result is that they go out of business. I am not suggesting that farmers should go out of business, but farmers are not alone in experiencing difficulties.

I understand that the rate for hill ewes has increased much more than that for upland ewes. I am told that upland ewes demand rather more tending than hill ewes. I shall be most grateful if my hon. Friend the Minister will respond to that observation.

There is a strong case for incentives to keep hill farmers on the hills. Farmers are best conservators in Britain, and rural communities add enormously to our heritage. Future generations will not forgive us if we allow ourselves to be steamrollered by inefficient continental farmers into operating a regime in the United Kingdom which has the effect of destroying important rural communities and the contribution that they have to make to our national life.

Mr. John Home Robertston (East Lothian): That was a speech from an hon. Member who expects to have to return to the hills after the next general election. I, too, have the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) as my Member of Parliament. We all have crosses to bear in this life, and he is mine.

Before I go any further, I should perhaps declare an interest in a hill farm in the Lammermuirs. I also represent several hill farmers in the Lammermuir hills. I confirm what has been said by members of all parties who have taken part in the debate. Beyond any shadow of doubt, there is a crisis in the economy of the hill and upland areas throughout the United Kingdom

Mr. Alex Carlile: The hon. Gentleman should declare his interest.

Mr. Home Robertson: I have declared an interest. I am glad that the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) has caught my attention. I was fascinated when he suggested that the Liberal Democrats would extend hill livestock compensatory allowances to Huntingdonshire. I am not sure whether he knows what is the highest point in Huntingdonshire, but if his party thinks that it will win Huntingdonshire by promising hill livestock compensatory allowances to its farmers, they have problems. Perhaps the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery should contain himself just now.

There is a crisis in the economy of the hills and uplands. The Minister stands accused of a con trick. The Government say that they are increasing the allowances but, as the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) made abundantly clear, they are taking the money away with the other hand by applying the stocking rate restrictions. To make things worse, there has been a significant delay in making the payments. Delay in making payments to an industry which is facing such severe problems is bad news. It is a heavily indebted industry, and interest rates are high.

I wonder what proportion of the money will go straight to the banks when it is eventually paid. So many of the hill farmers are heavily indebted, and they will simply use the money to reduce their overdrafts. My hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) referred to the special problem in the Ribble valley area. Perhaps one way of overcoming the problem of the delay would be for the English National Farmers Union to bring forward its annual general meeting and compel the Minister of Agriculture to come along and make his statement a little earlier. Perhaps farmers would get their money a little sooner. I offer that merely as a suggestion.

The allowances are just another chapter in a shameful history of neglect of rural Britain by the Government. As my hon. Friend the Member for Durham, North-West (Ms. Armstrong) said, rural communities throughout the United Kingdom are being affected. The Government's neglect of the industry is shameful. Every time that I take part in an agriculture debate, I remind the House and the farming industry that many farmers say that they always do better under a Labour Government. That has been true, and it will be true again shortly.

11.42 pm

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): I wish to make only a few points and to respond to the points made by the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) about stocking rates and the capping of the total amount of HLCA available at £62·48 and the other figures that he mentioned. There is no doubt that, in one sense, the Minister has misled us here this evening. He said that the amount had been fixed for environmental reasons, and that keeping the figure down would have a good environmental impact. The problem is that farmers are not being given an environmental payment in order to make up for that level of capping.

If the Minister is not prepared to increase the amount to the maximum of £77, he should compensate farmers for the difference between the two amounts, which by my arithmetic would be £15 per hectare, to conserve the environment. The Minister cannot have it both ways: by not allowing the £15 per hectare, he is creating an immense social problem in the uplands. My constituency is more akin to a continent than a constituency. It is 92 miles long. We have 16 ewes for every person in the constituency. We depend very much on our hill livestock compensatory payments. Yet farmers are being capped and are not being compensated for looking after the environment.

As we know, the upland farmers are the best conservationists in the country. The single sons of hill farmers in my constituency can no longer survive on the meagre pittance being provided. The recent figures from Aberystwyth in the farm management survey show that Welsh upland farms of 175 acres or less have an income of £2,000 a year, and farms of 175-plus acres have £4,000 a year. No one can live on such incomes. That is equal to a crisis.

The crisis is compounded by the fact that, in Wales in the last two years, farm incomes have dropped by 41 per cent.; they have nearly halved. The Secretary of State for Wales said in the Welsh Grand Committee last week that HLCAs amounted to £37 million. The drop of 41 per cent. in incomes equals £32 million. We are on the road to nowhere. We are on the road to depopulation, back to the 1920s and 1930s, with no young people left in the upland areas.

The Government must have a coherent policy. Of course we need to stay within the EC budget, but that is not the point. We need major reforms. We may have to scrap intervention and bring back deficiency payments to get the product on to the market, so that the consumer can buy it at a reduced price. We have to do something about half the budget that does not get to farmers. We must put more of that money back into farmers' pockets.

Mr. Curry: Much passion has been raised in the debate. I understand that. I represent hill farmers myself and I share the concerns of Opposition Members and of my hon. Friends. None of us, I hope, will compete in our concern for upland farmers, both in their role as producers and in their role as guardians of the countryside. The difference is that we have responsibility for government. We also have to act within a budget. There is no way out of that; we cannot escape from it. The budget is laid down in the Community, and the House, in general terms, subscribes to it. We cannot get away from it by saying that we will pretend that disciplines do not exist. The Liberal Democrats want to keep multiplying the expenditure. Everything they said in the debate would result in a multiplication of agriculture expenditure.

The hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) said that the increase is inadequate. Everybody would like more, but we have to allocate the resources. In the early years to which he referred, the market delivered a reasonable livelihood because it was a time of rapid expansion, particularly in exports. Prices were buoyant. The point of the scheme is to compensate for the disadvantaged character of the neighbourhood. It is not designed specifically as a mechanism to compensate for shortfalls in the marketplace. It is different from a price support mechanism, which means that we have spent a fortune intervening on beef.

The hon. Gentleman knows why there has been a delay. We could not send the forms out earlier because we could not give the instructions and the guidance to go with them until we sorted out the problem about how the scheme would apply. I regret that. It was a nuisance. It has been a pain for everybody, but we had to face that difficulty. The hon. Gentleman was right to say that my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) paid advances. It was not a happy experience. One reason that we are not doing it again is that it was such a difficult experience. It took so long to complete the payments that some farmers were longer getting the total payment than they would have been if we had not paid advances.

I am intrigued by the hon. Gentleman's encounter with Mr. Dinsdale. When I am in that part of the world tomorrow, I shall try to find Mr. Dinsdale, because I am anxious to hear from him a more precise account of the conversation than the hon. Member for South Shields was willing to give. I want to know whether the hon. Gentleman told Mr. Dinsdale that he would pay more on the HLCAs as they stand. That is the question before us. Would he pay more as they stand—or was he going to present Mr. Dinsdale with a marvellous bran tub of environmental measures and invite him to plunge in his arm, the idea being that every farmer would come out with a prize labelled as an environmental payment?

It is easy to say that we should pay farmers to look after the environment. In my constituency and that of many hon. Members, it is difficult to see what else farmers could do in terms of good husbandry. We have already said that farmers look after the environment. If we were to pay farmers for what they are already doing, we should need to define that payment precisely in terms of its budget and its objectives. We shall undertake that process, but it is no policy simply to say, "We shall not tell you whether you will get any more under existing policies; we shall invent something else that may or may not serve as a pretext to pay more."

My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) made a characteristic speech, and challenged me to give the full facts. To avoid being so accused again, let me make it absolutely clear that we have not increased the maximum amount payable per hectare—it is set at £62·48 in the severely disadvantaged areas and at £46·86 in the disadvantaged areas. We have held payments at those levels because, if we have limited resources, we choose not to give them to farmers stocking at the highest densities. I acknowledge that some farmers will not receive any increased payment. We will give resources to those who do not stock at the highest densities. That will increase commensurately the headage payments available to those farmers.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) must make up his mind about whether the Liberal Democrats will live within the budgetary framework of the Community.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Of course.

Mr. Curry: Well, the hon. and learned Gentleman did not answer that question. He said that his party would invent all sorts of super new policies. Here and now the budget has overrun and we are faced with proposals from Mr. MacSharry which we must tackle. On Monday, we must start to debate those proposals. I want to know whether we have the support of the Liberal Democrats for the budgetary guideline we issued. The majority of the House applauded that guideline. Those who did not said that it was inadequate. We had to bring agriculture expenditure under some sort of control——

Mr. Wallace: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Curry: No, I gave way generously before.

We are all agreed that we had to have some type of budgetary discipline, but now it comes to the test are we to say, "Well, let's not bother for the moment"?

Mr. Wallace rose——

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman has had his say. I deliberately limited my remarks to allow as many hon. Members as possible to speak.

Mr. Wallace: The Minister is afraid to give way.

Mr. Curry: Certainly not, but I shall not be goaded. The hon. Gentleman can sit and make gestures to his heart's content, but he will not influence me.

The Liberal Democrats have not answered the question about what they would do about the budgetary restraints which, whether we like them or not, exist.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) mentioned some of the fundamental problems—the current surplus, the need to change the common agricultural policy and the MacSharry proposals. I deliberately refrained from embarking on those proposals as they are not the subject of the debate and we all had our say on them some time ago. If pressed, however, I can tell the House that our position on them has not changed. We do not find them acceptable, particularly as they do not take us towards the marketplace. Rather, they do the opposite. I do not believe that farmers want to be taken on a magical mystery tour that takes them further and further away from that marketplace. That is not the answer to the agriculture crisis.

We already have a surplus, which is hanging over the market. Many Opposition Members are willing to say how much agriculture policy costs the average family per week or per month. They claim that we must bring it under control, but at the same time they say that more money should be directed at farmers. One must make up one's mind what one wants in this world. We cannot have it both ways. We must tackle the problem.

Hon. Members want to know why the Government do not pay the maximum allowance permitted under the Community regulations. The answer is simple—money. If we were to pay at the maximum, we estimate that that would be equivalent to an extra £60 million of public expenditure. We do not believe that it would be justifiable to pay that in present circumstances. If the hon. Member for South Shields is saying that he would pay it, I am interested to clock up the expenditure to which he will commit his party. I am willing to add that to my running count of the pledges that have been made by at least half the members of the Labour party and give the information to the other Labour party members who say that they will exercise restraint in budgetary matters when their party comes to power, in that unlikely event.

I can answer precisely one question asked by the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor). In Northern Ireland it is hoped and intended that 85 per cent. will be paid by the end of April. That is the target figure for Northern Ireland and the Department officials are geared up to do that. We must not forget that there are 65,000 claimants and that there is much work to do. We must undertake the process properly. We cannot simply act and hope, afterwards, that we got it right because the possibilities for fraud and inaccuracy are too great.

We support farmers. We have shown that we support farmers. We have introduced a raft of measures in favour of farmers. The Government will not stand accused of failing them. The farmers do not believe that, and I commend the regulations to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Hill Livestock (Compensatory Allowances) (Amendment) Regulations 1991, which were laid before this House on 13th February, be approved.

Oldchurch Hospital, Romford

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dorrell.]

11.55 pm

Sir Michael Neubert (Romford): I have the great good fortune to raise for debate tonight the subject of Oldchurch hospital in my constituency. At a meeting of the Barking, Havering and Brentwood health authority tomorrow, a decision will be taken that could be critical for the hospital's future. The authority has proposed that, in the longer term, our district should be served by one general hospital on a single site at Harold Wood in the neighbouring constituency of Upminster. To his credit, my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor), who unfortunately cannot be here tonight, is as opposed to the proposal as am I and my other Havering colleague, my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) who, within the short time allowed, and subject to catching your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, will contribute later.

The hon. Members for Barking (Ms. Richardson) and for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) are also very much opposed to the proposal, because large numbers of their constituents look to Oldchurch hospital for their medical treatment. Of the six hon. Members who represent the district, only my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Sir R. McCrindle) is other than categorical in his condemnation of the proposal. The majority of his constituents live closer to Harold Wood than to Oldchurch hospital.

It could be said that the proposal has few friends. During the consultation period, which expired at the end of January, the community health council, the London boroughs of Havering and of Barking and Dagenham, trade unions, doctors, patients, other organisations and members of the public have been loud in their disapproval.

The purpose of tonight's short debate is twofold: first, to bring home to the Minister, whose presence at this late hour is much appreciated, the strong feelings of people in the district on the proposal; secondly, to take a last opportunity, at the eleventh hour, to ensure that the health authority's decision tomorrow reflects the widespread opposition to the proposal. It would make a mockery of consultation were such a universal thumbs-down to be disregarded.

The reasons for the hostility of the public to the proposal are relatively straightforward. The Barking, Havering and Brentwood district is one of the largest in the country; from memory, I believe that it is the largest in London. It serves a population of 453,000 people. The Barking and Dagenham end of that district has an above average incidence of illness and a degree of social deprivation. In general terms, the population there has a high morbidity and a low mobility.

The combination of those two factors makes the prospect of people there having to go another four or five miles for hospital treatment unacceptable to them and to many others. Such a distance may seem insignificant to people who live in country areas, but in highly populated urban areas it surely makes sense to provide services that are as close as possible to the people. That certainly holds true when the densest population coincides with the greatest need.

In seeking the retention of Oldchurch hospital, I am not speaking only for my constituents. However, I strongly believe that services should be local. Excellence is not the only criterion; convenience and accessibility are also important, and the right balance must be struck. Contrived formulas and artificial weightings have been devised to lead to the conclusion that there should be only one general hospital on a single site in our district. That is being challenged by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) and me.

The North East Thames regional health authority intends by strategic decision to approve a new district general hospital just across the western boundary in the neighbouring district of Goodmayes. That seems to pre-empt the opinion of people in our area about the provision of local hospital services. That opinion can broadly be summed up by saying that they would like to retain Harold Wood and Oldchurch hospital.

Oldchurch hospital is a Victorian workhouse-type hospital, but it provides a wide range of services, including regional specialties, to my constituents and to many other people in the area. It has attracted dedicated, high-calibre specialists who have been able to benefit from the interdisciplinary contacts that are established at Oldchurch. Despite being under constant threat from two quarters, they have engaged in many innovative and imaginative ventures. It is surprising that the success and popularity of the hospital should be so consistently challenged.

The first threat is from the London teaching hospitals, which resent the pretensions of Oldchurch hospital and would like to have its patients to boost their depopulated clinics. The second threat is from regional administrators, who cannot accept what they see as inadequate buildings and a cramped location but would prefer a brand new extension development to modern standards on a green field site. However, that would be at the expense of convenience and accessibility. In spite of those threats, Oldchurch hospital has prospered.

As it is just past midnight, I can announce that it is 17 years ago today that I entered the House. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] It is ironic that much of my time here has been spent in fighting threats to this much-loved institution in my constituency. There have been two proposals to close the neurosurgical unit, and two proposals to close the radiotherapy unit. On each occasion, a campaign was mounted to save the units. Now it is proposed that the whole hospital be closed, and that is a matter for regret.

I have received very few complaints about the treatment of patients at Oldchurch or about the standards of medical treatment or nursing. On the contrary, the vast majority of the complaints that I receive concern the fact that people cannot get an appointment or treatment soon enough. One imagines that that situation would not be improved by the closure of the hospital. Our case is that the hospital should certainly be allowed to continue its present service to the people of the area.

It is astonishing that, despite all the threats, the hospital's spirit is undiminished, and its confidence in its own future unflagging. Oldchurch has expressed an interest in achieving the status of a self-governing trust, and the Secretary of State has given approval for the further preparation of its plans. We must hope that the future will lie in that direction. In the meantime, we face the proposal that the hospital be closed, and the services provided on a single site elsewhere. As I have explained, that is not acceptable, either to the majority of Members of this House or to the majority of people in my area.

[Sir Michael Neubert]

Our hope must be that the authority that runs hospital services in the area will take account of those views before making any decision. What the people in my constituency want is treatment of a good standard—not necessarily the very best—provided within a reasonable distance of their homes. Oldchurch hospital has provided such treatment in the past, and continues to do so, and any proposal that it should not be allowed to do so in the future will be vigorously and rightly resisted.

12.6 am

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): As in the past, my hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Sir M. Neubert) has presented a sterling and forthright case in defence of Oldchurch hospital. I know he will agree that it is sad that this is not the first time we have had to defend that excellent hospital, which so many local people support in the most practical way possible—by going there for operations and medical treatment. It seems to me that that is the single most telling and lasting tribute to the hospital. It is sad that, whatever the structure of the health service, we have from time to time to put to Ministers points in defence of the hospital.

My hon. Friend sketched the background very well, and I do not want to be repetitious. However, I should like, in the short time available, to stress the breadth of opposition to this proposal. I shall do so in no particular order. Let me kick off with extracts from a letter from Mr. MacLellan, a senior consultant orthopaedic surgeon at Oldchurch hospital, to the services planning manager of the health authority. I think that the extracts, short though they are, will give the flavour. Mr. MacLellan says:

"The comments that you have made confirm in my mind the clearly held impression that the statistics prepared in your document 'A Blueprint for Better Health Care' are an attempt to give scientific or pseudo-scientific validation for a completely bogus exercise in health care planning.

No objective data has been collected about mortality or morbidity related to the clinical services in Harold Wood or Oldchurch . . .

While there were representatives of both acute units at the meetings that gave rise to this document, these representatives were not briefed by individual departments within either hospital to speak on their behalf. No representatives of the trauma and orthopaedic service at Oldchurch were present, and since we carry the bulk of the trauma workload for the district it seems extraordinary that you believe yourself to be in any position to make judgments about quality of service at our site as compared with any of the other sites."

As that was written by a consultant at the hospital, it might be said to be predictable. As has been said in other contexts over the years, "He would say that, wouldn't he?" Nonetheless, it is worth recording.

I turn now the Barking and Havering family health service authority, which has taken the trouble to submit its own formal comments, such is its concern at the nature of the document. Again, my hon. Friend the Minister will be pleased to know that I intend to be brief. It states:

"No analysis of the need for secondary care services is provided. The document gives the appearance of a provider not needs led plan, concentrating reasons for change as it does on buildings and management problems. A needs based analysis might have significantly influenced the weighting in favour of a more accessible site in the district. The document did not include an analysis of the impact of the proposals on primary and community care. It is the FHSA opinion that these will be substantial."

Under the heading "Conclusion", the document states:

"The document does not provide information on developments in community support services that will be essential if the services are centralised irrespective of the site. A substantial development is needed to support the existing services. The FHSA is concerned by the lack of analysis of the impact on primary health care services. The planning of a new hospital provides major opportunities to consider the best mix of services that are needed to ensure optimum health of the population."

As it rightly says:

"This cannot be done by looking at the hospital services alone."

What we have is an isolated discussion document looking purely at the physical structures, without looking at the way in which health should logically develop over the next 10 years. It is worth highlighting the fact that both the major local authorities in the area—the London borough of Barking and Dagenham and the London borough of Havering—have produced documents setting out precisely why the document is a bad one. In particular, Havering stresses that, for many people in Havering, let alone in Barking and Dagenham, to site a hospital at Harold Wood at the eastern end of the district health authority can only provide major problems for many of the patients who would need to get there.

Word has reached me during the past couple of days of concern at Oldchurch hospital that there is to be a review by the district health authority of the acute units, and that a possible management restructuring is in the air which, if it proceeds—no consultation is required for that—would produce one overall unit amid great fears that Oldchurch and Rush Green hospitals would be run down, presumably for the general benefit of Harold Wood. That is not the way to proceed.

I ask the Minister not only to deal with our initial fears, but to consider carefully whether a telephone call tomorrow morning to the district health authority, to tell it to desist from this unnecessary, irrelevant and expensive exercise, would not save a considerable sum of money for the health authority.

12.12 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): My hon. Friends the Members for Romford (Sir M. Neubert) and for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) are to be congratulated on raising this subject this evening on behalf of their constituents, and on delivering to the House a clear message that no one reading this debate could have any reason to misunderstand. It is no more than I would have expected from my hon. Friends, both of whom have been colleagues for a long time and co-campaigners in various campaigns.

My hon. Friend the Member for Romford was a senior, experienced and distinguished Whip when I first joined the Whips Office three and a half years ago. He used to have a notice by his desk which said, "This year Romford, next year the world," or words to that effect. This evening, he has given the House a demonstration of the effectiveness of his thinking on behalf of his constituents and of his campaign over 17 years to ensure that the importance of Oldchurch hospital in the health care of his constituents is understood by those who need to know.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the subject today, because not only has that allowed him to celebrate his 17 years in Parliament by continuing to campaign on behalf of his constituents; it has also allowed him to ensure that the members of the health authority go to their meeting tomorrow with his words and those of our hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch ringing in their ears.

They thought that the consultation process ended on 31 January, and this will come as a reminder of the views of my hon. Friends, both of whom have written to the health authority to express their views formally. Their speeches this evening should have served to dispel any remaining doubt in the minds of members of the health authority.

This evening's debate allows me to say that I am sorry that I was unable to fulfil the engagement that I had a few weeks ago in my hon. Friend's constituency, I think at the hospital. I hope that it will be possible to reinstate that. I have no doubt that if it is reinstated the message that my hon. Friends have brought to the House this evening will once again be reinforced.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch suggested that I could spend some time tomorrow morning on the telephone communicating further the messages of my hon. Friends and adding to it a message of my own that the health authority should not proceed tomorrow with the proposal that we are discussing. I hope that my hon. Friend will understand that I shall not be doing that, not because there are no circumstances in which I might find it in myself to agree with my hon. Friend but because—this is an important principle—the only good way to manage an organisation which employs a million people and absorbs £30 billion of public expenditure is through a management structure, within which we encourage management decisions to be taken as far down the line as is practicable.

We run a delegated system of management, and if that policy is to have real effect, it is important that managers are encouraged to make real decisions and to carry responsibility for them without feeling that their every decision is subject to Ministers looking over their shoulder and jogging their elbows. Therefore, I shall not be ringing the health authority tomorrow morning to communicate the message that my hon. Friends would understandably wish me to.

Nor am I in a position this evening to be able to make clear what the Government's attitude would be if in certain circumstances the proposal ended on a Minister's desk. I will explain briefly why that is. I have explained the importance that we attach to the system of delegated management: the result of that is that a decision of this nature ends up on a Minister's desk only if it has proved impossible for the different agencies within the health authority locally to reach agreement on how the proposal should proceed.

If, therefore, the health authority were to confirm its proposal to concentrate health care on the Harold Wood site, it would be for the CHC to decide whether it wished to lodge its firm opposition to that proposal. If the CHC were to take that course, the disagreement between the health authority and the CHC would go to the regional health authority for a further opinion. If the regional health authority were to support the district health authority but the CHC maintained its opposition to the united view of the regional and district authorities, the proposal would come to a Minister for a decision.

I am sure that my hon. Friends will understand that, if a Minister had to make a decision between the CHC proposal and the management proposal, he would want to do so without having a commitment given in the House hanging around his neck, making it impossible for him to approach the subject with an open mind, as he should.

I give my hon. Friends the clear undertaking that, if it proved impossible for the various agencies that I have described to reach a decision locally, I would go to considerable trouble to ensure that the responsible Minister fully understood the concerns of my hon. Friends' constituents as well as the arguments advanced by the health authority. Therefore, I am not able to describe precisely this evening how my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State would use his discretion if the proposal came before him for a decision.

I can comment on one or two of my hon. Friends' comments. My hon. Friend the Member for Romford was particularly concerned that the convenience and accessibility of health care is considered a relevant consideration and that the creation of ivory towers is not a sufficient argument by itself to support a particular policy. I give my hon. Friend an assurance that we agree. We run the health service for the benefit of its patients, not for that of its doctors—still less for the benefit of the academicians. Convenience and accessibility are important factors in deciding the pattern of health care in any locality.

My hon. Friend stressed the dangers that are attached to grandiose ambitions, as opposed to the more humdrum development of health care in a particular locality. It is one of the sins of traditional health service management that it has regarded capital as a free good. It is to address the problem of excessively grandiose schemes not firmly based in local needs that we are introducing from 1 April the principle of capital charging, which will ensure that any addition to the capital stock of a particular district is recognised to be the cost that it is, so that any authority planning to absorb more capital in the provision of health care will take account of the capital, as well as revenue cost, that it incurs from its investment decisions. I hope that will reduce the attractiveness of highly capital-intensive solutions to particular local problems.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch stressed the importance that he attaches to a firmly based local assessment of health needs in planning for the future. He quoted in support the views of the local FHSA. Again, not only do I agree, but that is one of the basic propositions on which the Government's reforms from 1 April are founded. My hon. Friends should need no reassurance from me, because the definition of local health need and the use of the contracting system to design a pattern of provision that will meet identified local health needs is written into the statute for which all three of us voted last year. Those are the criteria that management will increasingly use in their areas.

I will enter a caveat by way of balance, and stress that, as we think about the development of provision over the health service as a whole, we must acknowledge that a constant factor is the declining need for acute beds. Modern medicine allows us to treat more patients, more quickly, with fewer acute beds. Merely because traditional medicine needed 500 or 600 beds in a particular locality, that does not mean that, in the next 10 years, we shall continue to need the same level of acute bed provision. Many conditions that once required three weeks' hospital stay can now be treated either on a day case basis, or without the need for surgery or hospitalisation at all. That must be borne in mind, particularly when considering major capital investment that will commit the health service to capital costs for a generation ahead.

Another factor that makes more complex the situation in which my hon. Friends' constituents find themselves is that both Old Church and Harold Wood hospitals are preparing applications for trust status. They are expected by the end of April, and I should emphasise that nothing that is happening as a result of the consultation process launched by the district health authority can limit the discretion of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to accept either or both those applications or——

Private Borrowing

1. Mr. Wareing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what effect changes in private borrowing have had on the economy during the past five years.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. David Mellor): A number, including notably a means between 1986 and 1989 for companies to finance a 43 per cent. increase in investment—the fastest growth in investment since the war.

Mr. Wareing: Is not the Minister being rather complacent? Is not it true that net personal savings as a percentage of disposable income, which is an important barometer, have fallen from 13 per cent. in 1979 to 5 per cent. last year and that that is reflected in the outstanding consumer credit of £50 billion, much of which has been expended on manufactured goods that were imported by this country because of the inadequacy of British manufacturing industry under the Tory Government to furnish that demand?

Mr. Mellor: It is certainly true that there was a fall in the savings ratio, but we must consider the rates of inflation that prevailed in those two years. The savings ratio for first three quarters of 1990 was back to 8·8 per cent. and is on a rising trend. With regard to credit and demand, the hon. Gentleman failed to take account of the fact that household credit is overwhelmingly for mortgages. He also failed to give us credit for a crucial development: although between 1974 and 1979 consumption rose at seven times the rate of investment, between 1981 and 1989, investment rose at double the rate of consumption, therefore financing plenty more local production for demand to go into.

Mr. Budgen: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that when the savings ratio is running at about 5 per cent., it is a clear sign of an excessive boom, such as occurred between 1986 and 1988, but when it is running at 8·8 per cent., as it is now, that is a clear sign that domestic and national indicators point towards a further cut in interest rates?

Mr. Mellor: I thought for a moment that my hon. Friend was going to ask me a question with which I could wholeheartedly agree, but he spoilt the effect somewhat towards the end of his comments. He is aware of our policy and he knows that we will bring down interest rates when it is compatible with our position within the ERM band and when other circumstances permit.

Savings

2. Mr. Waller: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the success of TESSAs.

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mrs. Gillian Shephard): TESSA has got off to an excellent start. The scheme is playing an important part in restoring the habit of saving.

Mr. Waller: Does my hon. Friend agree that any improvement in the underlying savings ratio, which has been relatively low in this country, has beneficial effects on the economy? In view of the success of TESSAs, will my hon. Friend and her colleagues consider similar stimuli for this year and in the future generally?

Mrs. Shephard: My hon. Friend is right. There has been a very good improvement in the savings ratio, which is now back up to 8·8 per cent. That has been encouraged by the number of developments in savings schemes introduced by the Government. As for my hon. Friend's further request, I remind him that I can give no idea of what might be in the mind of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 19 March.

Mr. Timothy Congdon

3. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on the level of interest rates and the value of the pound from Mr. Timothy Congdon over the last few weeks.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Norman Lamont): None, Sir.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is not the leaking of information about Government policy by a Bank of England official to a bank in the City an offence and should not the use of such information by a bank become an offence under insider trading legislation?

Mr. Lamont: I should like to consider the hon. Gentleman's last point. The answer to his first point is, obviously, yes. However, I am afraid that I can give the hon. Gentleman no further answer in addition to what I have already told him in a written answer. If the hon. Gentleman has any evidence or information that he wishes to place before me or the relevant authorities, I am sure that he will do so——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am asking about the law.

Mr. Lamont: I have answered the hon. Gentleman's specific question.

Sir Peter Hordern: Why should my right hon. Friend pay any more attention to Mr. Timothy Congdon's views than to those of the 364 economists who wrote a letter to The Times in 1981 and got it wrong then?

Mr. Lamont: I hesitate to divulge it to my hon. Friend, but some of the Liverpool six are quite well known to me. I have had discussions with some of them from time to time. They may not be family friends, but I know that they are not always correct.

Mr. Beith: Has the Chancellor noticed the strange alliance between the Liverpool six, the family friends, some of his own Back-Benchers and members of the Labour party in support of the proposition that it does not matter if a substantial cut in interest rates is followed by a devaluation? Does he agree that the last thing that this country needs is a reputation for devaluing its way out of trouble and that what is really needed is an anti-inflationary policy that would provide the credibility that would make interest rate cuts possible?

Mr. Lamont: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. It is no answer to the problem of inflation or interest rates to say that we must devalue the currency to equate with our costs. The real answer is to make our costs equate with the currency and that is what we are doing.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the way in which he has absolutely refused to entertain any devaluation of the pound now that it has joined the exchange rate mechanism. Does he agree that even to entertain such a move would undermine the framework of the anti-inflationary policy that he has adopted and that, over time, it would make it more difficult to bring about the necessary reductions in interest rates than would adhering to the framework of the ERM?

Mr. Lamont: I agree entirely with my right hon. Friend. I have set out our precise policy on interest rates to the House on several occasions. I am not going to take any risks with either interest rates or inflation, which must remain the main objective of our policy. We have too high a rate of inflation vis-à-vis our European competitors and I am determined that we should get it down, and quickly. I hope that my hon. Friends will not have exaggerated ideas about interest rates that may or may not be possible.

Interest Rates

4. Mrs. Heal: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many letters he has received from small businesses about the high level of interest rates.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Maples): My right hon. Friend has received a number of such letters.

Mrs. Heal: Despite the Conservative party's claim to be the party of small businesses, in the west midlands region business failures have increased by 36 per cent. and in Mid-Staffordshire many small businesses have either failed or are struggling to survive. For them, yesterday's announcement of a 0·5 per cent. cut in interest rates is welcome, but a mere drop in the ocean. When will the Minister announce even further cuts in interest rates and end the slow torture of small business men?

Mr. Maples: Once again, a representative of the Labour party is willing to play fast and loose with devaluation and inflation——

Mr. John Smith: That is not true.

Mr. Maples: It is what the hon. Lady said.

The fact is that there is still a substantial net increase in the number of new small businesses. In 1989, 87,000 more businesses were registered for VAT than left the register and in 1990, 50,000 more businesses registered than left the register. The failure rate is under 1½ per cent., whereas for the period 1983 to 1986 it was over 1½ per cent.

Sir William Clark: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is much better to reduce the base interest rate cautiously and thus avoid a fall in sterling which might mean that the rate would have to increase again? Is not it much better to reduce interest rates cautiously so that we can sustain a permanent reduction in the base rate?

Mr. Maples: My right hon. Friend is right. The purpose of our policy is to bear down on inflation. It would be completely counter-productive to take any risks with inflation.

Mrs. Beckett: Does the Minister recognise that the complacency of his reply will be a shock to small and large businesses alike? Is he aware of not only the "Trade Indemnity" results from last year, which showed a 77 per cent. increase in business failures in 1990, but the forecast of a further 25 per cent. increase in business failures in 1991? Is not that an indictment of the Government's handling of the economy?

Mr. Maples: Of course, it is sad when any business goes out of action. I merely sought to point out that the figures were not out of line with those for the mid-1980s. I do not remember the hon. Lady or any of her hon. Friends at that time making the point that she made today. We have noticed that her party is prepared to spend, borrow and cut interest rates on a reckless scale which would play fast and loose with inflation.

Mr. John Townend: Does my hon. Friend accept that many small businesses that were created in the enterprise culture of Thatcherism are suffering considerable pain as a result of interest rates—despite the recent welcome reductions—and a loss of demand? Will he persuade the Chancellor of the Exchequer to ease the pressure in his Budget by concentrating any tax reductions on the business sector and in particular to consider making the first £5,000 of retained tax profit of a small business tax free?

Mr. Maples: I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor heard my hon. Friend's Budget representation.

Pools Betting Tax

5. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the revenue cost to date of the reduction of pools betting tax from 42·5 to 40 per cent.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The revenue cost to the end of January 1991 was £15·25 million.

Mr. McAllion: The Minister will know that the reduction in betting taxes is for a period of five years, to coincide with the time scale within which clubs must comply with the Taylor recommendations. As the Government have agreed with the football associations in Scotland that smaller and significantly less wealthy clubs in the lower divisions may have 10 years within which to comply with Taylor, will she consider extending the time scale for reducing betting taxes so that money will be available to the Football Trust to help smaller clubs beyond the current five-year cut-off period?

Mrs. Shephard: The hon. Gentleman has a considerable interest in this matter. The ability of the smaller league clubs, not only in Scotland but in England and Wales, to meet the August 1999 deadline for all-seater stadia would, of course, be considerably strengthened if my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer extended the cut in pools betting duty, as the hon. Gentleman suggests. My right hon. Friend has said that he will be prepared to take an early decision on the matter as soon as it is clear that football is contributing on a significant scale out of its own resources to the work that needs to be done. The sooner that that commitment is made, the sooner my right hon. Friend will be able to take a decision. There is some progress, but any encouragement that the hon. Gentleman could give in Scotland and elsewhere would bring forward the date of that review.

Dr. Marek: May I partly thank the Minister for her reply, which shows that not everything ahead of us is as dark as night? Will she admit that some of the third and fourth division clubs simply cannot go ahead with safety improvements to their grounds and desperately look to the Government to provide not only an incentive but a little more so that the safety of grounds can be assured? Will she assure the House that the scheme will be prolonged to ensure that every football league ground is safe by 1999?

Mrs. Shephard: The hon. Gentleman should know that the Government help that has been promised is a generous response to the Taylor report. They will provide an initial £100 million over a period of five years for capital works to make football stadia safer. I repeat to the hon. Gentleman that the game must demonstrate its commitment to match the Government's response before my right hon. Friend can review the position.

Share Ownership

6. Mr. Gregory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on his policy on promoting share ownership.

Mr. Maples: The Government are committed to achieving wider and deeper share ownership. Very significant progress has been made thanks to the success of Government initiatives.

Mr. Gregory: Does my hon. Friend agree that wider share ownership schemes have resulted in an increase in the number of share owners from 3 million in 1979, under Labour, to 11 million currently, and will he confirm that he wishes to extend that still further? Will he consider the possibility of companies being able to extend the range so that employees can participate as they have in Yorkshire in British Telecom, British Airways, Northern Electricity and other such companies?

Mr. Maples: My hon. Friend is a long-time proponent of wider share ownership and his figures are right. The number of individual shareholders in Britain has risen from 7 per cent. 12 years ago to nearly a quarter—some 24 per cent.—of the population now. The Government have introduced a variety of employee share ownership schemes as a result of which about 2¼ million employees have benefited from about £6½ billion worth of shares and options over that period. But we shall certainly look at those schemes to see whether there are any ways of improving them.

Mr. Cryer: Is not the best form of share ownership for the nation as a whole to own a service instead of selling it off to a clique of friends of the Tory party, many of whom have contributed to Tory party funds? Is not the Minister ashamed of the way in which, for example, water services owned by the nation have been sold off, have increased their prices and, like other sold-off services, have produced a shoddier service for the people?

Mr. Maples: There we have the true voice of the Labour party. Only three days ago the Leader of the Opposition and the shadow Secretary of State for Trade and Industry made speeches trying to camouflage the sort of sentiment that the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) has just expressed and trying to pretend that their industrial policy had been dragged into the 21st century. We find that yet again they are in favour of nationalisation, with industries to be run by unions and subsidised by the taxpayer.

Mr. Colvin: Does my hon. Friend recall that in the 1974 Labour party manifesto, Labour pledged to bring about a fundamental shift of wealth in favour of working people and their families? Is not it a fact——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is about share ownership.

Mr. Colvin: Does my hon. Friend agree that Conservative policies encouraging wider share ownership and home ownership have honoured that pledge?

Mr. Maples: My hon. Friend is right. We believe that if people own their own homes and have stakes in the companies in which they work, they have the sort of interest in the success of the economy that we want them to have and from which they will benefit.

Growth

7. Mr. Radice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest OECD forecasts for growth in the United Kingdom and Germany in 1991.

Mr. Mellor: The OECD, in its December "Economic Outlook", forecasts GDP growth of 0·7 per cent. for the United Kingdom and GNP growth of 3·0 per cent. for West Germany. No figures are available for the united Germany.

Mr. Radice: Does the Minister agree that those official OECD figures, which probably underestimate the fall in British output, show clearly that the British problem is home grown and is caused by two years or more of very high interest rates?

Mr. Mellor: I appreciate the seductive quality of that argument for the hon. Gentleman, but, unfortunately, it is not true. A number of countries—the United States, Canada, Australia and Sweden—are in recession and in France GDP fell in the last quarter. So the hon. Gentleman is not paddling the right canoe.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that Germany's one advantage is that it has a population who believe in low inflation and that when wage demands are made by trade unions, they talk about paying for increases by greater productivity? Does he further agree that if we could follow their example—keeping inflation low and having wage demands met by productivity—we, too, could achieve continued growth without high inflation?

Mr. Mellor: My hon. Friend is right. Indeed, we have proved it to be so. Between 1980 and 1990, the United Kingdom economy, by learning those lessons, grew faster than that of West Germany, whereas when the Labour party was in power we were bottom of the European growth league.

Mr. John Smith: Can the Chief Secretary explain why, after 11 years of Conservative rule, the United Kingdom is the only country in the European Community to be in recession by having a fall in GDP for two quarters and is the only country in the EC to be cutting investment in the manufacturing sector?

Mr. Mellor: The right hon. and learned Gentleman knows that there have been falls in productivity, output and production in a number of European countries. He also knows that the 1980s was a decade of unparalleled success for the United Kingdom economy. With the greatest respect to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, he could not have said that about the previous decade when he was a Cabinet Minister.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that one year's forecast is not a totally accurate guide to the health of an economy, but that a decade is a much better guide to the success of economic policies? In the 1980s our economy thrived, unlike many in the European Community.

Mr. Mellor: That is exactly right. We were at or near the top of most of the economic indicator leagues in the Community, whereas under the Labour Government our economy was at the bottom of those leagues. The Opposition keep on talking the British economy down, but we have confidence in it.

Inflation

8. Mr. Bell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his forecast for the rate of inflation for October 1991.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The autumn statement forecast is for a sharp fall in all-items RPI inflation to 5½ per cent. by the fourth quarter of this year. I will publish a new forecast with the Budget.

Mr. Bell: I thank the Chancellor of the Exchequer for that forecast. The Chief Secretary to the Treasury spoke about the "unparalleled success" of the economy. Does the Chancellor recall a statement by the Prime Minister on 24 April 1988 that what was unique about the recovery in the 1980s was that there was sustained growth without the resurgence of inflation? At the time of that statement inflation was 3·9 per cent. Now there are record house repossessions, record business failures and record unemployment. Who will take the blame for this sad and sorry situation—the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Prime Minister?

Mr. Lamont: Like the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), the hon. Gentleman ignores all the good things that happened in the 1980s and focuses on one statement in one year. He ignores the fact that throughout the 1980s employment in the United Kingdom grew faster than in most other European countries and that we had lower unemployment than in Europe. He also ignores the fact that in the 1980s output in Britain was higher than that in France or Germany and that business investment grew faster than in any of the G7 countries except Japan. Those factors show that the 1980s were years of considerable economic achievement.

Mr. Burns: Will my right hon. Friend contrast that forecast with an annual rate of inflation in August 1975 of 26·9 per cent? May I take it that as inflation continues to fall and when it is economically prudent interest rates will continue to fall, too?

Mr. Lamont: As I have already emphasised, we can cut interest rates only as and when it is prudent to do so. My hon. Friend is right on his first point. The speeches by the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East, (Mr. Smith), if they are anything to go by, and his public spending plans and attitude to interest rates in 1987 and 1988 show all too clearly that Labour would again spark off a great inflationary cycle.

Mr. John D. Taylor: It is encouraging to hear the Chancellor of the Exchequer suggest that the inflation rate will fall to 5·5 per cent. in October. Is that an appropriate rate of inflation for a general election?

Mr. Lamont: Fortunately, that is not within my departmental responsibility. I repeated the forecast contained in the previous autumn statement and I said that another forecast would be issued at the time of the Budget.

Mr. Simon Coombs: Does my right hon. Friend agree that Labour policies would be likely to drive inflation up to the levels mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns)? Will he confirm that it remains Government policy to achieve long-term zero inflation?

Mr. Lamont: It does not look as though France, Germany or Japan are about to achieve zero inflation. Our first objective must be a sharp reduction in inflation to bring it down to the level of that of our competitors. We are absolutely on track to do that and will not be blown off course in our objective.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Two of the major factors in stoking up inflation in recent months have been public utility price rises in the run-up to privatisation and its aftermath and, of course, the poll tax. I do not know whether Finance Ministers ever get nicknames such as Stormin' Norman, in the same way as military leaders do, but it would be nice if the Chancellor would tell us his plans to bear down on those two elements of inflation.

Mr. Lamont: The Government's intentions on the community charge, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment said, will be announced to the House in due course.

I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman's first point. Utility prices in recent years have underperformed inflation in many spheres. The real causes and origins of our inflation go back to 1987-88 when, with hindsight, our interest rates were too low.

Interest Rates

10. Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current bank base rate.

13. Mr. Ashton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the present level of interest rates.

Mr. Maples: Bank base rates are 13 per cent.

Mrs. Hicks: Surely an encouraging combination of good news for business in the west midlands is the reduction in interest rates yesterday and the Gulf victory today. However, in defence of businesses in my constituency, does my hon. Friend agree that we still have a long way to go and that businesses need, above all, to plan for stability, confident in the knowledge that there will be further interest rate cuts as soon as possible and that we shall, in the process, conquer inflation?

Mr. Maples: I hear what my hon. Friend says. In the mid-1980s, investment by those businesses grew at a record rate, and the growth in the economy that resulted could not be sustained. I am afraid that one of the unfortunate facts of life is that those moves must be followed by a slow-down and it is necessary to keep interest rates high in order to bear down on inflation. We shall continue to pursue interest rate policies that are consistent with maintaining our position in the ERM.

Mr. Leighton: Did not the high interest rates show what a blunder it was to have joined the exchange rate mechanism, because interest rates can now no longer respond to the obvious needs of the domestic economy but must be used to prop up an uncompetitive and overvalued exchange rate, which will push the country further into recession and cause, in the coming months, an explosion of unemployment?

Mr. Maples: I sometimes wonder whether Opposition Members write such questions weeks in advance of Question Time. We have been able to reduce interest rates by 2 per cent. since we joined the ERM. The inflation-adjusted exchange rate of the pound against ERM currencies over the past 10 to 20 years shows that the rate at which we entered the ERM is close to the average inflation-adjusted rate over that period. The pound is not uncompetitive against the deutschmark. If it were, how could exports to Germany have risen by 17½ per cent. last year?

Manufactured Goods

11. Dr. Michael Clark: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the latest trend in the balance of trade in manufactured goods.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The deficit in the United Kingdom's trade in manufactures is clearly on a downward trend. In the three months to January 1991, the deficit was £1½ billion, or 1 per cent. of GDP, compared with a peak deficit of £4¾ billion, or 3¾ per cent. of GDP, in the third quarter of 1989.

Dr. Clark: Does my right hon. Friend agree that those figures show a significant improvement and are part of an encouraging trend? Is not that because of the underlying strength of manufacturing industry which, during the lifetime of the Government, has improved productivity, the quality of goods and delivery times? Would not it be more appropriate to cheer on those companies that sell abroad rather than disparage them, as the Opposition do?

Mr. Lamont: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. There has been an encouraging trend in manufactured exports. As my hon. Friend knows, our share of world trade in manufactures has been broadly stable in the past few years and increased last year. We expected a further increase. Certain sectors have dramatically increased their exports, particularly the motor industry, which increased exports by 50 per cent. That is a remarkable achievement.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: Is it not clear that, as anyone who knows what is happening in the manufacturing industry, let alone the high street, will confirm, firms are all busy reducing their stocks and that, as they do so, one might have expected a dramatic decline in imports of manufactured goods and imports generally? The fact that that has not happened to anything like the extent expected is a serious matter to which the Chancellor should address himself minutely.

Mr. Lamont: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the behaviour and control of stocks is extremely important. The control of stock levels in British industry is one of the many ways in which British management and industry have improved dramatically in the past decade. The real fall in imports shows that the sharp move into a profound deficit in the current account was the product of excess demand in 1987 and 1988.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the strength of manufacturing industry is a good sign of the strength of a country's economy? Does he accept that our manufacturing base is far too small, is continuing to decline, and that unless it is regenerated, the prospects of prosperity and a sound economic future for this country are grim?

Mr. Lamont: I agree with some parts of my hon. Friend's question—manufacturing is an extremely important part of the economy, although not the only one. It is important for our external trade, which is why the Government are keen to encourage it.

Mr. John Smith: Does not the Chancellor of the Exchequer think that it is alarming that the Government predict a fall of 7 per cent. in manufacturing investment this year?

Mr. Lamont: The right hon. and learned Gentleman should recognise that there has been an increased boom in recent years in this country, and investment is at a high level. Business investment in this country has improved dramatically—by more than 40 per cent. in the past few years. It is not surprising that when the economy slows down, investment falls from its former high level.

Business Taxation

12. Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on the taxation of businesses.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I have received a large number of such representations.

Mr. Greenway: While recognising that high rates, which are essential for the defeat of inflation, are causing difficulties for British business, does not my hon. Friend agree that businesses can also be helped by fiscal policy? Has she seen the Budget submission by the Institute of Directors calling for a further reduction in corporation tax as a means of promoting recovery and stimulating investment, including much of the inward investment that is placing the country in such good stead?

Mrs. Shephard: I have seen the representations from the IOD, which will be considered by my right hon. Friend in the run-up to the Budget. I feel sure that the IOD will have welcomed yesterday's interest rate cuts. However, I remind the institute and my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) that the Government have a good record on reducing taxation for businesses. Corporation tax was reduced from 52 to 35 per cent.—one of the lowest rates in the industrialised world. We have the most favourable corporation tax regime for small businesses in the EC.

Mr. Battle: Is the Minister aware that, overshadowed by the poll tax, the uniform business rate is hammering business into the ground and into the red as the bills come in? That tax was directly imposed by central Government, not local government, and the Government are responsible for its imposition and collection.

Mrs. Shephard: Over the past 10 years, rate poundages rose by 37 per cent. more than rises in the retail prices index, mostly due to the irresponsible rate rises imposed by Labour-controlled councils. Now, increases are limited to the RPI, which means they are more predictable and help business to plan. As a whole, business will be paying £1 billion less in 1991 than they would have done under the old system, which has to be good news.

Interest Rates

14. Mr. Beaumont-Dark: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state the medium-term interest rates in the United Kingdom, Germany, the United States of America and Japan.

Mr. Norman Lamont: At close on 27 February, five-year Government bond yields were 10·1 per cent. in the United Kingdom, 8·5 per cent. in Germany, 7·6 per cent. in the United States and 6·4 per cent. in Japan.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Does my right hon. Friend accept that, because of the cost of the reunification of Germany, which is costing hundreds of billions of deutschmarks more than the Germans said it would, and the fact that Germany will not allow inflation, German interest rates, which affect us all, are about 2 per cent. higher than they would have been without the reunification costs? May there not come a time when—so that our interest rates can come down—Germany should go in for a system of realignment of its deutschmark rate, not just against the United Kingdom currency, but against Europe's currencies so that fairness prevails and we have proper and sensible lower interest rates, as we would have had without reunification?

Mr. Lamont: I am sure that my hon. Friend will understand that I cannot comment specifically on the realignment of the deutschmark. It is true that the reunification of Germany has imposed considerable costs on the German economy. It has pushed up interest rates and inflation and has also led the German Government to increase taxes. As my hon. Friend said, that has immense implications for monetary policy in all European countries.

Mr. Chris Smith: How on earth can British business and British industry compete in an increasingly challenging world when they face interest rates that are substantially higher than those of our major competitors? When will the Government realise that placing such exclusive reliance on high interest rates to control demand may control demand eventually, but it may also cause severe harm to the supply side of the economy?

Mr. Lamont: British business men will not be able to compete unless we have a level of inflation that is competitive with that of Germany, the United States and Japan. Inflation matters much more for competitiveness than interest rates alone and, as is often pointed out, a 1 per cent. reduction in interest rates is of less significance to business than a 1 per cent. reduction in labour costs. There are many things within the control of businesses, but the key must be to get inflation down.

Sir Ian Lloyd: The Chancellor will know better than most that there is a constant search for the explanation of differences in comparative economic performance. What significance does he attach to the fact that last year, for the first time ever I believe, expenditure on research and development in Japan exceeded investment in new plant?

Mr. Lamont: I am not familiar with the figures cited by my hon. Friend, but it is true that high industrial expenditure—high expenditure in relation to turnover by firms—is a vital ingredient of economic success. That has been a feature of the Japanese economy for many years.

North Sea Oil

17. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the cumulative total of all taxes from North sea oil since 1979 in 1989-90 prices.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The total over the period since 1979-80 is estimated at around £94 billion.

Mr. Hughes: Since Britain is back in recession and facing a huge trade deficit, since our industrial training is poor by any standards and since investment in manufacturing is declining yet again, does not it appear that North sea oil revenues have been largely squandered? Is not that a major indictment of the Government after nearly 12 years in office?

Mrs. Shephard: It is extraordinary that Opposition Members continue to knock British achievements. North sea oil revenues have contributed to the reduction of overseas debt and of the public sector borrowing requirement as a share of the gross domestic product, thus freeing resources for private investment. Our net overseas assets rose from £12¼ billion at the end of 1978 to £112 billion at the end of 1989. That is the highest proportion of all major countries as a percentage of GDP and it is no mean achievement.

Inflation

19. Mr. Burns: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the latest forecast for the year-on-year rate of inflation at the end of 1991.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The autumn statement forecast is for a sharp fall in all items on the retail prices index. Inflation should fall to 5½ per cent. by the fourth quarter of this year. Most outside commentators currently predict lower inflation than that. My right hon. Friend will publish a new forecast with the Budget.

Mr. Burns: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that answer. Has she read the speech by the president of the Confederation of British Industry who suggested that employers have a role to play in helping the battle against inflation by keeping down average wages? Will my hon. Friend impress on employers the need in the battle against inflation to keep down average wages throughout the economy?

Mrs. Shephard: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I am glad that the message is also being conveyed by the CBI. It is essential that wages be kept down as part of the continuing battle against inflation.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Robert Hicks: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 28 February.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Hicks: I am sure that the whole House will wish to pay tribute to those who have been involved in the successful liberation of Kuwait and especially to our own armed forces whose courage, professionalism and inspiration have been an example to us all. We offer our deepest sympathy and gratitude to the families who have lost their loved ones.

Does my right hon. Friend agree that very real problems still exist in that part of the world and that it is incumbent on all nations, through the United Nations, to ensure that a middle east peace conference is established at which all the issues, including Israel, the Palestinians and the rest, can be discussed? Does he agree that we should give every encouragement to the Arab nations to formulate their own security arrangements for the future?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I shall, of course, be making a full statement on those matters very shortly. The fact is that Kuwait has been liberated and that one of the most remarkable military campaigns of recent years has been concluded. I want to pay the warmest possible tribute to the commanding officers of all nations out there and especially to General de la Billiere, who has commanded our own troops with such skill. I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. We must now look to the future and secure peace, especially by the means mentioned by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Kinnock: May I say to the Prime Minister that today, in this Parliament and throughout the country, we share the feelings of satisfaction at the defeat of aggression, and the feelings of sorrow at the deaths and misery caused directly as a result of that aggression? Does the Prime Minister agree that the only fitting memorial to those who have made the ultimate sacrifice is to build, through the United Nations, lasting peace and lasting justice?

The Prime Minister: I share the emotions expressed by the right hon. Gentleman and the conclusion that he reached.

Mr. Temple-Morris: Does my right hon. Friend agree that if politicians do half as good a job in sustaining the peace as the armed services have done in winning the war, we shall not be doing at all badly? In sustaining that peace, will my right hon. Friend differentiate between the Iraqi people on the one hand, and Saddam Hussein and his Baathist clique on the other? Does he further agree that the longer that Saddam Hussein and that clique remain in power, the more difficult it will be for all nations to have a charitable attitude towards Iraq?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. We have never opposed the Iraqi people; it is their leadership and Saddam Hussein who have been the enemy on this occasion.

Q2. Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 28 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Home Robertson: Will the Prime Minister pay tribute to the 300 service men and their five minesweepers from the Rosyth naval base on their skilful achievement in the long and hazardous task of clearing mines for the allied fleet? Is he aware that the Minister of State for the Armed Forces said on Tuesday that Rosyth naval base was the "easiest and most suitable" target for closure, in spite of the assurance given by the Prime Minister to the House on 5 February? Is that the kind of welcome home that our returning heroes can expect from Ministers in this Government?

The Prime Minister: I willingly join the hon. Gentleman in paying tribute to the men from Rosyth and the Royal Navy who have done such a magnificent job in sweeping the northern Gulf of mines. I do that with the greatest warmth and willingness. As the hon. Gentleman knows, for I have told the House before, a whole range of possible options concerning the armed forces generally is being considered to reduce the cost of defence support. In the case of the Royal Navy, that is bound to mean the closure of some naval establishments. At this stage the Ministry of Defence is looking at various possibilities and studies are being carried out. It is essential that those studies are carried out before any decisions of any sort can be made. I repeat my assurance to the hon. Gentleman: no decisions whatsoever have been made about the future of Rosyth.

Q3. Mr. Devlin: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 28 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Devlin: My right hon. Friend will be aware of the profound joy and relief among families of service men in the north of England at the news of the ceasefire today and, in particular, at the extremely low level of casualties. Will he confirm that the troops will be brought back from the middle east as soon as possible and be replaced by a United Nations peacekeeping force?

The Prime Minister: We shall certainly be bringing our own troops home shortly. Precisely what will happen thereafter is a matter yet to be determined. No doubt I shall have more to say about that shortly.

Mr. Ashdown: May I associate myself with the words of other hon. Members on the role of our armed forces? The use of their professionalism and skill has been put to the service not just of the freedom of Kuwait but to the rule of international law and the authority of the United Nations. May I also pay tribute to the Prime Minister for the calmness and authority with which he has led the nation at a difficult time? Is his view about the future the same as mine? If the coalition invests the extraordinary victory in the United Nations, we will have created a powerful instrument not just for peace in the middle east now, but for peace in the world in the future as well.

The Prime Minister: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman. I am grateful to him for his kind words. The attitude taken by the Leader of the Opposition and by the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) has led to a unity in the House which can have been only a comfort to all our troops.

Q4. Mr. Speller: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 28 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Speller: Will my right hon. Friend accept the congratulations through me of the people of north Devon on his leadership over the past few months? Now, as he turns his view towards domestic problems, will he see whether he can right some of the inequalities that have bothered people about the community charge? In particular, will he consider the case where a husband and wife both have to pay community charge even though only one is at work?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. As he knows, we are examining the community charge and we will make announcements on that when our examination is concluded.

Mr. James Lamond: Is there any chance of Governments at the United Nations applying the same energy and enthusiasm to trying to stop the sale of arms to dictators like Saddam Hussein throughout the world, in which case it might not be necessary to sacrifice young men such as those who were sacrificed in the recent war?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman knows that there has been an embargo by this country on sales of arms to Iraq for a considerable number of years. My right hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) imposed a strict embargo on sales to Iraq many years ago.

Visits

Q5. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Prime Minister when he next expects to visit Dover, Deal and south- east Kent.

The Prime Minister: I am making plans for a series of visits to all parts of the country and very much hope to include Kent among them.

Mr. Shaw: Will my right hon. Friend confirm the commitment of his Government to completing the dual carriageway A20 into Dover and—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is a perfectly legitimate question.

Mr. Shaw: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that his Government is committed to completing the A20 dual carriageway into Dover and to completing the A2 dualling between Lydden and Dover? Furthermore, will he send his best wishes to Bob Bale, Trevor Povey and all my constituents who have been fighting for Britain in the Gulf?

The Prime Minister: I am happy to send the best wishes that my hon. Friend suggests. My hon. Friend has raised his first point with me before, both privately and publicly, and I am happy to confirm that part of the A20 between Folkestone and Dover is under construction and, as my hon. Friend is aware, a scheme for the improvement of the A2 entered the road programme last year.

Engagements

Q6. Mr. Eastham: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 28 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Eastham: With the welcome end of the Gulf war, will the Prime Minister ensure that the same endeavours are used to reduce hospital waiting lists, which now stand at 980,000, as were used to open wards and provide beds for possible casualties? If he bothers to visit Ribble Valley during the by-election will he try to explain why the waiting list for beds there has doubled during the past four years and now stands at 4,380?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman should know, the health service is now treating more people more efficiently than ever before, not least due to the reforms introduced by the Government and the funding provided by them.

Q7. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 28 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Dykes: I thank my right hon. Friend for his incisive and decisive War Cabinet leadership which has led to success in the Gulf and I add my words of admiration for the unsurpassed and brilliant performance of our armed forces. As I have RAF Bentley Priory in my constituency, from which the Battle of Britain was directed 50 years ago, I particularly think of the performance of the Royal Air Force. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the particularly brave performance of the Tornado pilots in low flying on the Iraqi airfields did, contrary to rumours, substantially neutralise many of the Iraqi airfields and prevent the Iraqi air force from fighting?

The Prime Minister: I can certainly confirm that. The bravery of the Tornado pilots in the early part of the campaign played a material part in ensuring that casualties in the land war were so few. I am happy to pay tribute to all those pilots.

Mr. William Ross: Will the Prime Minister give an assurance to the House that considerable expense will now be put to trying to find a better means of identifying friendly ground troops?

The Prime Minister: That is a matter to which we shall certainly give attention. The House will understand the tragic occurrence that leads the hon. Gentleman to ask that question. It is certainly a matter which will have the most careful examination.

Q8. Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 28 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Arbuthnot: In view of the recent murder of an innocent civilian by the IRA and the attempted murder of the War Cabinet, does my right hon. Friend agree that now is not the proper time to water down the prevention of terrorism Act?

The Prime Minister: I very much agree with my hon. Friend. The prevention of terrorism Act has served us well in recent years and for the moment we still require it.

Mr. Mallon: On this historic day when people throughout the world can again savour peace, may I as an Irishman express the anger and revulsion felt by the vast majority of Irish people at the murderous attempts on commuters in Victoria and other stations? Does the Prime Minister agree that the contrived security alerts that we saw again yesterday are causing enormous suffering and disruption to thousands of people going to and coming from work? Does he share my view that to kill and to heap suffering on people in furtherance of political ends is a sad and cynical perversion of the very concept of patriotism?

The Prime Minister: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. It is wickedness beyond belief, and it deserves the contempt of everyone.

Q9. Dr. Twinn: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 28 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Dr. Twinn: May I join in the warm congratulations of the House to my right hon. Friend for his conduct of the war? In looking to the future, will he bear in mind the problems caused by the division of Cyprus and the fact that United Nations Security Council resolutions have still not been implemented there?

The Prime Minister: I shall certainly put my mind to that problem. I share my hon. Friend's hope that the Cyprus question will be resolved. Indeed, I am sure that everyone in the House wants to see that. I do not believe that question of Cyprus can be directly related to the Gulf conflict.

Q10. Mrs. Alice Mahon: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 28 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Mahon: Has the Prime Minister had time to read the recent Amnesty International report on the people of East Timor? Will he now make a commitment to the achievement of a peaceful and just world by banning the sale of weapons to Indonesia, given that that country has illegally occupied East Timor for 15 years and has committed the most atrocious acts of violence against its population? Is not this a good time to do something about the evil of the arms trade?

The Prime Minister: I have not read the Amnesty International report to which the hon. Lady has referred, but I shall certainly seek to do so and reflect upon what she has said.

Although it is possible to identify some of the payments which have been made to the agriculture industry in England—details are contained in the annual appropriation accounts class IV—Agriculture, Fisheries and Food—it is not possible to disaggregate all United Kingdom CAP expenditure in this way.

Gulf Oil Slicks

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his Department's marine biology laboratories at Lowestoft have analysed the effects on the Gulf coral reefs of reduced exposure to sunlight arising from the extensive oil slicks in the Gulf.

Mr. Curry: The expertise and scientific programme of my Department's marine laboratory at Lowestoft are focused on the environmental conditions of our own waters. However, Britain is participating fully in the international effort to tackle the pollution in the Gulf, and my scientists stand ready to provide advice as necessary from within their areas of competence and experience.

Hill Livestock Compensatory Allowances

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has of the number of businesses receiving hill livestock compensatory allowance payments in 1991.

Mr. Gummer: I estimate that some 65,000 farm businesses in the United Kingdom will receive payments during 1991 under the hill livestock compensatory allowances scheme.

Gulf Forces (Beef Supply)

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food why it has not proved possible for the intervention board to make a successful tender for the supply of British beef to the armed services serving in the Gulf.

Mr. Curry: The intervention board is required to sell beef on terms laid down by the European Commission, generally by inviting tenders from meat traders. The board does not itself engage in submitting tenders for sale. The arrangements for the supply of beef to the Ministry of Defence entail the submission of tenders by wholesale meat suppliers. Officials of my Department are in contact with the Ministry of Defence to examine whether changes are possible to the various arrangements which would facilitate access to intervention stocks by Ministry of Defence suppliers.

Potatoes

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the number of hectares registered with the Potato Marketing Board for potato growing, and the number of individual farmers registered, for each year since 1980.

Mr. Gummer: The table shows the number of producers registered with the Potato Marketing Board and the basic area available for planting since 1980.

	Registered Producers	Basic Area '000 ha
1980	30,225	192
1981	28,760	182
1982	27,498	172
1983	26,499	169
1984	25,480	168
1985	24,948	165
1986	22,565	161
1987	21,439	155
1988	20,155	154
1989	19,266	152
1990	18,276	153

Namibia

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will indicate the amount of aid contributed by the United Kingdom and each European Community member to the development of Namibia since that country's independence.

Mrs. Chalker: On Namibia's independence last March, I announced in the House that Britain would provide £10 million of bilateral aid for commitment over three years. Our best available information on commitments made by other European Community members is as follows:

Denmark:
40 million kroner for the three years following independence.
France:
100 million francs for the three years following independence.
Germany:
100 million Deutschmarks committed in 1990.
Italy:
US$12 million for the three years following independence.
The Netherlands:
5-10 million Guilders per year.
Spain:
US$700,000 in emergency aid for the first year following independence.

PRIME MINISTER

The Gulf

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister what consideration Her Majesty's Government gives to public opinion on the Gulf war; and how Her Majesty's Government-imposed reporting restrictions relate to this.

The Prime Minister: Support from the British public remains very strong for the actions being taken by the allies to liberate Kuwait in accordance with United Nations Security Council resolutions. The Government's policy is to allow all reasonable freedom and access for reporting, subject only to constraints essential to protect the safety of coalition forces and the security of allied operations.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Prime Minister what is his intention with regard to the award of a Gulf campaign medal.

The Prime Minister: The question of an appropriate medal for those serving in the Gulf is under consideration.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Minister for Sport

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set out the precise duties and responsibilities of the Minister for Sport.

Mr. Atkins: With effect from 3 December 1990, responsibility for sport and recreation transferred from the Department of the Environment to the Department of Education and Science. I am responsible for sports matters generally and for sport and PE in schools. In addition, I am responsible for children's play; personal and social education, including health, AIDS, drugs and sex education; the youth service; energy conservation; and departmental purchasing. I also provide support on section 12 to 16 cases.

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the policy of the Minister for Sport so far as regular meetings with the Football Supporters Association and the National Federation of Football Supporters Clubs is concerned.

Mr. Atkins: My predecessor as Minister for Sport had meetings with the Football Supporters Association and the National Federation of Football Supporters Clubs. I will meet them as and when appropriate.

Student Loans

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what scope remains for students to negotiate alternative contact names; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what were the reasons for the decision that applicants for student loans must now provide contact names of blood relatives.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The administration of the student loans scheme is the responsibility of the Student Loans Company. I am therefore asking the managing director of the company to write direct to the hon. Member with the information requested.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will provide the reference for the regulation allowing the Student Loan Company to require applicants to have a bank account capable of direct debit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Education (Student Loans) Act 1990 does not require the arrangements for administering the student loans scheme to be contained in regulations.

The Act does, however, require regulations to provide, among other things, for the manner in which repayments of loans are to be made. Regulation 7(4) of the Education (Student Loans) Regulations 1990 therefore provides that repayments shall be made by direct debit from the borrower's bank or building society account unless the loans administrator agrees otherwise. Under current arrangements the loans administrator is the Student Loans Company.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what hardship provisions graduates with student loans may seek if supporting dependants, high rent, or mortgages renders them unable to make payment; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Borrowers under the student loans scheme whose repayment term has begun may defer making repayments where their gross income is less than 85 per cent. of national average earnings. Repayments of about £400 a year in 1990 prices should be manageable for borrowers whose income exceeds that threshold.

The Education (Student Loans) Regulations 1990 make further provision for borrowers who receive certain disability-related social security benefits. Those benefits are disregarded when assessing borrowers' income for deferment purposes. The Student Loans Company may also permit such borrowers to commence repayment at a later date than they would otherwise have to or to repay over a longer period.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will propose some remedy for applicants for student loans whose birth certificates have been refused by higher education institutions as adequate identification where their name has since changed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Regulation 11(4) of the Education (Student Loans) Regulations 1990 requires institutions to inspect the birth or adoption certificate of a student who seeks certification of eligibility for a loan, where that student was born in the United Kingdom. The Student Loans Company uses information contained on such certificates to identify each student individually. This helps to avoid confusion and to prevent fraud. It thereby protects both the taxpayer and the student.

Because the information on a birth or adoption certificate does not change, it is particularly valuable where the student's name has changed since birth or adoption. In such cases, the student may also need to produce documentation showing that he or she is the person named on the birth or adoption certificate.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations the Student Loan Company has made to him regarding its delay in processing student loan applications; and whether he will make a statement on the rate of take-up of loans.

Mr. Alan Howarth: As at Thursday 14 February, more than 98,000 applications had been made to the Student Loans Company.

The company aims to process loan applications within 21 days of receipt. In setting itself this aim, the company relies on students' institutions to forward eligibility certificates promptly and correctly completed. It also relies on students to complete their application form correctly and then to sign and return their loan agreement form promptly. Where these conditions are met, the company is achieving its aim.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what costs the Student Loans Company has incurred to date, separating out start-up costs and continuing operations; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The total costs of establishing the student loans scheme to 31 August 1990 were £9·3 million, exclusive of VAT. This figure includes costs incurred before the Student Loans Company was founded. Between 1 September 1990 and 31 January 1991 the company incurred operational costs of £4·64 million, excluding VAT.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he intends to continue his policy restricting students in higher education to one application per academic year to the Student Loans Company; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Yes. Depending on the time in the year when students apply, they may ask the Student Loans Company to pay their loan in up to three instalments.

Physical Education

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when the interim report of the national curriculum working group for physical education will be published; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I will publish the report tomorrow, together with my letter to the chairman of the group, Mr. Ian Beer. Copies of this initial advice, including my letter, will be placed in the Library.

Youth Workers

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set out (a) the funds spent in 1990-91 through the local education authority training grant system on training of youth workers and (b) the funds available in 1991-92 under grants for education support and training for the training of youth workers.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 15 February 1991]: In 1990-91 local education authority training grants are available to support some £1·2 million of expenditure on training of youth and community workers. In 1991-92 grants for education support and training are available to support some £1·25 million of such expenditure.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much of the National Youth Agency budget for 1991-92 will be spent on (a) initial youth worker training and (b) in-service youth worker training.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 15 February 1991]: The National Youth Agency's budget for 1991-92 has not yet been decided. It will be determined on the basis of the agency's work programme which will be agreed with the Department.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether grants for education support and training may be used to finance training for volunteer youth workers.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 15 February 1991]: The grants for education support and training programme for 1991-92 does not include grants which could support the training of volunteer youth workers.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what guidelines he has given to the National Youth Agency in relation to its proposed role and functions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 15 February 1991]: My right hon. Friend's reply on 5 April 1990 to the question from my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt) described the proposed role and functions of the National Youth Agency. These functions were explained in greater detail in a letter to the chairmen of the youth service bodies in June 1990. I shall send the hon. Member a copy of the list of functions.

Dual Use Facilities

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the reason for the delay in publishing the practical guidance booklet on dual use facilities; by what date the booklet will be published; if he will require specific responses to the guidance from all local education authorities, and particularly from those with responsibility for inner-city areas; and by what date he will publish an implementation timetable for proposed new schemes.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 15 February 1991]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him on 14 December 1990, Official Report, column 514. The dual use guidance booklet is currently being revised with a view to publication in the spring. The Department will continue to monitor good practice in this area, but there are no plans to require individual responses to the booklet from local education authorities or to publish an implementation timetable.

Child Abuse

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will list the changes he has introduced in the regime of independent schools as a result of the case involving child abuse at Crookham Court school in Berkshire;

(2) if he will introduce legislation to require head teachers always to inform the police and his Department when a member of staff is required to leave a school because of child abuse; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon [pursuant to his answer, 22 January 1991, c. 121-23]: The Department is now consulting independent schools organisations and other bodies on amendments to the Education (Particulars of Independent Schools) Regulations 1982. The Welsh Office will consult in Wales.

These amendments will require proprietors of independent schools to report to the Secretary of State where any person—not just any teacher as at present—is dismissed from employment for misconduct, or would have been dismissed or considered for dismissal had they not resigned. Proprietors will also be required to provide particulars of all staff, not just teaching staff, on application for registration and annually.

The changes will enable the Department to consider placing independent schools' non-teaching staff on list 99, as well as teaching staff, and will make it possible to check regularly that no barred staff are working in independent schools in a non-teaching capacity.

The closing date for consultation is 8 March and we plan to make amending regulations soon thereafter. In the meantime, the organisations consulted are being asked to invite any schools in membership to begin reporting voluntarily.

CIVIL SERVICE

Women Employees

41. Mr. Janner: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service how many women are employed in civil service grades 1, 2 and 3, respectively.

Mr. Renton: Currently, there are no women in the civil service at grade 1 level, seven at grade 2 level and 37 at grade 3 level.

Disabled Employees

42. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service what steps he is taking to remove obstacles to, and restrictions on, the employment and promotion of people with disabilities in the civil service.

Mr. Renton: My Department is taking a range of initiatives to promote equality of opportunity for people with disabilities. These include support and advice to Departments and agencies in implementing the revised code of practice on disability.

Public Relations Officers

43. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service in what grades press and public relations officers are employed.

Mr. Renton: These officers are employed in a wide spectrum of grades, but most commonly information grades.

Agencies

44. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service how many civil service jobs are now performed by agencies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: More than 82,000 civil servants are working in the 34 "next steps" agencies now established. The Chancellor announced earlier this month that the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise Departments are also to operate fully on "next steps" lines. This, together with the further 32 agency candidates which have been announced, covers over 280,000 staff.

45. Mr. Favell: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service whether the creation of "next steps" agencies will affect the numbers employed in the civil service.

Mr. Renton: "Next steps" is designed to produce a better-managed and more efficient civil service responsive to the needs of Ministers and the public.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Satellite Television

Mr. Holt: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much has been set aside to pay additional housing benefit to housing trust tenants who require a decoder to receive satellite television.

Miss Widdecombe: Housing benefit is an income-related benefit intended to help meet reasonable accommodation costs. Broadly this means rent and any compulsory service charges related to the provision of adequate accommodation. It is for local authorities to determine what proportion of a rent is eligible for housing benefit in any particular case by reference to the housing benefit regulations. We are currently reviewing those regulations to ensure that they clearly prevent charges for satellite television relay from being met by benefit.

Appeal Tribunal

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many appeals are currently outstanding from the social security appeal tribunal; and what is the average time for those appeals to be dealt with at all levels.

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for the administration of social security appeals lies with the president of social security and medical appeal tribunals, His Honour Judge Holden. He has advised that the total number of appeals outstanding at the social security appeal tribunals, as at 8 January 1991, is 22,823.

The latest figures available for processing appeals are those for the quarter ending 31 March 1990. The average times for that quarter were:

(a) from lodgement to receipt of the submission by the tribunal clerk—10·2 weeks;
(b) from lodgement to the date of hearing—23 weeks.

Severe Disability Premium

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applicants in Birmingham for severe disability premium are (a) awaiting decisions of the appeal tribunal and (b) awaiting his Department's action following appeal tribunal decisions.

Miss Widdecombe: The responsibility for social security appeal tribunals lies with the president of the social security and medical appeal tribunals, His Honour Judge Derek Holden. He has supplied me with the following information:

(a) just over 700 cases held by the Birmingham tribunal concern the income support severe disability premium and are awaiting decisions, listing or the adjudication officer's submission;
(b) the information is not available, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Community Charge Benefit

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the proportion of those receiving poll tax rebates in Wales expressed as a percentage of the total number of poll tax payers.

Miss Widdecombe: At 31 August 1990, community charge benefit was in payment to 24 per cent. of those liable to pay the charge in Wales.

Cold Weather Payments

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will initiate a study into the relationship between the number of applications for special cold weather payments in any social security office area and the extent of local newspaper advertising of the relevant application forms.

Mr. Scott: The hon. Member's suggestion will be considered as part of the review of cold weather payments.

Retirement Pension

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the cost each year to the Exchequer of giving those over 80 years of age an additional 25p a week pension; and what is the administrative cost of making these additional payments.

Miss Widdecombe: The estimated current cost of giving those over 80 years of age an additional 25p per week pension is over £26 million a year. As the addition is added automatically to the pension on the first payday after the pensioner's 80th birthday there is no additional administrative cost involved in making these payments.

THE ARTS

Cultural Matters (EC Competence)

30. Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will be attending any future meetings of the intergovernmental conference on political union of the European Community to discuss the competence of the Community in cultural matters.

Mr. Renton: I have no plans at present to do so. The discussions of the intergovernmental conference on political union cover a wide range of issues, on which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs is in the lead. The view of Her Majesty's Government is that the treaty of Rome does not confer competence on the Community in the cultural area.

Museums and Galleries

31. Mr. Grist: To ask the Minister for the Arts what proposals there are to ensure that the fabric of museums and galleries is being maintained.

Mr. Renton: I have commissioned Arup Research and Development to conduct a study of the building renovation needs of national museums and galleries which I sponsor. I expect it to report to me in summer 1991.

Scholarships

32. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Minister for the Arts how many scholarships in the arts and in what main areas of activity are sponsored by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: No arts scholarships are sponsored by the OAL. Many of the institutions sponsored by the OAL provide education, training, work experience, and so on, for their staffs. In addition, the national film and television school has a scholarship fund from which support is given to British students in need, developed with the aid of private sponsors.

Funding, London

34. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Minister for the Arts when he plans to meet the chair of Greater London Arts to discuss funding for smaller arts clients in London.

Mr. Renton: I have no such plans. The funding of arts clients in London is a matter for the Arts Council and for Greater London Arts as appropriate.

36. Mr. Butler: To ask the Minister for the Arts what proportion of central Government arts spending is spent within Greater London.

Mr. Renton: Nearly 37 per cent. of the Arts Council of Great Britain's total grant in aid in 1989-90 was allocated to clients in Greater London.

Arts Council Grant

35. Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Minister for the Arts how much of the Arts Council grant in England and Wales in 1989-90 was actually paid to artists, writers, musicians and those in the performing arts; and how much was absorbed by administration.

Mr. Renton: The total of the Arts Council's grant in aid spent in England and Wales in 1989-90 was £139,745,000. Just under £14·4 million was spent by the Arts Council of Great Britain, the Welsh Arts Council and the 12 English regional arts associations on operational services. The functions of these bodies extend well beyond grant administration and include arts promotion and marketing, other professional advice and support to client organisations, and development and planning work.

ENERGY

Electricity Privatisation

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish in the Official Report the details relating to the flotation of the electricity generating companies on (a) the number of individuals who responded to the official advertising campaign and registered as prospective applicants in advance of the sale, (b) the number of those pre-registered who subsequently were not allocated any shares, (c) the value of the cheques received from those pre-registered who subsequently were not allocated any shares, (d) the date on which the cheques received from unsuccessful pre-registered applicants were encashed, (e) the date when the subsequent refunds were subsequently made and (f) the value of the interest generated by the encashment of cheques prior to refund to unsuccessful applicants.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The available information is as follows:

(a) By midnight on 14 November 1990 the electricity share information office had received approximately 7·3 million applications to register;

(b) Approximately 97 per cent. of registrants who duly applied as customers received an allocation. No figures are available in respect of registrants who applied other than as customers;

(c, f) The systems employed to record applications and account for interest do not permit the separate identification of data relating to wholly unsuccessful and partially successful applications. The value of cheques submitted with wholly unsuccessful applications by registrants and of the interest earned on those cashed is therefore not available;

(d, e) Cheques from the public in the retail offers were cashed principally in the week 10 to 14 December 1990. Refunds of application monies were dispatched by first-class post on a phased basis, principally from 16 to 19 December 1990. The majority of wholly unsuccessful application forms and their accompanying uncashed cheques were returned the previous week.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish in the Official Report details relating to the information made available to the public in advance of the flotation of the electricity generating companies about encashment of cheques where no shares were allocated to them.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The prospectus for the 12 regional electricity companies share offers stated in chapter VII, paragraph 8 of the terms and conditions of application that the right was reserved to present for payment all cheques or bankers' drafts received. It also stated in chapter VI, section 2e that this would be avoided where practicable in respect of applications for which it was not expected to make an allocation.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he is satisfied with the procedures used to refund money in the electricity generating companies flotation to those who had pre-registered but were subsequently allocated no shares; and whether he has any plans to use such a system in any future flotations.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: In the case of the 12 regional electricity companies share offers, the procedures were designed to enable cheques to be returned to applicants receiving no allocation as quickly as possible; most received them before Christmas.

For the minority of cases where no shares were allocated, but where it was not practicable to avoid cashing cheques, provision was made for refunds to be issued; this took place in the majority of these cases before Christmas.

For the generating companies share offers the arrangements are much simpler, not least because, as only two companies are being offered together, it will not be necessary to cash cheques that are duly submitted with application forms unless it is expected that an allocation will be made.

Nuclear Power Stations

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy on what date he expects to publish the long-term safety reviews for Hinkley A, Trawsfynydd and Sizewell A nuclear power stations.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I understand that the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate —NII—has almost completed its detailed assessment of the long-term safety review of Hinkley Point A. The HSE will publish the NII's findings later this year. The NII's examination of the long-term safety reviews for Trawsfynydd and Sizewell A are due for completion by late 1991 and the end of 1992 respectively. The HSE proposes to publish the NII's findings on these long-term safety reviews as soon as possible thereafter.

Kansai Electric Power Station

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to consult his Japanese opposite number regarding the radiation leak at the nuclear power station of Kansai Electric; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My Department has been informed of the incident at the Mihama-2 plant at Kansai Electric on Saturday 9 February by our embassy in Tokyo and has also received information from other sources including the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna, to which the Japanese Government have supplied an account of events.

From the accounts that my Department has received, it would appear that the amount of radioactivity released was extremely small and that there is no reason to believe that it constituted any danger to the population or the environment. My Department has also been told that the incident was not serious and that the reactor was shut down safely by its own protective systems.

HEALTH

Hospital Beds

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the average number of beds available within the South Manchester health authority area in 1980, 1985 and 1990; what is the current actual position; and what are the comparable figures for England as a whole.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is given in the table.

Number of average daily available beds

	1980	1985	1989-90
South Manchester DHA	2,423	2,277	1,927
England	355,979	325,487	270,334

England	5,670,001	6,353,812	7,476,626

[1] Figures for 1989-90 refer to Finished Consultant Episodes and should not be directly compared with earlier figures (discharges and deaths).

More recent information on beds and patients treated is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to write to Mr. P. Hadfield, the chairman of South Manchester health authority, for details.

The Gulf

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provision is being made by his Department for the support of families and service men and women who are subject to trauma, stress and long-term mental illness arising from war in the Gulf.

Mr. Dorrell: The Department has issued advice to health authorities and social service departments about contingency planning arrangements for Gulf casualties.

The families of all service personnel are entitled to national health service and social services in the same way as any other resident. It will be for local services to arrange appropriate long-term care and support for all in their area who are subject to trauma, stress and long-term mental illness.

Mr. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research has been conducted into the use of psychotherapeutic treatment as against the use of drugs in the treatment for trauma, stress and long-term mental illness in the case of service men and women and their families consequent upon the war in the Gulf.

Mr. Dorrell: Substantial research has been undertaken into the appropriate role of drugs and psychotherapy in the treatment of trauma, stress and long-term mental illness in respect of previous conflicts. The war in the Gulf is of too recent origin to have permitted research in this area.

Health Authority Funding

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give the basis on which extra resources to enable health authorities to reduce creditor levels are being allocated; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The basis for allocating this money has not been finalised. Each authority receiving some of this allocation will also be expected to contribute to reducing its creditor levels from within its own resources.

Young Offenders

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the secure establishments other than prisons in England and Wales where young (a) men and (b) women, under the age of 16 years can be held.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: On 31 January 1991, there were 36 secure units in community homes for children in England and Wales, all of which admitted young people under the age of 16. Details of them are given in the table. In addition, the Department runs two youth treatment centres—YTCs—Glenthorne in Birmingham and St. Charles in Essex. Both YTCs admit young people under the age of 16.

Hospital Closures, Doncaster

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospitals have closed since 1979 (a) nationally and (b) in the Doncaster area.

Mr. Dorrell: We are aware of 463 hospitals or facilities that have been approved for total closure from 1979 to 31 December 1989. Of these, two hospitals were in the Doncaster area.

Over the same period, the NHS has increased in-patient treatment as follows:

	1979	1988-89
England	5,400,120	6,585,982
Doncaster	28,103	41,969

That is an increase of 22 per cent. nationally—49·3 per cent. in the Doncaster area.

Day case treatment also increased as follows:

	1979	1988-89
England	592,061	1,016,327
Doncaster	2,909	4,961

That is an increase of 71·7 per cent. nationally—70·5 per cent. in the Doncaster area.

From 1979-80 to 1989-90 expenditure on the NHS capital programme has grown by 55 per cent. in real terms.

Census Data

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he has now considered the British Computer Society's report on its independent review of the confidentiality arrangements for the computer processing of 1991 census data; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The report is contained in the White Paper "1991 Census of Population: Confidentiality and Computing"—Cm1447—which is being published today by my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Health and for Scotland. The White Paper includes a statement by the Government and also sets out the Government's reply to the society's recommendations.

The society's report contains the following summary assessment:

"The Review Team has examined all relevant arrangements already in place, and the plans and stated intentions where preparatory work is still in progress. The Review Team can report that the arrangements made so far are, in its opinion, fully in keeping with the very high standards of confidentiality required; and that the plans and intentions current at the time of preparing this Report are consistent with that standard."

In their statement, the Government welcome not only the society's conclusions and recommendations but the opportunity to reaffirm their determination to protect the confidentiality of the information about individual persons and households to be collected in the census on 21 April.

Population Forecasts

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people are involved in making population forecasts in (a) the Office of Population, Censuses and Surveys, (b) the Department of the Environment, (c) elsewhere in public departments and (d) in county authorities.

Mr. Dorrell: Six people are employed in a unit at the OPCS the main task of which is preparing, publishing, and disseminating population projections.

Four people in the Department of Environment spend part of their time working on the migration element of subnational population projections, including consultation with local authorities. In total, less than one person a year is spent in this activity each year.

In the Government Actuary's Department three people are involved in making population projections. Information is not held centrally for people involved elsewhere in public departments or in county authorities and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Gulf Casualties

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of national health service acute beds are normally available for emergency admissions.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not held centrally. It is for each hospital unit to decide the proportion of its national health service acute beds to be made available for emergency admission. The proportion of all patients—in-patients and day cases—admitted immediately was 56 per cent. in 1989-90.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what consideration is currently being given to the projected lengthening of surgical waiting lists resulting from national health service treatment of war casualties;

(2) if he will instruct all regional health authorities to open, equip and staff wards and beds, previously closed for financial reasons, to meet the needs of Gulf patients and continued treatment of waiting list patients.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) and the hon. Members for Easington (Mr. Cummings), for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) and for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms. Walley) on 17 January at columns 583-84.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if, once Gulf casualties have been transferred to the national health service, hospitals will be responsible for dealing with relatives' inquiries and visits.

Mr. Dorrell: National health service hospitals treating Gulf casualties will deal with relatives' inquiries and visits in conjunction with the military administrative officers (civil hospitals).

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many beds are available within English, Welsh and regional burns units to deal with serious burns.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Identification of the need for, and provision of, services for serious burns are matters for regions to determine. In the event of exceptional demand, consultants would be expected to exercise their normal discretion to seek inter-hospital transfer or to set up "satellite" units.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what training has been provided to national health service nurses on how to deal with the effects of chemical weapons upon patients;

(2) what advice has been given to national health staff about the possibility of contamination by chemical and biological agents when treating patients contaminated by such agents;

(3) what experience existing national health service staff, not called for service in the Gulf, have in dealing with the results of chemical and biological weapons;

(4) what information national health service hospitals have received concerning patients contaminated by biological agents as a result of warfare in the Gulf;

(5) what proportion of persons suffering from the effects of chemical contamination in the Gulf are likely to be treated, in the longer term, by the national health service;

(6) what number of chemical warfare victims can be dealt with by the national health service.

Mr. Dorrell: NHS hospitals will treat all Gulf casualties admitted to them. Those suffering from the effects of chemical weapons will be decontaminated before being evacuated to the United Kingdom. There is therefore no threat to NHS staff from treating such casualties.

I am advised that, after decontamination has taken place, the most likely effects of chemical weapons are similar to those arising in other circumstances, for which NHS staff are already trained. The experience which individual members of staff have depends on a variety of circumstances and is not recorded centrally.

The NHS has not been asked by the Ministry of Defence to prepare for reception of casualties suffering from the effects of biological weapons. Should the need arise, such casualties would need immediate treatment and this would be given in the Gulf area.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps have been taken to provide the levels of skilled staff required to expand regional burns unit capacity, should this be required.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Normal regional planning for contingencies, such as major accidents, includes taking account of the possible need to increase levels of skilled staff in burns units. National guidance has been issued to regions to supplement their normal planning arrangements in the event of casualties from the Gulf war.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what counselling and other support services will be provided to national health service personnel treating war casualties.

Mr. Dorrell: The provision of counselling and other support services for NHS personnel treating war casualties will be determined at local level.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice he has given to regional health authority press officers concerning casualties from the Gulf treated in the national health service.

Mr. Dorrell: The Department has issued advice on how to deal with issues likely to arise.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what level of psychiatric services will be made available to personnel returning from the Gulf.

Mr. Dorrell: Personnel returning from the Gulf and referred to the NHS will have available the full range of normal NHS psychiatric services for treatment as appropriate.

Constituency Electorates

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many forms RPF 29 have been received by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys detailing the electorates of parliamentary constituencies for 1991, at the latest convenient date.

Mr. Dorrell: By 13 February, 197 electoral registration officers in local authorities in England and Wales had submitted RPF 29 returns containing 1991 electorate figures to OPCS: 206 were outstanding.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what matters were discussed at the meeting last week between Mr. John Yates of the Inter-Authority Comparisons and Consultancy Company and the Minister of State; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what reasons have been given to him by the Inter-Authority Comparisons and Consultancy Company for its withdrawal from the Government's initiative on reduction of hospital waiting lists; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Mr. Yates was invited to explain the decision to withdraw from the agreement with the Department to carry out studies of long waiting lists in 1991-92. We are determined to reduce the number of long-wait patients. We expect to use outside help to carry this important work forward.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what instructions have been given to health authorities with regard to the reduction of hospital patients' waiting lists; and what targets have been set for achievement by March 1992.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Duncan Nichol, chief executive of the NHS management executive, has written to general managers to say that targets will be agreed with each of the 14 regional health authorities for substantial reductions in the number of patients who wait more than one year for treatment. As a minimum, no patient should have to wait more than two years by March 1992. The £35 million waiting list fund for 1991-92 will be deployed to help regions achieve their targets.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the latest estimate of those on the NHS waiting lists in the Greater London area; and what the figure was in each of the last five years.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 17 January 1991]: Figures for March 1990, the latest available centrally, and the previous five years are given in the table. What matters is the time patients wait, not the total numbers on the list. In the 12 months to March 1990 the number of patients waiting over one year for in-patient treatment in the Greater London area health authorities fell by 14 per cent.

London Health Authorities: Waiting lists at 31 March (in-patients)

	Total (excluding self-deferred cases)
1985	107,951
1986	121,412
1987	125,077
1988	124,661
1989	130,482
1990	126,616

NHS Personnel (Gulf War)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many national health service (a) doctors, (b) surgeons and (c) nurses are presently serving in the Gulf; and what proportion of the total number of national health service doctors, surgeons and nurses this represents.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not available centrally.

Iran-Iraq War Casualties

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many persons injured during the Iraq-Iran war were treated in the United Kingdom; and how many of these were affected by chemical and biological weapons.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not available.

Residential Homes

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money was spent by (a) regional and (b) district health authorities on building nursing and residential homes for (i) the elderly, (ii) the mentally ill and (iii) the disabled in each of the last five years; and what was the average cost per place in each category.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not collected centrally.

Water-Borne Pathogens

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if there has been evidence of increased reporting of any potentially water-borne pathogens in the Severn-Trent area in the last three months.

Mr. Dorrell: No such evidence has been recorded by the public health laboratory service.

Cold-related Deaths

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will produce a table to show, for each month of the last five years, the number of men aged 65 years and over, and women aged 60 years and over, who had died from (a) cold-related causes and (b) all causes, and for each of the last 20 years, for each quarter, the same information.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Hip Replacement

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average cost of in-patient treatment per hospital bed per week for a hip replacement operation; what is the total spent on such operations in the last year for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 11 February 1991]: The cost of a hip replacement is estimated to be £2,780 at 1989-90 prices. Since this cost is dependent on the length of patient's stay no meaningful average hospital in-patient cost can be given. During 1989-90 some 45,000 hip replacement operations were performed at an estimated total cost of £125·3 million.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Hazardous Waste

Mr. Hume: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, whether the Northern Ireland Environment Minister has reached an agreement or understanding with the Irish Republic's Environment Minister regarding the siting of a hazardous waste incinerator at Maydown.

Mr. Needham: No.

Mr. Hume: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his policy on whether planning permission would be given to any hazardous waste incinerator in Northern Ireland without referral to a public inquiry.

Mr. Needham: Each planning application is treated on its merits depending on the scale and type of development proposed. A planning application for a major development involving a hazardous waste incinerator would not be determined without a public inquiry being held under the terms of article 22 of the Planning (Northern Ireland) Order 1972.

Pensioners

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will seek to have higher costs to pensioners living in Northern Ireland reflected in higher pension rates for Northern Ireland pensioners.

Mr. Hanley: No. It is the Government's policy to maintain social security benefits at the same level throughout the United Kingdom.

Disabled Workers

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many employers with 20 or more people employ a 3 per cent. quota of registered disabled people.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 15 February 1991]: In June 1990, 291 employers with 20 or more people were known to employ a 3 per cent. quota of registered disabled people.

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what grants are available for employers in Northern Ireland to enable handicapped people to operate machinery.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 15 February 1991]: The adaptations of premises and equipment scheme administered by the disablement advisory services of the Training and Employment Agency, provides financial assistance to those employers who need to make essential alterations to machinery and equipment to facilitate their disabled employees.

Severe Weather Payments

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to the answer from the Secretary of State for Social Services to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on 7 February 1991, Official Report, column 251, whether the changes to the cold weather payment scheme apply to Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 15 February 1991]: I am glad to be able to confirm that payments of £6 will be made on the same basis as in Great Britain.

WALES

European Regional Development Fund

12. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total value of grants which Wales has received from the European regional development fund in each of the past three years.

Mr. David Hunt: Figures for European regional development fund assistance committed to Wales in each of the last three years are as follows: 1988 £63·3 million; 1989 £28·8 million; and 1990 £27·4 million.

Recession

13. Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the impact of the current recession on business and employment in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: It is encouraging that the Government's policy of fighting inflation is working and although the economy of Wales, like the rest of the United Kingdom, is experiencing a difficult time at present, all the indications suggest that the medium to long-term prospects for the Welsh economy are as good as ever.

Welsh Language

14. Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what progress has been made with the implementation of the national curriculum in respect of the Welsh language.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Implementation of Welsh in the national curriculum is proceeding to timetable.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many teachers are employed full time in Wales teaching the Welsh language to adults; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the total annual expenditure incurred by public authorities in Wales in teaching the Welsh language to adults.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Information on the expenditure by local authorities on Welsh classes for adults is not held centrally. However, in 1990-91 Welsh Office grants worth £428,000 were made available to a range of organisations to support activities in this field.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he is proposing to take to implement the draft Welsh Language Bill prepared by the Welsh Language Board, and which has been submitted to him; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The Welsh Language Board's proposals for legislation will be carefully considered and the Government's response will be announced in due course.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what studies have been undertaken by the Welsh Office of techniques and methods of teaching the Basque language to non-Basque-speaking adults in the Basque country.

Sir Wyn Roberts: None.

CBI

15. Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he plans to meet the CBI in Wales to discuss the economic situation in the Principality.

Mr. David Hunt: I meet representatives of the CBI in Wales regularly to discuss a wide range of issues relevant to the development of the Welsh economy.

Labour Statistics

16. Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people are now out of work in (a) Clwyd and (b) Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: In January 1991 there were 11,383 and 101,452 unemployed claimants in Clwyd and Wales respectively.

21. Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the latest percentage figures he has for unemployment in the Wrexham travel-to-work area and in Wales as a whole.

Mr. David Hunt: Unemployment in the Wrexham travel-to-work area currently stands at 6·4 per cent. of the work force compared with a figure in Wales as a whole of 7·8 per cent.

Investment

17. Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he next proposes to meet the chairmen of the major clearing banks to discuss future investments in companies in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: I meet the major clearing banks periodically to discuss a range of matters, including progress of the Welsh economy.

18. Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales by what amount inward investment in Wales has increased over the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. David Hunt: There has been a 75 per cent. increase in the number of inward investment projects secured for Wales over the past five years. In 1990, 142 projects were secured, promising some 16,000 jobs and capital investment of almost £640 million.

Renal Units

19. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he has any plans to develop the services provided by renal units in 1991-92.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Following wide consultation on the future of regional services in Wales, the development of renal services will, from April, fall to district health authorities subject to monitoring by the Department.

Hospitals (Construction Projects)

20. Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all the major construction projects on district general hospitals, currently under way or due to start, which are funded wholly or partly by moneys allocated to district health authorities by the Welsh Office.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The number of projects is shown in the following table:

Foreign Languages

22. Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many pupils from state schools in Wales passed with A, B or C grades in French, German or Spanish A-level in each of the years 1987 to date; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: In 1990 a total of 614 advanced-level certificates were issued by the Welsh Joint Education Committee in grades A to C in French, German and Spanish to school pupils in Wales.

The detailed information is as follows:

Grade	1987	1988	1989	1990
French
A	61	67	91	92
B	111	93	109	144

Hospital Waiting Lists

23. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what progress has been made during this financial year in reducing hospital waiting lists.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Detailed information on waiting lists at September 1990 will be published soon which I fully expect to show that Welsh hospitals continue to treat record numbers of patients. Since 1979 in-patient and out-patient attendance has increased by some 34 per cent. and 28 per cent. respectively.

Local Government Finance

24. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what changes he plans in the method of distributing transitional payments for poll tax reductions.

Mr. David Hunt: I have no plans for changing the arrangements for distributing the relief payments totalling £62 million under the community charge reduction scheme, which I announced in the House in my statement of 17 January. These arrangements, taken together with the realistic local government finance settlement for Wales in 1991-92, represent an excellent deal for the Welsh charge payer.

Mr. Grist: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he is now in a position to announce his decisions on the allocation of the £18 million additional resources he announced on 17 January.

Mr. David Hunt: I shall be announcing today details of an £8·14 million increase in local authority capital provision.

I propose to allocate transport grants totalling £6 million for road improvements in Mid and West Glamorgan. PRNI (projects of regional and national importance) funding of £400,000 will also be made available for new rolling stock on the city line in Cardiff.

I have also decided to provide substantial additional resources for the urban programme. A further £1,745,000 will be directed to a range of projects including £275,000 each for the establishment of small business units at Shotton enterprise centre and provision of an all-weather playing surface at Deep Duffryn. A total of £250,000 will be spent on road improvements at Crumlin and £345,000 for highway and environmental programmes in Cardiff. I shall also be providing £100,000 for the purchase of land and the construction of factory units at Holyhead. Finally, I have been encouraged by the excellent response we have received to the valleys community revival scheme. I have therefore decided that, in order to make room for further, worth while projects, an extra £500,000 should be awarded under the scheme.

I shall announce further details of local authority capital provision as soon as possible.

Housing, Swansea

25. Mr. Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will discuss with Swansea city council special assistance towards the problems of prefabricated reinforced concrete houses, in particular, and the future housing role of Welsh local authorities.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: I understand that a consultants' report on the matter has only recently been made available to the council for consideration. I have no doubt that discussions involving my officials will follow. I look to this local authority and to all others to act as effective enablers in tackling housing functions working in close partnerships with housing associations and the private sector.

Hill Livestock Compensatory Allowances

26. Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about the payment to farmers of hill livestock compensatory allowances.

Mr. David Hunt: I announced the substantial increases proposed for HLCA rates—worth an extra £4·7 million to Welsh farmers—on 11 February. Claim forms have previously been issued to farmers and my officials will be giving the highest priority to the processing of these claims. Subject to parliamentary approval of the new rates and the necessary checks farmers in Wales will receive their money as quickly as possible.

Dairy Cattle

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many dairy cows there were in Wales in 1988 and 1989; and what information he has on the corresponding figures for the Irish Republic, Denmark and Spain.

Mr. David Hunt: The information requested is shown in the table:

thousand head

	Number of dairy cows in December
	1988	1989
Wales	336	331
Irish Republic	1,387	1,400
Denmark	764	770
Spain	1,741	1,822

Common Agricultural Policy Payments

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much the total payments received by the agricultural industry in Wales were under the common agricultural policy in each of the last three years.

Mr. David Hunt: Total expenditure in the United Kingdom under the common agricultural policy in the last three years was:

	£ million
1987-88	1,611·1
1988-89	1,362·9
1989-90	1,230·5

Although it is possible to identify some of the payments which have been made to the agriculture industry in Wales—details are contained in the annual appropriation accounts, class XVII, votes I and II, Wales—it is not possible to disaggregate all United Kingdom common agricultural policy expenditure in this way.

Export Clinics

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many of the export clinics held under the Welsh Office valleys export service have been held in the Llanelli travel-to-work area.

Mr. David Hunt: Thirty-three export services clinics have been held in the valleys programme area: three of them have been held within the Llanelli travel-to-work area, with two further clinics at Pontardulais, which is easily accessible to companies based in the Llanelli area. A further clinic at Llanelli itself is scheduled for the programme in the coming quarter.

Valleys Loan Scheme

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many projects located in the Llanelli travel-to-work area have benefited from the Welsh Development Agency valleys loan scheme for small businesses.

Mr. David Hunt: There have been no applications from the Llanelli travel-to-work area for the Welsh Development Agency's valleys small loans scheme. Other Welsh Development Agency loans in the Llanelli area since the inception of the valleys programme total £36,000.

Hospitals (Postal Services)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the chairmen of the South Glamorgan and Mid Glamorgan health authorities concerning the frequency of misdirected post, samples and medical records between the Prince of Wales hospital, Rhydlafar, the Prince of Wales hospital, Bridgend and the Prince Charles hospital, Merthyr.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: This is a matter for the health authorities concerned which advise that they are not aware of any such problems.

Surplus School Places

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if any changes have been made or are proposed to the criteria for determining the capacity of schools as laid down in Welsh Office circular 20/88.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Welsh Office circular 20/88 includes a suggested method for determining the capacity of primary schools. We are currently consulting education interests in Wales on draft proposals to introduce more open enrolment into primary schools from the start of the 1992 school year. The proposals include an alternative formula for calculating the capacity of primary schools. More open enrolment for secondary schools was introduced with effect from 4 August 1990. Welsh Office circular 47/88 contains an annex suggesting a method for calculating capacity in these schools.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the current level of surplus places in each local education authority in Wales separately distinguishing primary and secondary schools.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The information requested is as follows:

	Surplus places
	Primary	Secondary
Clwyd	11,151	2,913
Dyfed	9,178	2,089
Gwent	10,009	10,527
Gwynedd	4,469	4,412
Mid Glamorgan	13,663	7,556
Powys	3,096	1,477
South Glamorgan	12,196	8,907
West Glamorgan	14,213	7,496

TRANSPORT

Drink Driving

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the numbers of random breath tests required to detect each week (a) 1,000 drivers above twice the legal alcohol limit, (b) 1,000 drivers above the legal limit but below twice the limit, and (c) 50,000 drivers below the legal limit.

Mr. Chope: Data from the roadside surveys undertaken by the transport and road research laboratory in 1990 indicate that the following numbers of tests would be required:

(a) 625,000
(b) 116,000
(c) 50,500

These surveys were carried out on Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights—the high-risk periods for drink-driving. They are, therefore, likely to underestimate the number of tests required to detect drivers over the legal limit at other times.

Vehicle Emissions

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) which of those organisations that responded to the consultation document of 20 September 1990 were in favour of tighter MOT emission standards than those outlined;

(2) further to his reply of 22 January, Official Report, column 111, if he will discuss with the European Commission the future introduction of MOT motor vehicle emission standards based on individual manufacturers' specifications.

Mr. Chope: A number of those consulted suggested tighter emission standards than those proposed or limits based on manufacturers' settings. The EC type approval directive on emissions precludes the setting of standards which are stricter than those to which vehicles were required to conform when new. But, as many vehicles are capable of achieving emission levels well within the limits which will be set in the regulations, we have made it clear that motorists should aim to have their vehicles tuned to manufacturers' settings wherever possible.

The standards we have proposed are intended to be a first step in in-service emissions checking, and standards will be progressively tightened in the future. The European Commission has already initiated discussions with member states on harmonised standards for emission testing. If resulting European legislation permits us to test to manufacturers' settings we shall consider the matter further.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) further to his reply of 22 January, Official Report, column 111, when he now plans to sign enabling regulations relating to MOT motor vehicle emission standards; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what assessment he has made of MOT vehicle test emission standards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Franks) on 13 February, at column 464.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will incorporate manufacturing design standards into a servicing schedule for cars;

(2) if he will introduce an effective system for checking pollution from vehicles on the road, including those under three years of age.

Mr. Chope: Proper engine tuning is important for all vehicles, including those less than three years old. All motorists are well advised to ensure that their engine tuning is checked when they have their vehicles serviced. We are encouraging vehicle manufacturers to consider including engine tuning in routine service schedules.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what roles he has assigned to (a) local authorities, (b) the vehicle inspectorate and (c) the police in on-the-road checks for pollution control; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The new in-service emission standards will be enforced primarily at MOT tests under the supervision of the vehicle inspectorate. In due course I envisage an increasing role for both the vehicle inspectorate and the police in roadside spot checks on emissions.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation to ensure that dedicated equipment for carbon monoxide testing is used in MOT testing; and if he will introduce a British standard for such equipment.

Mr. Chope: We are making arrangements to ensure that all types of emission-checking equipment which will be used in MOT testing have been certified to appropriate standards. As there is currently no British standard for such equipment, we are requiring that equipment should be designed and certified to the established international standard or an equivalent. I hope that the United Kingdom will play an active role in any further development of current equipment standards. Emission-checking equipment will not have to be dedicated to MOT testing, but we shall expect MOT test stations to have approved equipment available in MOT test bays whenever tests are being conducted.

Trains, London

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement concerning the current extent of one-person operation on the trains of the British Railways Board in the London travel-to-work area, the changes that have occurred since 1979, and those projected by the board.

Mr. Freeman: Many trains on routes into London and elsewhere are now one-person operated. Further extensions of one-person operation are an operational matter for the board and depend on various factors including the availability of suitable rolling stock and associated safety features such as cab radio.

Racism

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will call for a report from London Underground Ltd. on its response to the findings of the Commission for Racial Equality about the use of racist tests in appointing middle managers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I understand that London Underground Ltd. has already revised its selection methods and introduced equality targets for ethnic minority representation at all levels in the company. The Commission for Racial Equality has commented:

"The solutions introduced by London Underground serve a possible model for other employers".

Railway Drivers

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will request Her Majesty's railway inspectorate to survey the incidence of resignation or early retirement of railway drivers over the last 10 years, together with any matters related thereto.

Mr. Freeman: This is a matter for railway operators.

Driving Tests

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy that only Department of Transport-approved driving instructors will be allowed to undertake the retesting of convicted drunken drivers.

Mr. Chope: Our proposals for the retesting of certain disqualified drivers are set out in the Road Traffic Bill. The new extended tests will be carried out only by the Department's driving examiners.

Private Contractors

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much private contractors are charged when their construction and demolition work for private concerns blocks or hinders the public highway and pavements.

Mr. Chope: Under part IX of the Highways Act 1980, any person carrying out building or demolition work who places any scaffolding, other structure, hoarding, fence, builders' skip, or building materials which obstructs the highway is required to obtain a licence, permission or consent from the highway authority, and to comply with its terms. The highway authority does not have power to charge for occupation of the highway. The New Roads and Street Works Bill before Parliament includes an amendment to the Highways Act 1980 which would enable fees to be prescribed for the occupation of the highway in such circumstances.

Parking

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what legislation governs the illegal parking of vehicles partly or wholly on pavements; what the maximum penalty is for committing such an offence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: There is no uniform national provision which prohibits pavement parking.

The parking of heavy goods vehicles over 7·5 tonnes gross weight on the pavement, except when necessary for loading or unloading is an offence under section 19 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 and is subject to a standard fixed penalty notice—£16—or a maximum level 3 fine. London and a few provincial cities have taken equivalent local Act powers to extend this offence to other vehicles.

The latent power in paragraph 22 of schedule 2 to the Road Traffic (Consequential Provisions) Act 1988 which, if commenced, would introduce a new national offence of parking a vehicle, other than a heavy goods vehicle, on the verge of an urban road, or on the footway or on any land situated between two carriageways on an urban road is being repealed by the Road Traffic Bill.

I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) on 11 December 1990, at column 344.

East London River Crossing

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he now expects construction of the east London river crossing to start; and what is his latest estimate of the construction period.

Mr. Chope: The programme for construction depends on completion of the statutory procedures. Subject to that, the current timetable is for construction to start in 1992 and finish by 1996.

Blighted Homes

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his policy on the use of his discretionary powers to buy, in advance of statutory blight provisions becoming operable, homes that are blighted by the announcement of proposed new road works; and what criteria he adopts in deciding which homes he will buy.

Mr. Chope: Where there is a genuine possibility that any part of a property may be required for one of our highway schemes, we are empowered to consider advance acquisition under section 248 of the Highway Act 1980. For owner-occupied residential property the criteria against which each application for purchase is considered are:

(a) a compelling reason for wishing to sell immediately, other than the prospect of the highway scheme;
(b) the reason why a sale cannot be achieved except as a discount is because of the road proposal; and
(c) serious financial hardship would result if the Department did not buy.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport under what statutory powers his Department is currently purchasing homes that are blighted by the proposal to widen the M20 between junctions 3 and 5.

Mr. Chope: The majority of properties have been purchased under the blighted land provisions of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 contained in paragraph 16 of schedule 13. A few have been the subject of discretionary purchase under section 248 of the Highways Act 1980.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether personal hardship is a factor that he takes into account in deciding whether to use his discretionary powers to buy, in advance of statutory blight provisions becoming operable, homes that are blighted by the announcement of proposed new road works.

Mr. Chope: Yes, for those homes where there is a genuine possibility that part of the land may be required for proposed new road works.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will specify the legislative provisions that give him statutory powers to buy, in advance of statutory blight provisions becoming operable, homes that are blighted by the announcement of proposed new road works.

Mr. Chope: Section 248 of the Highways Act gives my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State power to acquire, at his discretion, property not immediately required for road purposes but which in his opinion may be so required.

Cyprus Airways

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what assessment he has made of the impact of free sale arrangements offered by Cyprus Airways, as a result of subsidies by the Cyprus Government, on British operators;

(2) what discussions have been held with the Government of Cyprus on the implications for fair competition of the subsidy given by that Government to Cyprus Airways.

Mr. McLoughlin: My Department holds regular talks with representatives of the Government of Cyprus on all aspects of our bilateral aviation relationship. We are always prepared to consider any complaint from British airlines who believe they may be facing unfair competition.

Airline Companies

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will approach the European Commission to seek assistance for airline operators in Europe in order to survive the impact of the Gulf war, to be given in such a way as to ensure that British companies are operating on a level playing field both inside and outside Europe.

Mr. McLoughlin: The EC Commissioner for competition has already indicated that if Governments wish to make subsidies available to their airlines, the Commission will be concerned to ensure that competition is not unduly distorted to the detriment of consumers and of airlines whose governments do not think that giving subsidies is an appropriate response to current problems. The Government welcome this approach.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what processes are available for reconsideration of licences where a foreign government are subsidising their national airline in such a way as to offer unfair competition to United Kingdom operators.

Mr. McLoughlin: Within the European Community, subsidies are governed by the treaty of Rome rules. Outside the EC, the effect of subsidies to national airlines on competition would fall to be considered under the terms of individual bilateral arrangements between the United Kingdom and other countries.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the Government subsidy provided to the airline Sabena during the Gulf crisis on (a) British airlines with which it is in competition and (b) the creation of a level playing field in air transport within Europe and worldwide.

Mr. McLoughlin: I understand that while Sabena has said that it would like a subsidy, the Belgian Government have not announced that they will give one. Any proposal for state aid by EC member states to national airlines would have to be notified to the EC Commission, which would be concerned to ensure that there is no undue distortion of the competition in the aviation market.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) whether he will make arrangements (a) to facilitate extended credit for United Kingdom air operators and (b) to provide direct financial assistance to small airlines to enable them to absorb the impact of the Gulf war;

(2) what assessment he has made of the impact on (a) fair competition and (b) British air operators of fuel subsidies offered by foreign Governments to their operators; and if he has any plans to help United Kingdom operators in this respect.

Mr. McLoughlin: It is for airlines themselves to respond to changing market conditions in the light of their commercial judgment.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will arrange for Civil Aviation Authority charges to be waived or deferred in order to safeguard the position of United Kingdom operators during the Gulf war.

Mr. McLoughlin: I have no plans to do so.

Semtex

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if the security systems installed at United Kingdom airports to which he refers in his reply to the hon. Member for Newport, West of 8 February, Official Report, column 255, are able to detect Semtex explosives in addition to detonation devices in bombs.

Mr. McLoughlin: I am not prepared to reveal details of security systems or their capabilities.

Showmen's HGVs

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what specific restrictions in respect of the carriage of goods apply to vehicles in taxation class, "Restricted Showman's HGV".

Mr. Chope [holding answer 15 February 1991]: A showman's goods vehicle is a vehicle permanently fitted with a living van or some other special type of body or superstructure, forming part of the equipment of a travelling show. The vehicle must be registered in the name of a person who follows the business of a travelling showman and used solely for that purpose. This means that the only goods to be carried must be directly related to the occupation of travelling showman. The restricted showman's HGV class applies to such vehicles which, although over 3,500 kg gross vehicle weight, cannot be taxed according to their plated weight because they are exempt from plating and testing.

MOT Test

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the categories of road vehicles exempt from the three-yearly MOT test.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 15 February 1991]: Exemptions from the MOT test are listed in regulation 6 of the Motor Vehicles (Tests) Regulation 1981, No. 1694, as amended. I refer the hon. Member to page 7524/1 of the "Encyclopedia of Road Traffic Law and Practice" volume 3, a copy of which is in the Library.

Greater Manchester Relief Road

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to publish the details he has received of a proposed alternative route for the Greater Manchester northern and western relief road.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 15 February 1991]: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, South (Mr. Sumberg) on 11 February at column 308.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Privy Council

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Lord President of the Council (1) on what basis briefings are made on a Privy Council basis;

(2) on what basis decisions are made on a Privy Council basis that are not subsequently explicitly approved by Parliament.

Mr. MacGregor: It is not the practice to disclose information on this subject.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Video Facility

Ms. Walley: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will make immediate temporary arrangements to enable hon. Members to have access to a dedicated video viewing facility whenever the House is sitting.

Mr. MacGregor: It has been agreed by the Services Committee that a dedicated video viewing facility is to be established in the House and will be run by the Library. That facility is expected to be available in the autumn. It is unlikely that any arrangement, other than that which already exists in the television viewing rooms, can be identified before that time.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Soviet Union

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what representations have been made in respect of Georgy Molodchikov of Kiev who has been unsuccessfully applying to leave the Soviet Union;

(2) what representations have been made in respect of Emil Tsilpen of Moscow who has been unsuccessfully applying to leave the Soviet Union;

(3) what representations have been made in respect of Ruben Ustayev of Tashkent who has been unsuccessfully applying to leave the Soviet Union.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We can certainly raise these cases with the Soviet authorities, but in order to make our representations most effective we shall need further details.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made in respect of Elena Morgulis of Sverdlovsk who has been unsuccessfully applying to leave the Soviet Union.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Mrs. Morgulis' case has been added to the list of cases which we regularly raise with the Soviet authorities. We shall continue to press all these cases until a satisfactory outcome is achieved.

United Nations

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on the United Nations optional protocol on civil and political rights.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: As we have accepted the right of individual petition under the European convention on human rights and the compulsory jurisdiction of the European Court, we have accepted the strongest available mechanism for individual petition available to us and therefore need not accept that offered by the optional protocol.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what requests for action to be taken have been made to the Security Council of the United Nations, under chapter VII of the United Nations charter, following the allied bombing of Iraqi nuclear facilities.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: None.

Foreign Visitors (Safety)

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps Her Majesty's embassies and consulates are taking to assure intending visitors to the United Kingdom and tourist operators that it is safe to come here.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: British missions overseas are advising intending travellers that it is safe to visit the United Kingdom although visitors should of course take all normal precautions. Posts are reassuring travellers that security precautions have been increased, particularly around airports.

Disarmament Conference

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made by Her Majesty's Government's representatives to the conference on disarmament concerning the consequences of military attacks on civil nuclear facilities.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: None.

International Labour Adviser

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will publish the manning level of the international labour adviser's Department and the comparable figures for five, 10 and 25 years ago;

(2) what are the functions of the international labour adviser in his Department;

(3) if he will make a statement about the future of his office's international labour adviser's Department.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The manning levels including support staff, for the office of international labour adviser are as follows:

	Staff
1991	3
1986	3
1981	5
1966	8

Two reviews have recently been carried out on the need for a separate office of ILA. The conclusion endorsed by Ministers was that retention is no longer justified.

The function of the ILA has been liaison between United Kingdom Government Departments, overseas posts, FCO departments and British trade union organisations on international labour and social questions, and to offer advice as necessary.

Occupied Territories

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the extent to which the Israelis are using the cover of hostilities to increase the settlement of the occupied territories.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have no information to suggest that settlement activity has intensified since the beginning of hostilities.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the living conditions in the occupied territories; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have seen a worrying decline in living standards in the occupied territories since the Gulf crisis began. We are particularly concerned at the impact of the continuing curfew and have made our views known to the Israeli authorities.

Equatorial Guinea

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made since 1979 to the Government of Equatorial Guinea concerning the abuse of human rights in that country.

Mrs. Chalker: The United Kingdom and Equatorial Guinea do not maintain resident missions in each other's capitals. Relations are minimal and contacts few. We have made no representations to the Government of Equatorial Guinea on human rights.

BBC World Service

Mr. Temple-Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will ensure that the extra costs incurred by the BBC World Service in performing additional tasks as a result of the Gulf war will be met by Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave on 1 February to my hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot) which stated that the cash limit for class II, vote 3 (external broadcasting and monitoring) would be increased by £4,760,000. Of this sum £1,160,000 will be devoted to extra expenditure incurred in this financial year as a result of the Gulf war. The remaining costs of extra broadcasting to the end of this financial year are being met from existing Foreign and Commonwealth Office funds.

The Gulf

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what policy objectives with regard to the Gulf war have been discussed with or agreed with Israel.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Our objectives are those of the United Nations Security Council; to eject Iraqi forces entirely from Kuwait; to restore the legitimate Government of Kuwait; and to restore international peace and stability to the region. We believe the Israelis share them.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the considerations underlying the policy of deferring steps to resolve the Arab-Israeli dispute until the conclusion of the conflict in the Gulf.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Iraqi occupation of Kuwait has created a situation in which it is not realistic to expect progress on Arab-Israel. We regret this. But it is the fault of Saddam Hussein, who has gravely damaged the Palestinian cause. We shall return to this problem with renewed vigour as soon as Iraq has left Kuwait.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the economic effects on less-developed countries of the Gulf war.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development to the hon. Member for Bristol, South (Ms. Primarolo) on 3 December 1990 at coloumn 18. The assessment is still complicated by uncertainty over the future level of oil prices, which have fallen significantly in recent weeks.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government are taking to ensure humanitarian needs within Iraq can be met by international agencies.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: As I informed the House on 8 February, we have been in close contact for several months with the United Nations humanitarian agencies and with the International Committee of the Red Cross about contingency planning for the Gulf crisis.

The United Nations Disaster Relief Organisation has co-ordinated contingency plans for dealing with refugees and displaced persons from Kuwait and Iraq with the other relief organisations. We have pledged some £3 million to this and the International Committee of the Red Cross's appeals, further to the £11 million pledged bilaterally and through the European Community last year.

The International Committee of the Red Cross has sent two consignments of medicines to Baghdad. The World Health Organisation (WHO) and UNICEF are sending further medical supplies.

It is for the United Nations Sanctions Committee to determine whether a humanitarian case for food supplies for Iraq (and Kuwait) exists. So far the sanctions committee has been unable to take a position due to the lack of an independent assessment.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further information he has about atrocities committed by Iraqi soldiers in Kuwait; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Recent information from inside Kuwait shows that the Iraqis continue to carry out a regime of arrests and tortures similar to that graphically described in the Amnesty International reports of October and December last year. Kuwaiti and foreign residents, including women and children, are being tortured and executed for offences such as carrying opposition literature or refusing to display portraits of Saddam Hussein. Recently reports have been received of an incident involving the hanging of a number of women.

Weapons Technology

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with his European Community counterparts to reach an accord that would effectively prevent European firms from providing technology and equipment that would enable another country to acquire weaponry of mass destruction.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We and our partners in the Twelve regularly discuss measures to combat the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. The European Council in Rome in December 1990 identified non-proliferation as a possible area for intensified co-ordination among the Twelve.

Ivory

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many spot checks have been made by the Hong Kong authorities on ivory-holding premises since 19 October 1990; and if any irregularities were discovered.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd [holding answer 1 February 1991]: A total of 142 spot checks have been made by the Hong Kong authorities on ivory-holding premises since 19 October 1990. No irregularities were discovered.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current number of possession licences issued to holders of ivory stocks in Hong Kong.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd [holding answer 1 February 1991]: As at 31 January 1991, there were 983 possession licences held by 868 commercial ivory stockholders in Hong Kong.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current total of all ivory known to be held in Hong Kong; and on what date it was assessed.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd [holding answer 1 February 1991]: When last assessed on 17 July 1990, the total commercial ivory stock held in Hong Kong was 463 tonnes to the nearest tonne.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the information on countries of origin of tusks held in Hong Kong has been forwarded to the World Wide Fund for Nature.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd [holding answer 1 February 1991]: Information on the countries of origin of tusks held in Hong Kong was forwarded to WWF Hong Kong on 1 February 1991.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if any ivory has been confiscated by the Hong Kong authorities since 17 October 1990; and if any prosecutions for illegal export have been entered since that date.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd [holding answer 1 February 1991: A total of 20·1 kg of worked ivory was seized by the Hong Kong authorities between 17 October 1990 and 31 January 1991. This ivory will be confiscated if the prosecutions to be entered result in convictions. During the period, one prosecution for illegal exportation involving 10,091 pieces of ivory name seals and blocks seized in Japan was entered and was successful.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give details of ivory exported from Hong Kong since midnight on 17 July 1990.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd [holding answer 1 February 1991]: Since midnight on 17 July 1990, Hong Kong has fully complied with the requirements of CITES in respect of trade in African elephant ivory. Since that date there have been no exports of ivory except as expressly provided for under the convention.

Endangered Species

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give details of items from endangered species seized by the Hong Kong authorities in the second half of 1990 and the prosecutions arising from such seizures.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd [holding answer 1 February 1991]: In the second half of 1990, the Hong Kong authorities seized a wide variety of specimens of endangered species, from which 54 prosecutions arose. Details are as follows:

East Timor

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when (a) the United Nations Security Council, or (b) the European Community Council of Ministers last discussed (i) the Indonesian occupation of East Timor and (ii) the killings of the East Timor people and enforcement of United Nations resolutions on this matter.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd [holding answer 12 February 1991]: The last discussion in the United Nations Security Council of Indonesia's invasion of East Timor was on 22 April 1976. These matters have not been discussed by the Economic Community Council of Ministers.

Employment

Training and Enterprise Councils

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he intends to place a copy of the new training and enterprise council operating agreement and operating manual for 1991-92 in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: I intend to place a copy of the TEC operating agreement and the TEC operating manual in the Library during March. These documents will reflect the new flexibilities and responsibilities which TECs will have from April 1991.

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of the funding available to the training and enterprise councils may be spent on (a) administration and (b) promotion and advertising.

Mr. Jackson [holding answer 15 February 1991]: Budgets are allocated to individual TECs on the basis of proposals set out in their business and corporate plans. The proportion of funding allocated to promotion and advertising and administration varies between TECs.

Youth Training

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether training and enterprise councils are in 1991 guaranteeing every school leaver at age 16 years a suitable youth training place before Christmas.

Mr. Jackson: Training and enterprise councils are contracted to meet the Government's guarantee of the offer of suitable training for all under-18s who have left school, are not in a job and who are seeking a place on youth training. The guarantee applies continuously to young people in this situation until they reach their 18th birthday. The guarantee is their top priority within youth training funds and their business plans are closely scrutinised to ensure that they have made sufficient provision to meet it.

Employment Service

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the future of the employment service in Pickering and Malton, North Yorkshire.

Mr. Jackson: I wrote to my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), in whose constituency Pickering and Malton lie, on 13 February, to inform him of the plans for the future of the employment service in Malton and Pickering. The employment service is developing an enhanced service at Malton and plans to transfer the services from Pickering to Malton between the end of March and mid-April and to close the part-time offices at Pickering.

South Glamorgan TEC

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment on what date he received the second corporate plan of South Glamorgan training and enterprise council.

Mr. Jackson: As in the case of other TECs, my officials received several drafts of the corporate plan for South Glamorgan TEC.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he took into account the discussions between his area director for Wales and the chairman of South Glamorgan TEC concerning the desirability of William Cowlin and Sons proceeding with its tender for the new TEC building, before approving its corporate plan.

Mr. Jackson: The William Cowlin and Sons tender to refurbish premises for South Glamorgan TEC had been withdrawn before the plans were submitted for my right hon. and learned Friend's approval.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment on what date he approved the South Glamorgan TEC corporate plan.

Mr. Jackson: I approved the corporate plan for South Glamorgan TEC on 23 January.

Jobcentres

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people are employed by the Department in jobcentres in (a) Gwynedd and (b) Ynys Môn; and of that total how many are able to speak Welsh.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service executive agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Earnings

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has on a comparative basis of the average earnings of skilled, semi-skilled, unskilled men, and women, in manufacturing industry in Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries, at the latest convenient dates and five years ago in £ sterling equivalents and purchasing power equivalents.

Mr. Forth: The only information available is published by (a) the Statistical Office of the European Communities on the average gross hourly earnings of manual workers by industrial groups, in "Earnings: Industry and Services, No. 1 1990", a copy of which will be available shortly in the Library of the House; and (b) the International Labour Office on average wages by industry for OECD and other countries in "Yearbook of Labour Statistics 1989-90", a copy of which is available in the Library.

SCOTLAND

Neil Duncan

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the cost to the Exchequer of the police inquiry into the case of Neil Duncan and others.

Lord James Douglas Hamilton: The total estimated police cost was £65,000, of which the Exchequer share, in the form of police grant, would be £33,150.

Scottish Development Agency

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the levels of investment by the Scottish Development Agency in the Paisley, South constituency since 1983.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Agency expenditure (excluding running costs) on projects in the constituency is set out in the table.

Year	Expenditure £
1983-84	12,000
1984-85	251,000
1985-86	355,000
1986-87	86,000
1987-88	224,000
1988-89	236,000
1989-90	206,000

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to introduce legislation to encourage employers to recruit more disabled employees.

Mr. Allan Stewart: No.

CAP Payments

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much the total payments received by the agricultural industry in Scotland were under the common agricultural policy in each of the last three years.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Total expenditure in the United Kingdom under the common agricultural policy was:

	£ million
1987-88	1,611·1
1988-89	1,362·9
1989-90	1,230·5

Details of schemes with identifiable expenditure in Scotland are given in the annual appropriation accounts volume 9: class XVI Scotland. It is not possible to disaggregate all United Kingdom CAP expenditure in this way.

Local Health Councils

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the likely effectiveness of local health councils which are appointed by the health boards they are empowered to monitor.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The role of health boards is changing. Increasingly they will be concerned with strategic issues and with the procurement of services to meet the health needs of their areas. Councils are likely to concentrate on the services provided. The two roles are mutually compatible and supportive.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the budgeted expenditure per head of population of each of the Scottish regional councils in 1990-91.

Mr. Allan Stewart [holding answer 15 February 1991]: The information is set out in the table:

1990-91 Budget Estimates per head of population

Borders	850·13
Central	775·74
Dumfries and Galloway	816·00
Fife	819·06
Grampian	761·23
Highland	1,017·12
Lothian	829·85
Strathclyde	855·50
Tayside	819·12

Note:
Figures have been calculated using total relevant current expenditure including loan and leasing charges and population figures at June 1989.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the income per head of each of the Scottish regions from the Scottish Office, revenue support grant and non-domestic rates in 1990-91.

Mr. Allan Stewart [holding answer 15 February 1991]: The information is set out in the table:

	1990-91 Revenue support grant per head of population £	1990-91 Non-domestic rates per head of population £
Borders	558·71	96·85
Central	383·71	175·41
Dumfries and Galloway	510·77	122·23
Fife	374·05	202·40
Grampian	435·25	161·82
Highland	613·28	178·23
Lothian	315·13	206·88
Strathclyde	450·68	174·67
Tayside	445·83	149·25

Enterprise Ayrshire

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what allocation he has made to Enterprise Ayrshire for training for the coming financial year; what is the allocation to the existing equivalent programmes for the current year; what estimate he has of the reduction in training places as a result; what effect it will have on permanent and temporary employees inherited by Enterprise Ayrshire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart [holding answer 15 February 1991]: There is no specific allocation of resources to individual training programmes in the current year in respect of the area for which Enterprise Ayrshire will be responsible for organising Government-financed training provision from 1 April. The allocation of resources for 1991-92 to individual local enterprise companies is a matter for Scottish Enterprise rather than my right hon. Friend. The number of training places to be provided next year in individual local enterprise company areas is a matter for consideration by the relevant local enterprise company, in consultation with Scottish Enterprise. It depends upon a wide range of factors and is not the subject of estimates by the Scottish Office. Staffing complements are also a matter for consideration between local enterprise companies and Scottish Enterprise. However, it is important to be clear that local enterprise companies do not directly inherit any staff. Staff from the Training Agency and the Scottish Development Agency have the statutory right to an offer of employment with Scottish Enterprise. Any arrangements to second staff to local enterprise companies do not detract from that statutory right.

Hospitals

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what contribution he made towards the cost of the management consultants' reports on the parallel business plans for a national health service trust and managed unit within the health board for the South Ayrshire hospitals; what was the total cost of the study; and who else contributed towards it.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 15 February 1991]: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) at volume 185, columns 87-88.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received concerning the study being undertaken into a national health service trust for South Ayrshire hospitals; what has been the nature of such representations; and what action he proposes to take as a result.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 15 February 1991]: I have received a number of representations concerning trust status for South Ayrshire hospitals, all of which will be given careful consideration.

Food Poisoning

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many research projects on food poisoning the Scottish Office is funding in Scotland; and if he will list them.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 15 February 1991]: The following research projects in Scotland relevant to food poisoning are being funded by the Scottish Office.

1. Rapid methods of determining bacterial numbers in milk and milk products.
2. The properties, particularly in respect to pathogenicity, of spore forming organisms in milk.
3. The source and factors controlling the growth of Listeria spp in milk and milk products.
4. Quantify the routes and describe the factors regulating the transmission of micro-organisms in eggs.
5. Biochemical activity, virulence factors and food chain distribution of Yersinia enterocolitica.
6. Listeriosis: A case control study to test the hypothesis that the consumption or handling of "high risk" foods are risk factors in acquiring infection.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cases of food poisoning were detected and treated in Scotland in 1988, 1989 and 1990.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 15 February 1991]: The numbers of confirmed notifications by doctors to health boards of cases of food poisoning in these years were 2,998, 3,197 and 3,037 (provisional) respectively. Information about the treatment of individual patients is not held centrally.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) under 25-year-olds, (b) 25 to 35-year-olds and (c) over 35-year-olds are unemployed in (i) Scotland, (ii) Strathclyde and (iii) Glasgow; and how many in each age group have been unemployed for more than 12 months.

Mr. Allan Stewart [holding answer 15 February 1991]: The available information for those aged under 25, aged 25 to 34 years old and aged 35 years or over can be obtained from the NOMIS database in the House of Commons Library. Library staff are ready to assist in accessing the information if necessary.

DEFENCE

Welsh Service Personnel

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will publish figures outlining the number of applicants and entrants to (a) the Army, (b) the Royal Navy and Royal Marines and (c) the Royal Air Force who (i) were born in Wales and (ii) who are normally resident in Wales;

(2) of those members of the United Kingdom regular forces serving in the Gulf, how many are normally resident in Wales; and if he will publish separate figures for (a) the Army, (b) the Royal Air Force and (c) the Royal Navy and Royal Marines.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information requested is not held centrally and could not be obtained without disproportionate cost.

The Gulf

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on the number of deaths of (a) military personnel and (b) civilians that have occurred as a direct result of the outbreak of hostilities in the Gulf.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest estimate of military casualties to date in the Gulf conflict.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Her Majesty's Government are not in a position to provide an overall estimate of the number of people killed so far during hostilities. The United Kingdom has no personnel confirmed as killed as a direct result of hostilities.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on how many civil servants have been called up as reservists for service in the Gulf; and if he will make a statement on the effect of such calls-ups on their pay, posts and promotion prospects.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The civilian employment of reservists called out for service as a result of the Gulf conflict is not centrally recorded. Reservists called out from the civil service will be paid the military pay appropriate to their service rank. If necessary, under established balance of civil pay procedures, they will also receive additional payments from their previously employing Department to bring total emoluments up to the level of their civil service pay. Posts will be kept available for reservist staff called out for service and their promotion prospects will be unaffected.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the resolution of the House of 21 January on the Gulf represents Her Majesty's Government's policy.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Yes.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what steps have been taken to minimise civilian casualties in the Gulf conflict wherever possible; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what advice he has issued to British commanders on how minimising civilian casualties should be interpreted;

(3) what consideration has been given in authorising the use of B-52 bombers by the allied coalition to minimising civilian casualties wherever possible;

(4) what is his latest estimate of civilian casualties to date in the Gulf conflict.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Allied pilots have instructions only to attack targets which could pose a threat to allied forces or facilities supporting Iraq's occupation of Kuwait. These attacks are carefully planned, with the aim of minimising the risk of causing civilian casualties. Iraq has made varying claims about the number of civilian casualties, but we are unable to verify these claims.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what losses have been suffered to date in the middle east by (a) the allies and (b) the United Kingdom.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: In the air campaign so far, six RAF Tornado GR1s have failed to return from missions over Iraq. A further Tornado GR1 was lost following a mechanical failure immediately after take-off. The United States announced on 15 February that, in addition to the United Kingdom losses, coalition forces have lost a further 22 aircraft to enemy action.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action the joint information bureau has taken to police and enforce the media ground rules for reporting the Gulf war.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The allied joint information bureaux provide contact points for journalists and as such do not directly police and enforce the ground rules for reporting. Responsibility for policing and enforcing these ground rules falls to various authorities, including individual national staffs who man the bureaux. British authorities in theatre routinely raise with journalists aspects of compliance with the ground rules. In certain cases the Saudi authorities will take direct action.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what basis (a) war facts and information are withheld and (b) disinformation released.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Government's policy is to allow all reasonable freedom and access for reporting, subject only to constraints essential to protect the safety of coalition forces and the security of allied operations.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what provisions have been made for the long-term management of sewage and waste oils from military operations arising from the British forces in the Saudi Arabian desert.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: In desert areas sewage is incinerated, while waste oil is drained into drums carried for this purpose and removed to a civilian disposal facility.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what protective measures have been taken to protect British forces in the Gulf from being bitten by the camel spider, scorpions, the carpet viper, the black desert cobra, the horned viper and desert ants.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: All personnel moving to the Gulf are briefed on the particular health risks associated with the local environment, including those posed by arachnids, reptiles and insects. Normal military clothing and footwear are considered sufficient protection in normal circumstances and we have no knowledge of any specific problems concerning the species mentioned.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the policy of the Royal Air Force operating in the Gulf in regard to targets of opportunity; and what guidance is given to pilots to judge whether such targets are civilian.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Allied pilots have instructions to attack only targets which could pose a threat to allied forces or facilities supporting Iraq's occupation of Kuwait. On occasions, aircraft have returned with their bombs because their crews have been unable to identify their target clearly.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will obtain a copy of the account of Mr. Ramsey Clark concerning the damage caused to residential areas in Iraq from allied bombing raids.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We are unable to confirm the claims made by Mr. Ramsey Clark about damage to residential areas in Iraq.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what facilities are available in Bundeswehr hospitals for Gulf wounded.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There are no plans to use Bundeswehr hospitals for the treatment of British personnel wounded in the Gulf.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his assessment of the effect of the interdiction of Iraqi logistic systems on the non-Iraqi population of Kuwait.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The people of Kuwait have had to suffer over six months of occupation and ill-treatment by Iraq. Conditions for the Kuwaiti people will improve only when that occupation is ended, which is the aim of the allied military campaign.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what military objectives in the Gulf have been discussed or agreed with Israel.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The aims of the coalition forces are those laid down by the United Nations Security Council.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his assessment of the level of civilian casualties to date in Basra.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Iraq has made numerous claims about civilian casualties resulting from the allied air campaign, including in the Basra area. We are unable to verify Iraq's claims.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the military purpose served by the destruction of the justice and local government ministries in Baghdad.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The justice and local government ministries form an integral part of the national command and control structure of Iraq.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether any of the Patriot missile launchers are located in the occupied territories.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Deployments of Patriot missile launchers in defence of Israel are a matter for the Israeli Government.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his assessment of the length of time in which the Al-Amerieh bunker had been used as an air raid shelter.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The bunker attacked in Baghdad on 13 February was constructed in the early 1980s during the Iran-Iraq war, but, as the United States has said, it was converted to a military command and control facility in the late 1980s.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a detailed inquiry into the alleged destruction of a civil air raid shelter in Baghdad, and review procedures required to minimise the risk of any similar occurrence.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the bombing on 13 February of Iraqi civilians sheltering in the Baghdad air raid shelter.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The allied aim remains to keep civilian casualties to a minimum. The United States has made it clear that the bunker would not have been attacked if it had been known that the civilians were inside. The United Kingdom has the same policy.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will ensure that contracts for passenger and freight air transport during the current period are directed to British firms which have been subject to financial pressures due to the Gulf crisis.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: While reserving the right to secure charter air transport services by open competition, some 95 per cent. of Ministry of Defence contracts arising from the Gulf situation and related activities have been let to United Kingdom firms. A further 3 per cent. related to requirements which could not be met in the United Kingdom market.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what contingency plans exist to deal with large-scale contamination by anthrax spores of personnel serving in the Gulf.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A range of counter-measures have been taken, or are available, to deal with the possible use of chemical or biological weapons against our forces deployed in the Gulf. For obvious reasons, it is not our practice to comment on specific agents or counter-measures. We have made it clear ther Her Majesty's Government would view any use of such agents with very grave concern.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the defence of the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We welcome the continuing improvement in United Kingdom-Argentine relations and the contribution which this makes to security in the south Atlantic. The measures agreed between both Governments at Madrid last year for reciprocal consultation on military movements have helped the confidence-building process. We remain fully committed to the defence of the Falkland Islands and to maintaining adequate forces there for this purpose.

Incubators, Iraq

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his assessment of the effect of the war upon the usability of incubators in Iraq to save babies' lives.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Allied forces have not attacked hospitals and there is no reason to believe that Iraqi hospitals have been unable to continue to function. By contrast, evidence was given to the United Nations Security Council on 27 November 1990 of the deaths of 120 new-born babies in a Kuwaiti hospital when they were taken from their incubators by the Iraqis.

RAF (Training)

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much military low flying in the United Kingdom over the past 10 years was by non-RAF pilots; and from which nations these pilots came.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: As I indicated in my answer of 7 February to the right hon. Gentleman, Official Report, column 219, low flying by aircraft of other nations, apart from United States air force aircraft based in this country, amounts to less than 2 per cent. of total low flying activity over the past 10 years. Central records do not distinguish the individual nations concerned and it would involve disproportionate cost and effort to try to establish this information.

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what contracts or agreements Her Majesty's Government have entered into over the past 10 years for the Royal Air Force to train foreign pilots in low flying.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I have nothing to add to the reply which I gave the right hon. Gentleman on 7 February, Official Report, column 219.

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which countries' nationals have received pilot and navigational training by the Royal Air Force in the United Kingdom over the past 10 years.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is not the practice to give details of military assistance provided to individual countries.

Fishing Vessels

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what advice to operators of fishing vessels his Department has issued pending the introduction of electronic identification equipment.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: When submarines are operating on the surface normal "rules of the road" apply. In the case of dived submarines, it is the responsibility of the submarine's captain to keep clear of surface craft. In addition, designated submarine exercise areas are clearly marked on all Admiralty charts and fishermen are advised to keep special watch for submarines on or near the surface while transitting these areas. In the Firth of Clyde, where submarine movements are most frequent, mariners are given advance warning of the times and general areas in which dived submarine operations are planned.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects electronic identification equipment to be made generally available for use on fishing vessels.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Trials of these devices have not yet been completed. It is too early to say when they may become generally available, but I hope that commercially produced models will be ready later this year.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what trials have been undertaken by his Department into the use of electronic identification equipment on fishing vessels operating in waters used by submarines.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Initial trials involving a static device took place last summer and trials of a towed device were carried out in December. Further trials involving a range of commercially produced devices will take place in the near future.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much the electronic identification equipment tested by his Department costs per unit; and whether he intends to make it available free of charge.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It will not be possible to estimate the cost of these devices until the trials programme has been completed and the specification for the devices has been finalised. No decision on funding has yet been taken.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether any trials into the use of electronic identification equipment on fishing vessels have examined their effect on the behaviour of marine life.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No. The purpose of the trials being conducted by the Ministry of Defence is to establish whether net pingers provide an effective means of improving a submarine's ability to detect fishing nets.

Gulf Forces (Food Supplies)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy towards purchasing food for the forces from outside the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: In accordance with Government policy, the Ministry of Defence aims to secure best value for money in the purchasing of food for the armed forces. This means that having specified what is required in terms of rigorous quality standards, the Department seeks competitive tenders whenever it can.

Under EC directives the Ministry of Defence is obliged to advertise the majority of its forthcoming purchases in the Official Journal of the EC. To date there has been very little response from overseas companies, and almost all the Ministry's contracts for food for the armed forces are placed with firms in the United Kingdom. These firms in turn obtain their supplies from normal trade sources in this country and abroad. We do not seek to influence the selection by companies of their sources of supply any more than is necessary to ensure that the required quality standards are met.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the amount and cost of (a) butter and (b) beef which has been bought by him for the forces from (i) the United Kingdom and (ii) other countries, listing the countries in each case, for 1990 and to date in 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The value of butter and beef purchased by the Ministry of Defence for the services is as follows:

Butter	Value £
1990	200,000
[1]1991	8,000

[1] To the end of January.

Beef	£ million
1990	13
[1]1991	1

[1] To the end of January.

Details of supplies by country of origin are not available. However, it is estimated that approximately 95 per cent. of purchases of beef in 1990 came from South America, mainly Uruguay, with the remainder from the United Kingdom, and that all butter came from the United Kingdom.

Military Manoeuvres

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what definition of the term military manoeuvre is used when considering the applicability of the Manoeuvres Act 1958 to military exercises.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [holding answer Monday 11 February 1991]: There is no statutory definition of the term "military manoeuvre", but in common service usage the term would be used to describe the strategic or tactical movement of a military force.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the occasions during the last 10 years when a Manoeuvres Commission has been appointed under the provisions of the Manoeuvres Act 1958.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [holding answer Monday 11 February 1991]: On no occasion in the last 10 years has a manoeuvres commission been appointed under the provisions of the Manoeuvres Act 1958.

The amount of gas used to generate electricity accounted for less than 0·1 per cent. of the total.

The proportion of electricity generated by the major generating companies in the United Kingdom from each of the previous sources in Scotland, England and Wales, and Northern Ireland for 1986 to 1989 was as follows. Data for England and Wales are not available separately and data for 1990 are not yet available.

The amount of gas used to generate electricity accounted for less than 0·1 per cent. of the total.

The proportion of United Kingdom electricity sales in Scotland, England, Wales and Northern Ireland was as follows. Data for 1990 are not yet available.

per cent.[2]

Sales of electricity[6]	1986	1987	1988	1989
Scotland	10	10	10	10

Sales of electricity cannot be linked to fuels used in generation.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Solicitors

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Attorney-General if he will describe the current arrangements for senior solicitors to become judges in respect of (a) the procedures that are followed when solicitors put themselves forward as potential candidates for judicial office and (b) the measures he is taking to invite solicitors to apply for judicial office; and if he will make a statement on future proposals in this area.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor's general policy is that before being considered for a full-time judicial post a candidate must first have served in a part-time capacity for long enough to establish his or her competence and suitability. Those wishing to become judges usually serve initially as assistant recorders or deputy district judges. All applicants are considered on their merits, having regard to the numbers of appointments required.

Views are sought from those able to comment on an applicant's practice, professional standing and other qualities. Interviews are also held.

Applications from suitably qualified solicitors for judicial appointment are welcomed. The Lord Chancellor has taken steps to encourage more solicitors to put themselves forward for consideration. Such measures include continuing discussion with the Law Society, public speeches, meetings with solicitors' groups and the publication and wide distribution of a booklet explaining the judicial appointments system. In 1988 a special pilot scheme was set up, involving senior solicitors on local review committees, with the aim of testing a further method for identifying solicitors for potential appointment: the results of this scheme are currently being evaluated.

Innocent Dissemination

Mr. John Garrett: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on his consultations on the Faulks committee's proposal that the defence of innocent dissemination should be available to printers.

The Attorney-General: In a consultation paper published in July 1990 the Lord Chancellor invited views on whether the defence of innocent dissemination should be made available to printers. The Lord Chancellor is now concluding his consideration of the responses received and hopes to make a statement in the near future.

Bailiffs

Mr. Madden: To ask the Attorney-General what representations he has received calling for bailiffs to be certificated; what plans he has to introduce legislation making such a requirement; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The recently published National Consumer Council report on private bailiffs recommended that the Community Charges (Administration and Enforcement) Regulations 1989 be amended to require all bailiffs to be certificated. That is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

The Government have no plans at present to introduce legislation requiring all bailiffs to be certificated.

Leybucht Bay

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Attorney-General when he expects the decision to be reached by the European Court of Justice on the Leybucht bay case: European Commission v. the Federal Republic of Germany.

The Attorney-General: The Advocate General gave his opinion in ECJ Case C57/89 Commission v. Germany on 5 December 1990, and it is expected that the European Court of Justice will deliver its judgment on 28 February 1991.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Refugees

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions have taken place with other European Community states about a common approach to refugees.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Asylum policy has been discussed in a wide range of meetings at both ministerial and official level between member states of the European Community. The Dublin convention, signed by 11 member states last June, seeks to clarify responsibilities for considering individual asylum cases.

Racial Equality

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met the chairman of the Commission for Racial Equality; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend met the chairman of the Commission for Racial Equality on Thursday 14 February to discuss current issues affecting community relations.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what resources at 1990 prices have been allocated by the Government to the Commission for Racial Equality for each year since its creation.

Mrs. Rumbold: The information is as follows:

	Actual grant (£)	At 1989-90 prices (£)
1977-78[1]	3,150,000	8,172,266
1978-79	4,900,000	11,464,938

1989-90	11,805,000	11,805,000
1990-91[2]	13,512,400	12,511,481

[1] Part.
[2] Based on latest GDP deflator available in November 1990.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many magistrates there are in Britain; and of these how many are (a) black, (b) Asian and (c) women.

The Attorney-General: I have been asked to reply.

As at 1 January 1991 there were 29,062 lay magistrates in England and Wales. Of these, 12,964 were women. Records are not kept of the racial origins of magistrates. However, surveys in 1987 indicated that 528 were members of an ethnic minority and an informal count since has shown that the number of such appointments has exceeded the proportion in the population age groups from which appointments are normally made.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has on the numbers of, or trend in, the numbers of animal experiments since the implementation of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986.

Mrs. Rumbold: The number of scientific procedures performed on living animals since the introduction of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 is given in table 23 of "Statistics of Scientific Procedures on Living Animals, Great Britain 1989"—Cm. 1152—a copy of which is in the Library. The table shows that the use of living animals in scientific procedures has been declining steadily for many years. The 1986 Act has given further impetus to this encouraging trend.

The Gulf

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many meetings he has had with representatives of the Asian community in Britain to discuss the Gulf war; and if he will list the organisations concerned.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend recently attended the annual banquet of the Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan. A visit to the Glasgow central mosque, planned for 18 January, had to be postponed and rearranged for a date in May. However, I met representatives of the United Kingdom action committee on Islamic affairs on 23 January. Such meetings reflect continuing contacts at ministerial and official level.

North Yorkshire Police

Mr. Caborn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many additional uniformed police officers, excluding special constables, have been authorised to be added to the strength of the North Yorkshire police in each year from 1975 to 1990.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: It is not possible to distinguish between increases in uniformed and non-uniformed police officers as such information is not held centrally. The establishment of the North Yorkshire police has been increased in the following years between 1975 and 1990:

Year	Police Posts
1975	111
1979	40
1989	15
1990	25

The police authority did not request establishment increases in the years 1980-81 to 1987-88 inclusive.

Mr. Caborn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many crimes were (a) recorded and (b) detected by North Yorkshire police in each year from 1975 to 1990.

Mr. John Patten: The requested information for 1975-1989 is published in the annual reports of the chief constable of North Yorkshire for the years 1976, 1978 and 1989. Copies of these publications are available in the Library. Statistics for 1990 are not yet available.

Electoral Registers

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list by parliamentary constituency the number of electors listed in the draft electoral register for 1991-92 and the number listed in the register for 1990-91.

Mrs. Rumbold: Figures on the number of electors included in draft electoral registers for England and Wales are not held centrally. Figures on the number of local government electors included in the register for 1991-92 will be published by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys in the spring; parliamentary constituency electorates will be published in the summer in the OPCS annual reference volume on electoral statistics. Figures relating to the electoral register for 1990-91 were published in the last year's annual reference volume, a copy of which is in the Library.

Immigration

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the average cost in 1990-91 of processing each application for (a) registration as a British citizen, (b) naturalisation on grounds of marriage and (c) other naturalisation;

(2) what is the average cost in 1990-91 of processing applications for (a) registration as a British citizen, (b) naturalisation on the grounds of marriage and (c) other naturalisations where the application is withdrawn or abandoned.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The average cost of processing applications in each of these categories during the period April 1990-January 1991 is shown in the table. Average cost of withdrawn applications is not computed separately:

Category of application	Average cost of processing
	Successful	Unsuccessful
Registration	79·51	58·00
Naturalisation of a person married to a British citizen	143·95	135·95
Naturalisation on grounds of residence in the United Kingdom	175·50	140·16

Iraqi Nationals

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is his estimate of the number, to the latest available date, or Iraqi nationals and other nationals, required to register under the Immigration (Variation of Leave) Order 1991, who, to date, have failed to register; what are the requirements of registration; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many Iraqi nationals are currently registered with the police; what fee is charged for registration; and how many such registrations since the coming into force of the Immigration (Variation of Leave) Order 1991 have been made.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: On 21 January 1991, a total of 3,484 Iraqi nationals were registered with the police. Information is not yet available centrally showing the number who have registered since coming into force of the Immigration (Variation of Leave) Order 1991 which required all Iraqi nationals with a limited leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom to register with the police. The requirements of registration are to supply within seven days of the requirement being imposed certain details to the police, such as name, date of birth, address, together with a recent photograph and to keep the police informed of changes in circumstances. The fee for registration is currently £36.

Metropolitan Police

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what will be the total cost to public funds of the Metropolitan police in 1991-92; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: As police authority for the metropolis, I have approved estimates which provide for net revenue expenditure of £1,415·167 million in 1991-92. There will be a cash limit on current expenditure of £1,370·423 million. Capital expenditure is subject to separate control.

I have also approved the issue of a precept of £123·74 per head of relevant population for Metropolitan police purposes. This is not the sum levied on individual community charge payers, but will be levied on local authorities' collection funds which include income from revenue support grant and national non-domestic rates as well as the community charge.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Sports Facilities

Mr. Higgins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has on sports facilities provided by local authorities at community charge payers' expense which are not being used because contracts for their operation have not been put out to tender.

Mr. Atkins: I am unaware of any cases where local authority sports facilities are not being used because contracts for their management have not been put out to tender. SI 1990 No. 1564 specifies that competition in the management of sports and leisure facilities should be phased in by steps from 1 January 1992 to 1 January 1993.

Mr. Higgins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether it is his policy that contracts for the operation and maintenance of sports facilities provided by local authorities must be put out to tender if there is no possibility that the revenue from them will cover costs.

Mr. Atkins: The Government are introducing compulsory competitive tendering in the management of local authority sports facilities because they believe it will result in better value for money from local authority expenditure.

Data Protection Act

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has made an estimate of the total cost of registration of all schools under the Data Protection Act; and whether he has any plans to increase grants in order to cover these costs.

Mr. Fallon: No information is available on the extent to which schools make use of personal data held on computer which would make registration necessary.

West Midlands (Minister's Visit)

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what official engagements were undertaken by the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) during his visit to the west midlands on 30 January.

Mr. Alan Howarth: As sponsor Minister for the Birmingham city action team and the East Birmingham task force, I visited the Hodge Hill access centre, based at Hodge Hill girls' school in Birmingham, and attended a special meeting of the Birmingham city action team at the Birmingham area office of the Employment services in New street. In the afternoon, I visited Coventry polytechnic, particularly the department of health sciences and the department of mechanical engineering and held meetings with academics and students.

Teachers (North Yorkshire)

Mr. Cabom: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the full-time equivalent number of teachers employed in North Yorkshire secondary schools in each year from 1974 to 1990, in each of the following subject areas (a) English, (b) mathematics, (c) physics, (d) chemistry, (f) technology, (g) history, (h) geography, (i) economics, (j) French, (k) German, (l) Spanish, (m) Italian, (n) Russian, (o) other modern languages, (p) religious education, (q) art, (r) music and (s) physical education.

Mr. Fallon: Information on the deployment of teachers within individual local authorities is not centrally available.

Mr. Cabom: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many (a) heads and deputy heads and (b) other teachers in North Yorkshire infant and primary schools, and North Yorkshire secondary schools, have (i) left the profession, (ii) sought early retirement and (iii) taken early retirement in each year from 1974 to 1990.

Mr. Fallon: The table gives information on teachers leaving the profession and those retiring before age 60, for the years 1985-86 to 1987-88. Information for earlier years is not readily available, and for later years is not yet available. The number of teachers seeking early retirement is not centrally available.

Note: "Leaving teaching" excludes those who were barred, died or moved into service in special or further education or in independent schools. Some of those leaving may have since returned to teaching.

Mr. Cabom: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the full-time equivalent number of teachers employed in (a) North Yorkshire infant and primary schools, and (b) North Yorkshire secondary schools in each year from 1974 to 1990.

Mr. Fallon: The number of full-time equivalent qualified teachers employed within maintained primary and secondary schools in North Yorkshire were as follows:

ILEA

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his estimate of staff numbers in his Department involved in full or part-time work arising from abolition of the Inner London education authority.

Mr. Fallon: The DES has an inner London unit with 14 staff. Most of the work of the unit is in connection with schools in the new inner London education authorities. There is however still some residual business arising from the abolition of ILEA.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his current estimate of the financial and staff savings arising from the abolition of ILEA; and when the figures were last assessed.

Mr. Fallon: There are already encouraging signs that many of the new inner London LEAs are seeking to increase efficiency in their education service; it is too early to assess precise savings.

Special Schools

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will list, for those local authorities for which numbers are available for the latest date available, how many pupils with statements of special educational needs are recorded as attending maintained special schools under arrangements made by the authority;

(2) if he will list, for those local authorities for which numbers are available, and for the latest date available, how many pupils with special educational needs are recorded as attending non-maintained special schools and independent schools under arrangements made by the authority.

Mr. Fallon: The number of pupils in maintained special schools, non-maintained special schools and the number of pupils with statements of special educational needs in independent schools in each local education authority in England in January 1990 is given in the table.

[1] All pupils in special schools.

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will place responses to his circular regarding the application of local management of schools in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon [holding answer 18 February 1991]: It is not our normal practice to publish responses to consultation on draft circulars. We are considering the responses carefully and will take full account of them in drawing up the final version of the circular.

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps his Department is taking to monitor the effect of (a) retention of funds for special needs by the local education authority in the LMS formula and (b) delegation of special needs funds to maintained schools in the LMS formula.

Mr. Fallon [holding answer 18 February 1991]: We are monitoring and reviewing all aspects of the effects of local management—with the help of LEAs, the local authority and head teacher associations, and Her Majesty's inspectorate. Close attention will be paid to the effects of different ways of managing provision for pupils with special educational needs within the context of LMS—local management of schools.

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what account he has taken regarding the responsibilities of local education authorities under the Education Act 1981, when considering the application of LMS to (a) special schools and (b) children with special needs in mainstream education.

Mr. Fallon [holding answer 18 February 1991]: Circular 7/88, which guided the preparation of LMS schemes for mainstream schools, stated that the Secretary of State expected LEAs to include within schemes provision for taking into account pupils with special needs as defined under the 1981 Act, including both pupils with and without statements made under that Act. Where provision for pupils with statements of special needs is delegated to schools under schemes of local management, the Secretary of State expects to see LEAs place conditions on governors of schools with delegated budgets, binding them to deliver the provision required by the statements.

My right hon. and learned Friend is currently consulting on proposals to extend local management to special schools.

Sport and Physical Education

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he will publish the interim report of the working group on sport and physical education in the national curriculum.

HEALTH

Hospital Food Purchases

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total cost of food purchased by NHS hospitals in each region in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Dorrell: Information derived from the annual accounts of regional and district health authorities in England is shown in the table.

Revenue expenditure on Hospital and Community Health Services (HCHS)—Provisions—1989-90

Region	£000 (cash)
Northern	14,487
Yorkshire	15,718
Trent	17,945
East Anglian	8,566
North West Thames	14,784
North East Thames	19,886
South East Thames	15,917
South West Thames	13,676
Wessex	11,527
Oxford	8,668
South Western	12,950
West Midlands	21,548
Mersey	10,805
North Western	18,596
Regions total	205,073

Notes:

1. The expenditure relates to provisions purchased for patients and staff and is incurred predominately in hospitals; elements included for other services covered by HCHS—for example, community health —are not separately identifiable in the annual accounts.
2. The table excludes expenditure by the special health authorities for the London postgraduate teaching hospitals. Expenditure incurred by regional and district health authorities under contract catering arrangements, totalling some £14·1 million in 1989-90, is similarly excluded.

Departmental Achievements

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the principal achievements of his Department since June 1987.

Mr. Waldegrave: The principal achievement since June 1987 has been the enactment of the reforms of the health service set out in the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990. The reforms build on the fundamental principles of the national health service and on the achievements of the last 40 years, to secure the best possible use of the record level of resources now available for health care and to give patients, wherever they live in the United Kingdom, better health care and greater choice of services. Improved organisation and management of the national health service through clearer definition of responsibility between those purchasing health services in line with the needs of their local population and those providing and managing those services will be key elements.

The national health service has made a positive response and welcomed the greater devolution and delegation of responsibility. Fifty-seven hospital trusts have already been announced and will come into effect from next April along with a substantial number of general practitioner fund holders. Considerable interest has been expressed by others wishing to follow in subsequent waves. These changes mean putting quality and responsiveness to the patient at the top of the agenda.

Since 1987, and throughout their period of office, the Government have remained firmly committed to the national health service as a service free to all regardless of means and funded primarily from central taxation. Gross United Kingdom spending has increased from £21·8 billion in 1987-88 to a level of planned expenditure of £32·6 billion in 1991-92. United Kingdom per capita expenditure on the health service will have risen from £383 in 1987-88 to £567.

The numbers of patients receiving treatment has continued to rise each year. Targets set in 1986 for cataracts and bone marrow transplants have been met and the target for hip replacements is close to being achieved. There has been a 23 per cent. increase in the total number of heart and lung transplants and a 72 per cent. increase in the number of liver transplants.

Besides the increases in the number of direct care staff, doctors and nurses are better paid. The Government have responded positively to the recommendations made by the respective independent review bodies. Last December, broad agreement was reached with the medical profession to reduce to 72 hours per week the long hours worked by junior hospital doctors in hard-pressed posts.

The NHS and Community Care Act 1990, also provides the framework for the development of domiciliary day and respite services to enable people to live in their own homes wherever feasible and sensible. This programme will have a phased introduction to avoid overburdening the agencies involved.

Since 1987, the Government have placed particular emphasis on the importance of health promotion and disease prevention. In 1990, immunisation and vaccination targets were set under the terms of the new contract for GPs. These have already led to improvements, particularly in the inner city areas where rates were generally low. Since 1988 all English health authorities have had a computerised call and recall system for cervical cancer screening. All women aged between 20 and 64 are expected to be brought into the programme by 1993. The first nationwide breast cancer screening programme in the European Community has been established, and important initiatives have been taken on teenage smoking, alcohol misuse, drug misuse, diet, food safety and coronary heart disease. In January 1988, the world summit of Ministers of Health was held in London, to look at programmes for combating the spread of AIDS. More than £10 million has been made available annually to health authorities and voluntary organisations to continue this work. Further progress has been made towards the WHO European region's 38 "Health For All" targets with many of those relating to health trends, lifestyles and healthy environment having been achieved. With the support of the leading health professions, the Government expect to produce a consultative document in the early part of 1991, which will form the first stages of a health strategy for England and provide the means for measuring improved health outcomes.

Other developments since June 1987 include the improved approach to child care practice under the Children Act 1989. Close working between magistrates courts, the higher courts and local authorities with the need for understanding new court processes will be important factors. The Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 addresses the complex legal and ethical issues surrounding embryos and embryo research.

Newmarket Hospital

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to receive the Eastern regional health authority's proposals to run down Newmarket hospital to a community facility.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The West Suffolk district health authority is currently consulting widely on the future of Newmarket hospital. The consultation period will end on 28 February. The district health authority will then make proposals to the East Anglian regional health authority. The regional health authority will consider these findings within the wider context of its proposed strategy for acute services in the south western part of the region. If the scheme preferred by the region and the district is formally opposed it will be referred to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

The Gulf

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his estimate of the cost to the NHS arising from increased prescription of tranquilisers to those service men and women and their families who are suffering from trauma, stress and long-term mental illness consequent upon the war in the Gulf.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: There is no information available on which to base any such estimate.

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the Chief Medical Officer is proposing to issue guidance to general practitioners in regard to the treatment of servicemen and women and their families suffering from trauma, stress and long-term mental illness following upon war in the Gulf with regard to the cost implications and avilability of psychotherapeutic treatment and drug-based treatment.

Mr. Dorrell: The Chief Medical Officer does not intend to issue guidance on what is a clinical matter. General practitioners regularly deal with people suffering from stress and mental illness using psychotherapeutic methods and drug treatment. Previous major incidents have given an increased understanding of the approaches which are most helpful.

Service men and women will be treated primarily by the services medical organisations. Families will in the main receive care from their general practitioners, in the usual way under national health service arrangements.

NHS Hospitals (Re-admissions)

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to collect central data of the number of patients in England and Wales who, having been discharged from national health service hospitals, required subsequent hospitalisation for (a) the same complaint or (b) a different but related complaint.

Mr. Dorrell: There are no plans to do so. Decisions about discharge are a matter for clinical judgment. Such decisions will be informed by medical audit but not by central collection of data.

Food Hygiene Regulations

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether Scotland will be exempted from the Food Hygiene (Amendment) Regulations 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The Food Hygiene (Amendment) Regulations 1990 apply to England and Wales only. Separate food hygiene regulations apply in Scotland, and amendments are under consideration in the Scottish Office.

Haemophilia

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans the bio products laboratory has to import unlicensed high purity Factor VIII products from abroad for the treatment of haemophilia A patients; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The bio products laboratory—BPL—is responding to the demand from clinicians for high purity Factor VIII made from plasma provided by United Kingdom unpaid voluntary donors as recommended in World Health Organisation and EC guidelines. It has licensed the appropriate manufacturing technology and is modifying its production facility to manufacture the product locally. For a limited period while those modifications are carried out, and in the interest of meeting the demands as quickly as possible, the BPL has contracted Kabi of Sweden to undertake part of the manufacturing process from an intermediate material supplied by the BPL. This work will be undertaken under the supervision of BPL staff.

The BPL is not at present covered by the licensing requirements of the Medicines Act because of Crown immunity. However, some of its products and facilities are already so licensed and it will be seeking licences for other products, including high purity Factor VIII, under the arrangements leading to the removal of Crown immunity. For many years the BPL has been inspected by the medicines inspectorate and its product have been tested by the National Institute of Biological Standards and Control, as are similar licensed pharmaceutical products.

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent guidelines he has issued with regard to treatment of haemophilia A patients; and what representations he has received.

Mr. Dorrell: Several representations have been received concerning the use of high purity factor VIII for the treatment of haemophilia A patients. The Department has not issued guidance on this matter; decisions whether this treatment is appropriate for individual patients rest with the clinicians within the arrangements and protocols set locally for determining priorities among patient services, including prescribing costs.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the estimated level of (a) capital repayments, (b) interest payments, and (c) public dividend payments by national health service trusts to the Treasury in 1991-92.

Mr. Dorrell: We estimate that the level of capital repayments and interest payments to be made by NHS trusts in 1991-92 will be £70·2 million and £189 million respectively. Dividends payable on public dividend capital will not normally be declared or paid until after the end of the financial year once audited accounts are received.

Depreciation

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health by how much hospital and community health services revenue plans have been enhanced in 1991-92 to meet the provision in national health service trust prices for depreciation.

Mr. Dorrell: HCHS revenue plans have been enhanced by £164 million in the 1991-92 financial year to take account of depreciation provided for in NHS trust prices.

Junior Doctors

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what reduction has taken place in the number of junior hospital doctors with a rota commitment greater than 1:3 in the west midlands region since 18 January 1989.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairman of the West Midlands regional health authority for details.

Hormone Drugs

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what timetable, agency and funding has been agreed for his Department's survey into the use and misuse of hormone drugs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The Government have decided in principle that a survey should be carried out into the prevalence of the misuse of steroid drugs. We are urgently considering the best way to take the survey forward. We hope to be able to give further details shortly and I will write to the hon. Member when these are available.

Food Poisoning, Preston

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he is investigating the source of the outbreak of food poisoning caused by E. coli in the Preston area; what other action he is taking in respect of this; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: This outbreak is the subject of ongoing investigation by the public health laboratory service. The Department's Chief Medical Officer has issued a statement about the need for beefburgers and similar minced meat products to be thoroughly cooked before they are eaten. All local authority environmental health departments were notified of the outbreak and asked, through the Department's hazard warning system, to remind food businesses of the need to ensure beefburgers are properly cooked. Both the CMO's statement and the hazard warning notice have been placed in the Library.

The Government will consider the need for additional action in the light of the PHLS findings on the outbreak and other cases of human illness due to E.coli 0157 phage type 31 (variant) which have been reported around the country.

Women in the National Health Service

Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) whether he has any plans to encourage job sharing in the NHS;

(2) what plans he has to ensure that full use is made of women's contributions to the NHS; and if he will make a statement;

(3) how many women work in the NHS.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 8 February 1991]: The latest available information, which relates to 1989, indicates that there were 770,300 women working in the national health service in England, representing 76·6 per cent. of the total work force. We are firmly committed to ensuring that the best possible use is made of their valuable contribution.

We take every opportunity to stress to health authorities the importance of flexible working arrangements, including job sharing, which allow women to successfully combine their family responsibilities with those of working in the NHS.

To encourage authorities in the development of good personnel policies and practices which enable them to recruit and retain the services of women staff, we have endorsed a wide range of initiatives, including:

Publication of a comprehensive guidance manual and summary report sent to all health authorities by the national steering group on equal opportunities for women in the NHS.

Many health authorities operate their own independent day nursery and holiday play schemes, while others have entered into collaborative arrangements with separate organisations.

Launch of two new schemes in December last year for "Keeping in Touch" and "Getting Back to Practice" to replace an existing dentists' retainer scheme, enabling dentists who take career breaks from their practices to keep up to date with their skills and experience.

The introduction of a maternity payments scheme for general dental practitioners who intend to return to general practice after having a child.

Publication in January this year of the report and recommendations of a special departmental working group on "Women Doctors and their Careers" aimed at promoting greater equality of opportunity for women in the medical profession.

Publication of a special report by the Department's social services inspectorate "Women in Social Services—A Neglected Resource" giving guidance on how social services departments can benefit from making full use of womens skills and experience.

Launch of a new scheme providing special leave arrangements for a range of family and domestic needs, agreed in January this year between NHS management and staff representatives. This scheme complements one agreed in July last year under which authorities may grant career breaks.

Departmental funding for a number of projects aimed at encouraging the return of nursing, health visiting and midwifery staff to the NHS.

Additionally, the new GP contract recognises explicitly that women GPs often want to combine a career in general practice with bringing up their family. It does so by formally introducing new opportunities to work part time and to job share. We have also removed the list size criterion for a locum allowance while a woman GP is absent from the practice having a baby—so the practice will not lose out while she is away.

Implementation of some of these schemes is a matter for the individual employing authorities. We shall continue to seek ways of encouraging them to effect improvements where necessary.

PRIME MINISTER

Senior Civil Servants (Degrees)

Mr. Page: To ask the Prime Minister how many permanent secretaries have engineering, science or mathematics degrees; and what percentage that is of the total.

The Prime Minister: Four permanent secretaries—12 per cent. of the total—have degrees in these subjects. Two have science degrees and two have mathematics degrees. There are in addition a further 12 permanent secretaries —35 per cent. of the total—with social science degrees, including economics and statistics, and one with a professional accountancy qualification.

Mr. Page: To ask the Prime Minister how many under-secretaries have engineering, science or mathematics degrees; and what percentage that is of the total.

The Prime Minister: This information is not held centrally and could not be obtained without disproportionate cost.

Defence Quality Assurance Unit

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Prime Minister if he will seek to co-ordinate the activities of the Departments of Environment, Trade and Industry and Transport with regard to the proposed relocation of the Ministry of Defence quality assurance unit to Stockton on Tees.

The Prime Minister: The Ministry of Defence has been in contact with the Departments mentioned during the course of their studies into the relocation of the directorate general defence quality assurance.

Ministerial Advisers

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Prime Minister how many political advisers to Ministers are currently employed in the civil service; in which Departments they work; and on what grades they are paid.

The Prime Minister: There are currently 26 special advisers to Ministers employed in the civil service. The number in each Department is as follows:

	Number

Greater London Council

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister which departments of state are still carrying out functions and responsibilities arising from the abolition of the GLC.

The Prime Minister: The Home Office, the Department of the Environment, the Department of Transport and the Office of Arts and Libraries.

WALES

Mental Illness

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many mental illness hospital beds were available in Wales in 1978, 1982, 1986, and during each of the last three years.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Information on mental illness beds and other psychiatric beds, excluding mental handicap, is given in the table:

Average daily available NHS hospital beds

A487, Gwynedd

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the outcome of his feasibility study undertaken for his Department, by Gwynedd county council, on possible options for improving the A487 road in the vicinity of Penygroes and Llanllyfni, and of providing a bypass for these two villages; and what is the expected time scale of these improvement schemes.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The study report on the A487 trunk road from Caerau to Pont Seiont, which includes Penygroes and Llanllyfni has not yet been received by the Welsh Office. However the outcome of preliminary consideration of the case for road improvements will be covered in a supplement to "Roads in Wales", to be published next week.

South Wales Traffic Study

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the remit for the south Wales area traffic study; what is its estimated cost; who is undertaking it; when it will be completed; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The study is a review of traffic patterns over most of the south Wales trunk road network. It identifies sections likely to exceed their recommended traffic flow levels in the foreseeable future and evaluates possible solutions. It was undertaken by JMP Consultants Ltd in association with Veryard and Partners for £350,000. Their summary report was submitted last December and it is currently receiving careful consideration. No public statement is likely before the spring.

Roads

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he proposes to issue the revised supplement on "Roads in Wales"; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: We plan to publish a 1991 supplement to "Roads in Wales" on 25 February.

Castle Cement Works

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will indicate the action he has taken since the announcement of redundancies at the Castle cement works, Clwyd.

Mr. David Hunt: As the hon. Gentleman knows from my reply of 15 January, the Welsh Development Agency is taking these redundancies into account in planning its activities. The agency's small firms service have been in Castle Cement recently advising people who are considering self-employment and will continue to play an active role in helping those made redundant.

Brymbo Steelworks

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will indicate the action he has taken since the announcement of redundancies at the Brymbo steelworks, Clwyd.

Mr. David Hunt: Since United Engineering Steels' announcement on the 14 May 1990 that Brymbo steelworks was to close, I have met, on several occasions, all the parties involved to discuss the future of the steelworks.

At my request, the Welsh Development Agency made extensive, worldwide efforts, throughout last summer to find a buyer for the site who would continue steelmaking in some form without success.

The Welsh Development Agency is still in consultation with United Engineering Steels over possible future uses for the site.

On 30 October 1990, I announced a support package designed to mitigate the effects of the steelworks closure on the area. The package entails the government matching United Engineering Steel's contribution of £260,000 to the North East Wales training enterprise council pound for pound; an extra urban programme grant of £0·5 million this financial year, as well as the revenue appointment of a Brymbo village liaison and advice worker for three years, and an extra £0·5 million for Wrexham Maelor borough council for its Redwither project as part of its 1991-92 credit approvals announced on 10 December. In addition, the Welsh Development Agency has commenced work on £5·5 million programme of works based at the Wrexham industrial estate which should create job opportunities for 500 people. European regional development fund aid of £2,229,345 has been granted towards projects in the Wrexham travel-to-work area under the Clwyd integrated development operational programme.

I will be meeting again the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) and representatives of the county and district councils later this week to review the situation and I will be taking further action as and when I consider it necessary.

Clwyd Furniture Industry

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will indicate the measures he proposes in Clwyd consequent upon the announcement of redundancies in the furniture industry.

Mr. David Hunt: These job losses are very much regretted. The Welsh Development Agency takes all job losses into account in planning its future activities and reviews its plans in the light of continuing developments.

Glendale Company

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement of the action he has taken consequent upon the placing of the Glendale company in the hands of the receiver.

Mr. David Hunt: While the company is in the hands of the receiver it would be inappropriate for me to intervene. I have however asked the WDA to alert possible purchasers and both the agency and the Welsh Office stand ready to give every possible assistance to any potential purchaser.

Effluent

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report a list of the trade effluent consents that have been granted for the discharge of pesticide waste to sewers, giving for each, the eight figure Ordnance Survey grid reference number for the point of discharge.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: This information is not held centrally. Copies of trade effluent consents are available for public inspection at the offices of the sewerage undertaker.

Drinking Water

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report the information available to his Department on the incidence of faecal material in drinking water.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Water undertakers are required by the Water Supply (Water Quality) Regulations 1989 (SI 1989 No. 1147) to record on a public register the results of the analysis of samples taken. In addition the chief inspector of the drinking water inspectorate will publish in the summer a full report upon the quality of drinking water supplied in England and Wales during 1990.

Wetlands

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those estuaries and wetlands with nature conservation protection designations, currently facing urban/recreational or industrial development proposals.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The information is not held centrally. The Nature Conservancy Council must be consulted about all development proposals in sites of special scientific interest and has undertaken a review of the nature conservation interests of the estuaries of Great Britain. I understand that the full report is due to be published on 25 March 1991.

Cardiff Bay Development Corporation

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the duties he has prescribed for the Cardiff Bay development corporation in the field of vocational training.

Mr. David Hunt: Neither I nor my predecessors have prescribed duties for Cardiff Bay development corporation in the field of vocational training. The corporation has, however, been actively involved in the development of a training initiative in co-operation with local authorities and government agencies, with the full support of the Wales TUC and CBI. The initiative will provide training opportunities for unemployed local people so that they can benefit from the regeneration of the area.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he has had any consultations with the chairman of the Cardiff Bay Development Corporation regarding the setting up of a centre of excellence in the vocational training field at Cardiff bay.

Mr. David Hunt: I have had no such consultations. My officials were, however, involved in discussions with officers of the corporation about its involvement in the development of a centre of excellence for vocational training within the bay area. These discussions took place in the context of the normal project approval arrangements for the corporation.

Local Plans

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report a list of those local authorities in Wales that have no local plan.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: No local plans have been placed on deposit or adopted in the areas of the following local authorities:

Alyn and Deeside district council
Carmarthen district council
Ceredigion district council
Glyndwr district council
Montgomeryshire district council
Neath borough council
Preseli Pembrokeshire district council
South Pembrokeshire district council

Vocational Courses

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide transitional funding assistance to vocational part-time courses at higher education colleges due to be directly funded after April 1992.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my reply of 11 February 1991.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Fair Employment

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many companies have been prosecuted to date in Northern Ireland for failing to make monitoring returns to the Fair Employment Commission.

Mr. Needham: Fifteen.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will seek to ensure that small companies in Northern Ireland are not threatened with disqualification by the Fair Employment Commission following minor breaches of the fair employment legislation.

Mr. Needham: It is for the Fair Employment Commission to decide how to use its power under the fair employment legislation, including when to take action against those who fail to comply with its provisions.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many companies have been prosecuted to date after making a late return of monitoring records to the Fair Employment Commission.

Mr. Needham: Of the 15 concerns that were prosecuted for failing to make a monitoring return to the commission within the prescribed time, 14 made a late return before the hearing in the magistrates court.

Hazardous Waste

Mr. Hume: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what regulations or guidelines govern the transportation of hazardous waste into and within Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: Incoming consignments of hazardous waste must conform with the Transfrontier Shipment of Hazardous Waste Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1989 which govern the import of hazardous waste from outside the United Kingdom into Northern Ireland for disposal. Controls on the disposal of hazardous waste within Northern Ireland are provided by the Pollution Control (Special Waste) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1981.

The transport of hazardous cargoes by sea is regulated by the Merchant Shipping (Dangerous Goods and Marine Pollutants) Regulations 1990 and the Merchant Shipping (Control of Pollution by Noxious Liquid Substances in Bulk) Regulations 1987 as amended in 1990.

The transport of dangerous substances by road within Northern Ireland is regulated by the Dangerous Substances (Conveyance by Road in Road Tankers and Tank Containers) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1988 and the Road Traffic (Carriage of Dangerous Substances in Packages etc) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1988 as amended in 1990.

The following Great Britain documents have been approved for use in Northern Ireland in relation to the transport by road of dangerous substances:

1. Approved Code of Practice—Operational Provisions of the Road Traffic (Carriage of Dangerous Substances in Packages etc.) Regulations 1986. ISBN 0 11 883898 9.

2. A guide to the Road Traffic (Carriage of Dangerous Substances in Packages etc.) Regulations 1986. Booklet HS(R)24 ISBN 0 11 883899 7.

Mr. Hume: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what routes for the transportation of hazardous waste to Maydown have been identified in the context of the proposed siting of a hazardous waste incinerator at Du Pont's Maydown complex.

Mr. Needham: No routes for the transportation of hazardous waste to Maydown have been identified in the context of a proposal to site an incinerator for the disposal of toxic waste at Du Pont (UK) Limited, Maydown, Co. Londonderry.

Petrol Prices

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the average retail price of petrol at the pumps (a) on 16 January and (b) currently.

Mr. Needham: At 16 January four-star leaded petrol was 45·4p per litre and unleaded was 42·4p per litre. Currently they are 43·7p and 40·7p per litre respectively.

Environmental Improvement Schemes

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give details of the environmental improvement schemes (a) carried out and (b) under consideration, to date, by the Department of Environment, Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: To provide details of individual works completed or contemplated would involve disproportionate cost. Details of the expenditure for the 1988-89 and 1989-90 financial years, the expected outturn for 1990-91 and programmed expenditure for 1991-92 under the three main categories of bodies involved in environmental improvement schemes are as follows:

Year	Departmental schemes	Voluntary sector schemes	District councils and other public bodies	Total
	£000s	£000s	£000s	£000s
1988-89	2,164	118	1,995	4,277
1989-90	4,210	198	2,431	6,839
1990-91	2,904	199	1,785	4,888
1991-92	3,796	132	1,155	5,083
Total	13,074	647	7,366	21,087

A breakdown of individual bodies within the three categories is listed:

Bodies which have received environmental improvement grants within the three categories of eligibility

- Belfast action teams
- Roads service
- Planning divisions
- Londonderry development office

Deaf Schoolchildren

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many children from Northern Ireland are at present receiving grant aid from the Department of Education, Northern Ireland, to attend specialist schools for the deaf in the Republic of Ireland.

Dr. Mawhinney: Twenty-three children from Northern Ireland presently attend specialist schools for the deaf in the Republic of Ireland and have their costs met by education and library boards, with the approval of the Department of Education, Northern Ireland.

Common Agricultural Policy Payments

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much the total payments received by the agricultural industry in Northern Ireland were under the common agricultural policy in each of the last three years.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 18 February 1991]: Total expenditure in the United Kingdom under the common agricultural policy in the last three years was:

	£ million
1987-88	1,611·1
1988-89	1,362·9
1989-90	1,230·5

Although it is possible to identify some of the payments which have been made to the agricultural industry in Northern Ireland—details of which are held in the Northern Ireland Appropriation Accounts 1987-88, 1989-90—it is not possible to disaggregate all United Kingdom common agricultural policy expenditure in this way.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Low-energy Light Bulbs

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to encourage the use of low-energy light bulbs in his Department's offices and other buildings.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Throughout the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, including the Overseas Development Administration, high-efficiency tubes are being installed under a rolling maintenance programme. Standard light bulbs are being replaced wherever possible by compact fluorescent tubes.

Soviet Union

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made in respect of Mikhail Ziskind of Leningrad and Demitri Yakubovsky of Kiev who have been unsuccessfully applying to leave the Soviet Union.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We can certainly raise these cases with the Soviet authorities. We have details of the case of Mr. Yakubovsky, but in order to make our representations most effective we shall need further details of Mr. Ziskind's case.

UN Security Council

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Provan of 8 February, Official Report, columns 280-81, if he will give the dates of United Nations Security Council meetings held since 16 January at which the situation in the Gulf was discussed.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The United Nations Security Council met in informal consultations to discuss the situation in the Gulf on 17, 22, 24, 28, 30 and 31 January; and on 6, 8 and 13 February.

The council held a formal session on 13 February at which it was decided talks should take place in private. On the 14, 15 and 16 February the council met in closed session and will resume discussions on 19 February.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals were put forward by the United Kingdom at the most recent meeting of the Security Council of the United Nations; and how they were received.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 18 February 1991]: At the meeting of the Security Council on 14 February, the United Kingdom representative proposed that in accordance with rule 48 of the provisional rules of procedure, the council should meet in private session to discuss the Gulf crisis. The British proposal was adopted by 9 votes in favour two against—Cuba and Yemen—and four abstentions. The council met in closed session on 14, 15 and 16 February and will resume discussions on 19 February.

Iraq

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library details, including copies of any letters, of the Iraqi offer to withdraw from Kuwait as discussed by United States officials on 2 January.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We are aware of no discussion by United States officials on 2 January of an Iraqi offer to withdraw from Kuwait.

Mr. Brian Angel

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information, in addition to that referred to in his answer of 3 July 1990, Official Report, column 381, he has received about the outcome of the investigation conducted by Zimbabwean authorities into the murder in Harare of Mr. Brian Angel.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The British high commission in Harare has received a copy of the police report on the death of Mr. Brian Angel. An inquest is due to be held in Harare on 1 March 1991. We expect that the police report will form part of the evidence presented at the inquest. A member of the British high commission will be present as an observer.

Antarctica

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures he will take to prevent any mineral mining in Antarctica.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The United Kingdom will take no unilateral action concerning mineral activities in Antarctica. We believe that decisions on such activities must be agreed by consensus amongst the Antarctic treaty consultative parties before they are implemented. A consensus on mineral activity has yet to be achieved. However, at the XIth special consultative meeting in Chile in November, the Antarctic treaty parties renewed their agreement to a voluntary restraint on mineral activity in the absence of any formal agreement. The United Kingdom will abide by this voluntary restraint.

Conventional Forces in Europe

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress being made on negotiations on the reductions of conventional forces in Europe.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The first plenary meeting of the resumed CFE follow-on negotiations took place on 14 February. NATO and other delegations underlined the problems created for the follow-on negotiations by doubts over the Soviet Union's intention to comply with certain provisions of the CFE treaty. No new proposals were tabled.

Iran

Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the meeting between the Minister of State and the Iranian chargé d'affaires in London on 12 February; what assurances were given about possible Iranian assistance to bring about the release of Mr. Roger Cooper and also of the British hostages held by Arab terrorists in Lebanon; and what response was made to the allegations made by Mr. Khare Qani relating to the fairness of a trial of an Iranian citizen in Britain.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Iranian chargé told me that Iran continued to do its best to secure the release of the hostages in Lebanon. I pressed for but received no assurances about Mr. Roger Cooper. It would be improper for me to comment on the trial to which my hon. Friend refers, as it is still before the court.

Romania

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those voluntary organisations giving aid to Romania, of which his office is aware.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Since I wrote to the hon. Member on 16 January enclosing a list of British voluntary organisations giving aid to Romania—a copy of which is available in the Library—we have added to the list three more: Caring for Life International, Feed The Children, and Romanian Children's Aid. I shall write to my hon. Friend with full details.

Cash Limits

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he proposes to make any further changes in his Department's diplomatic wing cash limits for 1990-91.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Subject to parliamentary approval of the late spring supplementary estimate the cash limit for class II, Vote 2—other external relations—will increase by £2,500,000 from £187,421,000 to £189,921,000. This is to take account of a contribution to the International Committee of the Red Cross for its humanitarian work in the Gulf. This increase is within the forecast outturn for the planning total published in the statistical supplement to the 1990 autumn statement.

TRANSPORT

Heathrow Airport

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to (a) shorten the hours when night-flight restrictions apply at Heathrow airport and (b) to increase the night-flight quota.

Mr. McLoughlin: No.

Traffic Commissioners

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will state the numbers of staff of the metropolitan and south eastern traffic commissioners, respectively, and the number he expects to staff the proposed south eastern and metropolitan traffic commissioners; how many posts will be eliminated over the range of their functions; and if he will give a breakdown of the expected sum of annual saving in public expenditure.

Mr. Chope: There are 96·5 and 77 complemented staff posts respectively in the metropolitan and south eastern traffic area offices. The planned complement for the new combined south eastern and metropolitan traffic area office is 68 staff. This will reflect the transfer of work between traffic area offices in London, Eastbourne, Bristol and Cambridge. It will also take account of the transfer of staff and responsibility for road traffic enforcement to the Vehicle Inspectorate executive agency on 1 April 1991, and also the transfer of responsibility for vocational driver licensing to the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency—DVLA—on the same date.

The savings arising from the redistribution of work in the TAOs should amount to about £650,000 per year of which some £380,000 comes from the closure of the metropolitan traffic area office.

Trunk Roads, Hereford

Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of total traffic is formed by trunk road through traffic on the western side of the Hereford ring road south of the A49/A438 roundabout.

Mr. Chope: Approximately 13 per cent., based on 1986 traffic surveys.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the current annual spending on maintenance of the trunk road in Hereford that is proposed to be de-trunked; whether he has been asked by Hereford and Worcester county council to undertake any repairs found necessary to the Greyfriars bridge before it is de-trunked; and whether it is his policy that any sum thus incurred will be included in the total cost to his Department of the Hereford bypass for economic evaluation purposes.

Mr. Chope: It is not possible to identify separately details of current expenditure on maintenance for particular lengths of A49 and A465 within Hereford and Worcester proposed for detrunking. Discussions with the Hereford and Worcester county council on the need for repairs to Greyfriars bridge prior to proposed detrunking are yet to be held.

Repairs will be necessary to Greyfriars bridge at some stage and investigations are currently underway to assess the extent of works required. Such costs do not form part of the cost of the Hereford bypass.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the additional distance between the A49 (north) and the A465 (south) using the proposed bypass as against using the present inner ring road.

Mr. Chope: Approximately 6·1 km or 3·7 miles.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of traffic on the proposed Hereford bypass between the A4103 and A438 and between the A438 and B4399 Holme Lecy road would be trunk road through traffic.

Mr. Chope: The details are as follows:

	Approximate proportion of trunk road through traffic
	Low growth Per cent.	High growth Per cent.
(i) Between A4103 and A438	22	24
(ii) Between A438 and B4399	25	27

The proportion of total through traffic on these sections of the bypass is expected to be approximately 30 per cent. of total flow.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list in the Official Report the volume of trunk road through traffic passing through Hereford in 1986 and 1990 and projected for the years 1995 and 2010 between (a) the A49 (north) and the A49 (south) and (b) the A49 (north) and the A465 (south) for the whole day and for the morning peak hour.

Mr. Chope: Using the results from the 1986 surveys and the current range of national traffic growth predictions the details are as follows:

	Average annual daily flows projected
	1986	1990	1995	2010
A49(N)—A49(S)	1,020	1,300-1,350	1,400-1,550	1,800-2,250
A49(N)—A465(S)	810	1,000-1,050	1,150-1,250	1,450-1,700

Separate estimates for the morning peak hour are not readily available.

Vehicle Registration

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will arrange for all relevant vehicle registration or licence application forms to carry a statement informing applicants of the items of personal data that will be transferred to the new police national computer; whether he has any estimate of the cost of redesigning such forms so that future reprints carry such a statement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The DVLA registrations under the Data Protection Act 1984 indicate that details from both the vehicle and driver registers are given to the police. Copies of the registrations are freely available from the Data Protection Registrar. There is no requirement under the Data Protection Act to include additional references on application forms to inform individuals and, at present, the DVLA has no plans to do so.

Traffic Penalties

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures he proposes to take to ensure that penalties for the offence of failure to provide information under the Road Traffic Bill take account of the different circumstances of companies and individuals.

Mr. Chope: Companies should have the same responsibility to provide information about drivers alleged to be guilty of road traffic offences as a private individual and it is right that a negligent director or other officer should share in that responsibility. Licence endorsement is not appropriate, however, where the connection with driving is remote. I shall today be tabling an amendment at the Report stage of the Road Traffic Bill to provide that in these cases the penalty should be restricted to a financial penalty.

Motor Sports

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures he proposes to take to respond to concerns about the effects of the new serious driving offences in the Road Traffic Bill on the organisation of motor sports.

Mr. Chope: I am very much aware of the importance of the motor sports industry nationally and of the need to ensure that sporting events which take place off the road are not jeopardised by the risk that the manner of driving might be judged by criteria more appropriate to driving on the public highway. I shall today be tabling amendments to deal with this point at the Report stage of the Road Traffic Bill.

GLC

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his estimate of staff numbers in his Department involved in full or part-time work arising from responsibilities transferred from the Greater London Council.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Department assumed the powers of the former Greater London council in respect of 70 miles of roads which are now trunk roads. The Department deals with 215 miles of trunk roads in London. It is not practicable to estimate the number of staff whose work involves the ex-GLC roads. On abolition of the GLC the Department also assumed responsibility for traffic signals and urban traffic control and for running the Woolwich ferry. The Corporation of the City of London acts as the Department's agents for the former and the London borough of Greenwich for the latter, and employ the staff involved.

Transport Commissioners

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give consideration to moving the Transport Commissioners to Eastbourne.

Mr. Chope: The traffic commissioner for the present south eastern traffic area is already based in Eastbourne. Under the reorganisation of the traffic areas, which will take effect on 1 June 1991, the traffic commissioner will assume responsibility for the new south eastern and metropolitan traffic area, which will comprise London, Sussex, Surrey and Kent. He will continue to be based in Eastbourne.

Network SouthEast

Mr. Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the current constraints on investment in respect of the investment proposals by British Rail to introduce the Networker 471 train on Kent coast lines in Network SouthEast.

Mr. Freeman: Proposals for the introduction of class 471 Networkers on Kent coast routes are still being assessed by British Rail and my Department has not yet received a detailed investment submission. I understand that British Rail is examining whether the project might be brought forward in the light of other investment priorities and its overall financial situation.

Station Platforms

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) whether he will call for a report from the railways inspectorate on the number of stations in British Rail north-east region that do not meet new regulations on platform length; and whether he will make a statement;

(2) whether he will defer any deadline for closure of stations which do not meet the new regulations on platform length in order to allow British Railway to meet new standards.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 18 February 1991]: British Rail has no plans to close stations on safety grounds. There are no new regulations on platform length but Her Majesty's railway inspectorate, has asked British Rail to consider a strategy for improving platforms which fall short of the long-established safety standards. Discussion between British Rail and the inspectorate will be resumed when British Rail has identified the stations in need of improvement and quantified the cost of remedial work.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will provide the additional funding needed to bring stations up to the standard on platform length specified in the new regulations.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 18 February 1991]: British Rail is quantifying the work that would be needed to make all existing stations comply with the standard. Only when this study is complete will it be possible for British Rail, in consultation with Her Majesty's railway inspectorate and the Department, to develop a strategy for any necessary station improvements. Overall safety expenditure on the subsidised railway will be supported by means of the public service obligation grant in the normal way.

Airline Companies

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he is making to the US Secretary of State for Transportation about his refusal to accept British Airways reduction of fares on flights to the United States of America; if he will discuss this with the other members of the European Community; and whether any counter-measures are being taken against US airlines flying to Britain.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 18 February 1991]: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State made it clear immediately after British Airways' fares proposals were turned down that he was surprised at the decision, particularly since it would disadvantage customers. He urged the US authorities to reconsider but we have just learnt that they are not prepared to do so. We are considering with those involved how best to respond. In the meantime British Airways have put alternative proposals to the US authorities. There are no plans for formal discussions with other members of the European Community.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the limit of savings a person can have to qualify for the emergency cold weather payment.

Mr. Scott: Savings over £500—£1,000 for people aged 60 or over—are taken into account on a pound-for-pound basis.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many persons received severe weather payments in the week beginning 4 February in each of the weather station areas; how many were (a) pensioners, (b) disabled persons, (c) families with young children, and (d) other groups; what was the total cost to the Exchequer; and what plans he has to ease the eligibility condition requiring a temperature for seven consecutive days on average below 0 deg. C in further weeks beyond the first when this condition was lifted.

Mr. Scott: Information is not yet available regarding the number of cold weather payments made in the week beginning 4 February. With regard to the temperature criterion for eligibility, I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) on 15 February at column 630.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether a child with asthma over the age of five years in a family receiving income support, but receiving no invalidity or other additional benefits, is entitled to cold weather payments.

Mr. Scott Cold weather payments are payable to people in receipt of income support, who either have a child under five or whose benefit includes a pensioner or disability premium. Savings over £500—or £1,000 for people aged 60 and over—are taken into account. A family with a child with asthma over the age of five years would be eligible for a cold weather payment if these conditions are satisfied.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security for what reason the Berwick upon Tweed offices of his Department indicated to claimants on 14 February that it did not have instructions enabling it to approve payments of severe weather allowance and did not know when such instructions would be received.

Mr. Scott: Instructions concerning the recent changes were issued to all local offices on 8 February and 14 February. Berwick upon Tweed office has confirmed that the first payments under those instructions were made on 14 February.

Departmental Staff

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give the number of liable relative officers at present in his Department; and if he will give a breakdown of their civil service grades and their location in England and Wales.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is not readily available in the format requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Residential Homes

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to make the report drawn up by Price Waterhouse surveying residential and nursing home running costs more generally available to interested parties and the general public.

Miss Widdecombe: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State placed copies of the report in the Library on 24 October last year and officials of the Department have made copies widely available to major interested organisations which are welcome to copy the report to their members.

Backdated Claims

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many backdated claims for social security have been received since April 1988 in England and Wales.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at the disproportionate cost.

National Insurance

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Leeds, West on 6 February, Official Report, column 191, if he will show the main changes to national insurance benefits and the savings or expenditure which accrued from each change since 1979 showing the cumulative effect at 1991 prices.

Mr. Jack: Calculating the cumulative cost over a period of years of the changes listed in my earlier reply would require a detailed year-by-year analysis of many factors, including movements in expenditure on benefits, in prices and earnings indices, and in additional pension and occupational and personal pension entitlements. This calculation could be undertaken only at disproportionate cost.

Retirement Pensions

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the net additional cost of increasing the basic retirement pension for a single person by £5 per week and for a married couple by £8 per week more than the planned uprating for April 1991 assuming (a) no corresponding increase in means-tested benefits and (b) a corresponding increase in means-tested benefits.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 21 January 1991]: The net additional cost of increasing the basic retirement pension in this way would (a) around £1·6 billion with no corresponding increase in income-related benefits and (b) around £2·5 billion with such a corresponding increase.

ENVIRONMENT

Rating Valuation

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish, by valuation office, the number of appeals received relating to rating valuation assessments under the uniform business rate; from what date he expects the first appeals to be held at the North Yorkshire tribunal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: The table shows the number of proposals by ratepayers to alter their 1990 rating assessments, to insert new entries in the rating list and to alter assessments which have been revised by the valuation officer for each valuation office in England in respect of the period from 1 April to 31 December 1990.

The North Yorkshire valuation and community charge tribunal is currently completing hearings of residual appeals against the 1973 valuation list. It expects to commence hearings of appeals against the 1990 rating list from May.

Homelessness

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if, as a matter of urgency, he will contact the Lambeth health authority to discuss the use of the South London hospital for women as a hostel for homeless people on the streets of London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: I understand that the health authority is unable to make the hospital available for use by homeless people, or for other purposes, mainly because ownership of part of the site is at present the subject of an unresolved legal dispute. The Government have funded the provision of 700 additional bed spaces in emergency shelters in London during the very cold weather of the past 10 days. Most of the shelters have been full, but some still have a few spaces for rough sleepers to use. We are providing £96 million over three years to provide sufficient accommodation in hostel places and longer-term housing to ensure that it is unnecessary for anyone to sleep rough.

Community Charge

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his statement on the community charge reduction scheme, how this affects the provision of compensating grant to help make up loss of revenue from United States air force personnel who previously paid rates but are exempt from the community charge.

Mr. Portillo: The statement of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about the community charge reduction scheme does not affect the payment of grant to local authorities in respect of members of the United States air force who are exempt from the community charge.

Mr. Critchley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends to reimburse local authorities for community charge income forgone from service personnel normally resident in their areas who have been posted to the Gulf; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: We propose to introduce a scheme under section 146 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989 to compensate local authorities for the income forgone where service personnel normally resident in their area have been posted to the Gulf.

Under the proposed scheme, a special grant will be paid to local authorities in respect of service personnel who have ceased to be liable for the personal community charge because they have been posted to the Gulf. The grant will be paid if the income lost to the authority amounts to more than 0·25 per cent. of the total income from personal community charges for the period. Grant will be payable on the excess above this threshold, but will assume that the charge set by the authority was equal to the community charge for standard spending. Grant will be paid for the period beginning on 1 January 1991.

It will not be possible to calculate the full amount of the grant, or the precise amounts to be paid to individual charging authorities, until the duration of the absences of service personnel is known. When those details are available a report will be laid before the House setting out the purpose of the grant, the amount to be paid to each authority and an explanation of how the amounts were calculated.

The Department of the Environment is writing today to notify local authorities of the proposed scheme. The local authority associations are being invited to join in urgent discussions on the arrangements in detail. Local authorities should take these proposals into account when drawing up their budgets and setting their community charges for 1991-92.

My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and for Scotland intend to make similar arrangements for local authorities in Wales and Scotland.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many cases are currently before the courts as a result of failure to pay the community charge; and if he will estimate the costs involved in pursuing those who fail to pay their community charge.

Mr. Key: Information on community charge cases currently before the courts is not held centrally. Figures are not available for the costs of community charge enforcement.

Rent Arrears

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the number of public sector tenants in arrears with their rent in each district of Northamptonshire; and if he will give it as a percentage of all tenants in each authority.

Mr. Yeo: The available information about the numbers of local authority tenants in arrears with their rent in Northamptonshire is in the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy publication, "Housing Rents Statistics at April 1990", a copy of which is in the Library.

Nine Elms

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received about the land occupied by the former Nine Elms cold store.

Mr. Yeo: No representations have been received. Since 1988 my Department has had five letters, all from one individual, asking whether there are any current proposals to develop the site.

Planning Policy

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a further statement on the strategic guidance which he gives to local planning authorities in former metropolitan counties.

Sir George Young: The Secretary of State has given strategic guidance for London and all the former metropolitan county areas to assist the London borough and metropolitan district councils in the preparation of their unitary development plans. The strategic guidance has been published in Department of the Environment planning policy guidance notes (PPGs) and regional policy guidance notes (RPGs) as follows:

		Date
PPG9	Regional Guidance for the South East	February 1989
PPG10	Strategic Guidance for the West Midlands	September 1988
PPG11	Strategic Guidance for Merseyside	October 1988
RPG1	Strategic Guidance for Tyne and Wear	June 1989
RPG2	Strategic Guidance for West Yorkshire	September 1989
RPG3	Strategic Guidance for London	September 1989
RPG4	Strategic Guidance for Greater Manchester	December 1989
RPG5	Strategic Guidance for South Yorkshire	December 1989

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many staff in his Department are involved in drawing up and issuing planning policy guidance notes.

Mr. Yeo: There are some 30 staff in the Department's development plans and development control policy divisions who will have some involvement with drawing up or issuing planning policy guidance notes from time to time. Staff in other policy divisions may also be involved, depending upon the subject of the note.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment who he consults before issuing planning policy guidance notes.

Mr. Yeo: It is departmental policy to seek the views of a wide range of national bodies, including, for example, local authority associations, professional bodies and conservation and amenity groups, when issuing draft planning policy guidance notes for public consultation. They are publicised and are available to anybody on request.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many planning policy guidance notes have been issued since 1985; and at what cost.

Mr. Yeo: The planning policy guidance note (PPG) series was introduced in 1988. There are currently 16 titles. Three give regional planning guidance, more recent regional planning guidance can be found in the regional planning guidance (RPG) series begun in 1989 which now has five titles. The total publication cost to the Department is £49,509 for the 16 PPGs and £11,553 for the five separate RPGs.

Local Authority Companies

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report a list of the local authority-controlled and local authority-influenced companies, indentifying each by name.

Mr. Portillo: Part V of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989, which establishes these definitions, is not yet in force. Even when it is, my Department has no plans to collect this information.

Planning Enforcement

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many staff in his Department deal with planning enforcement; and at what cost.

Mr. Yeo: The numbers of staff and estimated expenditure, including overheads, for the current financial year are as follows:

Policy issues arising under Part VII of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990

1·25 staff units : £49,500

Processing and deciding appeals to the Secretary of State under section 174 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990
92 staff units : £2·5 million

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the local authorities in England and Wales and the estimated cost of planning enforcement in each.

Mr. Yeo: This information is not available centrally. The Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy compiles annual planning and development statistics. At present, planning enforcement costs are aggregated within estimates of total expenditure on development control by planning authorities. For 1991-92, the institute will be requesting authorities to show estimates of enforcement expenditure separately.

EC Directives

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) under what circumstances his Department would decline to exercise the power of derogation from EC directives which had been granted; and if he will set out those circumstances;

(2) if he will make a statement on his understanding of the difference between the power of derogation from EC directives and the implementation of derogation from EC directives.

Mr. Baldry: We exercise the right to seek and apply derogations from environmental directives when necessary and justified. We would seek a derogation only where we foresaw a clear possibility that it would need to be used.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Cabom: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the amounts in cash terms for the York city council area (a) received from non-domestic rates in 1989-90, (b) due to be paid in uniform business rate in 1990-91 and in 1991-92 and (c) due from the non-domestic rate pool to York as a receiving authority in 1990-91 and in 1991-92.

Mr. Key: The information for York city council is as follows:

	Year	£ million
(a) Receipts from non-domestic rates	1989-90	18·3
(b) Estimated receipts from non-domestic rates in	1990-91	16·6
	1991-92	21·7
(c) Receipts from non-domestic rate pool in	1990-91	23·1
	1991-92	27·7

Figures for receipts of non-domestic rates in 1989-90 and the following years are not on a comparable basis because of extensive changes to the system of local government finance.

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the standard spending assessment for highways for Kirklees metropolitan council for 1991-92; and what it was for 1990-91.

Mr. Key [holding answer 15 February 1991]: The standard spending assessment for highway maintenance for Kirklees metropolitan council is £14·767 million for 1991-92. In 1990-91 it was £13·583 million.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply of 1 February, Official Report, column 662, if he will outline why the proposed capital financing element of the standard spending assessment for Stoke-on-Trent was reduced by £407,000.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 18 February 1991]: The final capital financing SSA was £406,568 lower than the provisional figure issued at the time of consultation as a result of using later estimates of credit approvals for Stoke-on-Trent and all other authorities.

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement showing how the central Government increase of 23 per cent. in the standard spending assessment for personal social services is affected by the national inflation factor of 9 per cent. in the poll tax capping rules.

Mr. Key [holding answer 18 February 1991]: The increase in the standard spending assessments for personal social services reflects the Government's view of the amount of spending which is appropriate taking account of the pressures facing local authorities from service developments, demographic pressures and inflation and of what the country can afford. Under the intended criteria for charge capping, no authority would be capped if it spends at or below its SSA. The intended criteria do not depend on any "national inflation factor".

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the effects of the community charge on private tenants' housing costs.

Mr. Key [holding answer 18 February 1991]: No such information is available.

County Hall, London

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what offers have been received by his Department and the London residuary body for the purchase or rental of county hall, London SE1.

Mr. Key: Such matters are for the London residuary body and prospective purchasers. No offers have been received by the Department.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will review his decision not to allow the London residuary body to consider the use of county hall, London SE1 for public sector purposes.

Mr. Key: It is the task of the London residuary body to dispose of surplus property. County hall is surplus. The residuary body is free to consider any means of disposal consistent with its obligation to London's community charge payers.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will consider the use of county hall, London SE1 for temporary accommodation of the homeless.

Mr. Yeo: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave yesterday to the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen), Official Report, Vol. 186, column 2.

Greater London Council

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his current estimate of the financial and staff savings arising from the abolition of the GLC; and when the figures were last assessed.

Mr. Key: It was estimated in 1987 that some 6,300 posts had been saved immediately following abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan county councils. The projected long-term annual savings were of some £100 million per annum resulting from staff reductions. Because of the difficulty in disaggregating data relating to functions inherited by successor authorities it is not practicable to produce revised estimates.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all the functions and responsibilities currently undertaken by the City of London as a result of GLC abolition.

Mr. Key: Apart from those which fell to London boroughs and the City of London at GLC abolition, responsibilities which have since been transferred by the London residuary body to the City are those in relation to Hampstead Heath and ex-GLC and ex-LRB records.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of staff numbers in his Department involved in full or part-time work arising from responsibilities transferred from the GLC.

Mr. Key: No functions were transferred directly from the GLC to the Department of the Environment, but the Department has sponsorship responsibilities for certain bodies with functions arising wholly or partly from the abolition of the GLC. The equivalent of eight full-time staff are estimated to work on these matters.

Estuaries and Wetlands

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those estuaries and wetlands covered by sites of special scientific interest or other nature conservation designations, which are threatened by development proposals.

Mr. Baldry: The information is not held centrally. The Nature Conservancy Council is, however, required to be consulted about all development proposals in sites of special scientific interest. The NCC has undertaken a review of the nature conservation interests of the estuaries of Great Britain. I understand that the full report is due to be published on 25 March.

Vacant Houses

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the number of houses and flats which have been unoccupied for a period longer than six months for each London borough.

Mr. Yeo: Local authorities report the number of their dwellings which have been vacant for over six months but not more than one year and the number that have been vacant for over one year in their annual housing investment programme returns (HIP1). The latest available figures are for 1 April 1990 and appear in "1990 HIP1 All Items Print," in columns A178 (over six months but not more than one year) and A188 (over one year). A copy of the document is in the Library.

House Condition Survey

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the forthcoming English house condition survey will include a study of insulation levels and the potential for energy conservation and fuel-efficient heating in the housing stock.

Sir George Young: Yes.

Gulf Oil Slicks

Dr. Hampson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a further statment on environmental impact studies by the Natural Environment Research Council related to the Gulf oil spill.

Mr. Heseltine: Two studies have been carried out by the Natural Environment Research Council (NERC) to assist international efforts which are under way to minimise the environmental damage caused by the deliberate release of oil into the Gulf by Iraq. The first study, an assessment of the biological effects of the oil spill on the ecosystem of the Gulf, including its marine wildlife, has been sent to the relevant Government Agencies in Saudi Arabia and in the other Gulf states. The report includes a brief assessment of response options and makes recommendations.

The second study carried out by NERC is concerned with modelling the movement, dispersion, evaporation and solution of the oil released, using tidal and weather data.

I am today placing copies of both the report and a description of the modelling work completed by the NERC in the Library and I am also arranging for this to be presented to the appropriate authorities in Saudi Arabia and the other Gulf states.

Drinking Water

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the information available to his Department on the incidence of faecal material in drinking water; and if he will indicate any significant regional variations in such incidence.

Mr. Baldry: The chief drinking water inspector will publish, in the summer, a full report on the quality of drinking water supplied by water companies in England and Wales during 1990

Vacant Land

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the amount of vacant, dormant, derelict, unused and underused land owned by each Government Department.

Sir George Young [holding answer 14 February 1991]: Holdings of unused and underused land in England at 31 March 1990, the latest available date, as reported by the Departments concerned, are shown in the table. Information about health authorities' land is not available. No unused or underused land is held by any other major Departments.

Individual departments are responsible for monitoring and managing their own property holdings. The rationalisation of holdings, the disposal of surplus land and the improvement of systems are encouraged through the public expenditure survey discussions and in other ways.

Unused and underused land held by Departments

	Acres
Ministry of Defence	2,527
Department of the Environment	164
Home Office	299
HM Land Registry	18
Lord Chancellor's Department	9
Department of Transport	1,606

Local Government Review

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the job titles and grades, in full-time equivalents, of staff working on his local government review, including and identifying staff seconded from other Government Departments; and if he will calculate the annual cost of this exercise.

Mr. Heseltine [holding answer 15 February 1991]: A team was established within the Department in December 1990 to undertake a thorough review of local government functions, structure and finance. The review team is headed by a grade 4 (director) supported by 22 staff, made of the following grades:

Four at grade 5 (assistant secretary)
Five at grade 7 (principal)
One higher executive officer (development)
Three higher executive officers
Two executive officers
One senior personal secretary
Two administrative officers
Four personal secretaries

Of these staff, one grade 5 and one grade 7 are seconded from the Department of Social Security.

Annual expenditure by the review team is estimated at some £1 million, which breaks down broadly as follows:

Basic salary costs	616,000
Other costs	391,000

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if any external work has been commissioned for his review of local government; and if any external advisers have been appointed to the review.

Mr. Heseltine [holding answer 15 February 1991]: I have not appointed external advisers or commissioned external work in connection with the review. We are, however, consulting widely about the review and have made clear our desire to discuss the issues with local government and opposition parties and our willingness to consider views put to us by individuals and organisations outside Government.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Namibia

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will offer aid programmes to help deal with the high rates of maternal death, disability and miscarriage suffered by Namibian women.

Mrs. Chalker: The Namibian Government plan to develop a primary health care system which will place much greater emphasis on maternal health. We have offered to assist in a project to train primary health care trainers, currently being designed by the Ministry of Health with the assistance of Oxfam UK. We are exploring the scope to provide further help in this sector.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will offer special aid to the Government of Namibia to set up institutional retraining programmes for procedures in dealing with cases of murder, rape, and assault of Namibian women.

Mrs. Chalker: The objective of our current assistance to the Namibian police service is to enable it to respond more effectively to the needs of all sections of the community. Training courses developed by British police advisers, in which local civil and women's rights organisations participate, reflect this objective.

Tamils

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what aid is being made available by Her Majesty's Government to assist Tamil refugees fleeing from persecution in Sri Lanka and India.

Mrs. Chalker: Help is available in a number of ways. We are providing technical co-operation grants totalling £4 million over three years in support of Save the Children Fund and Oxfam projects in the north and east of Sri Lanka, much of whose effort is directed to refugee relief.

We have also provided emergency relief totalling £445,000 through UNICEF, the UN High Commissioner for Refugees and the International Committee of the Red Cross for their programmes in Sri Lanka.

Forest Charter

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress is being made on the forest charter for UN conference on environment and development, as outlined in the speech of the Minister for Overseas Development to the World Wide Fund for Nature on 11 December.

Mrs. Chalker: A world forest charter remains one of the options for UNCED in 1992, but the international community has yet to agree for which international forest instruments to aim and in what forum negotiations should proceed. We hope that progress will be made at the second meeting of the UNCED preparatory committee, 15 March to 5 April, in Geneva.

Botswana

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the income of commercial cattle farmers in Botswana derived from the beef protocol of the Lomé agreements.

Mrs. Chalker: Under the provisions of the Lomé convention, Botswana receives a quota of 18,916 tonnes of beef exports per annum to the community. It is not possible to estimate the effects of these exports on the incomes of the cattle farmers.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance is given by his Department to the Botswana authorities in achieving ecologically sound development.

Mrs. Chalker: We ensure that all projects with which we are involved are environmentally sound in line with procedures laid down in our environmental appraisal manual. We also provide direct assistance to help the Government of Botswana in this area, for example by helping to fund the Government of Botswana's deputy director of wildlife.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) how many staff members from the ODA are working in Botswana;

(2) if he will specify the position and responsibility of all ODA staff and consultants funded by the ODA currently working in Botswana;

(3) how many ODA staff and consultants funded by the ODA are currently seconded to the Botswana authorities.

Mrs. Chalker: The following positions in Botswana are held by staff fully or partly funded by ODA:

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in which projects in respect of dredging the Boro river ODA staff members or consultants have been involved.

Mrs. Chalker: None.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what ODA staff or consultants working in Botswana have been involved in developing plans to cull elephants in that country;

(2) in what projects relating to buffalo control ODA staff members or consultants have been involved in northern Botswana;

(3) if any ODA staff or consultants have been involved in developing plans for the disposal of elephant ivory; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The deputy director of wildlife in Botswana is employed by the Government of Botswana. His post is partially funded by the ODA, but we have no power of direction over policies adopted by the Government of Botswana. The department of wildlife covers all aspects of wildlife planning and management in Botswana.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has regarding veterinary advice given to the Botswana authorities by the United Kingdom and the EC regarding the need to construct a steel fence in the Okavango delta in Botswana.

Mrs. Chalker: None. The alignment of fences surrounding parts of the Okavango delta has been determined by the Government of Botswana themselves, following close consultation between the interested Government departments including the department of wildlife, and the department of animal health, and with local communities. Great care has been taken to minimise the impact on wildlife.

While neither the ODA nor the EC has provided veterinary advice on the need to construct fences, the ODA part-funds members of staff in the departments of wildlife and of animal health.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what advice was given by the Overseas Development Administration or EC aid agencies in respect of the case for, or environmental impact of, the construction of a steel fence in the Okavango delta in Botswana.

Mrs. Chalker: None.

South African Development Bank

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Overseas Development Administration works with the South African Development Bank in promoting economic and social enhancement projects in southern Africa; if he will publish examples of the activities in which both these agencies have been and are jointly engaged; and what information he has on links between German, Dutch and French Governments' overseas development agencies and the South African Development Bank.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what contact and co-operation currently exists between the Overseas Development Administration and the Development Bank of South Africa.

Mrs. Chalker: My officials from ODA have held discussions with those from the Development Bank of Southern Africa on a number of occasions. The two organisations have not engaged in any joint activities. We do not have information readily available on links between the Development Bank of Southern Africa and other overseas development organisations.

[1] Quantities of these items are not available without incurring disproportionate cost.

Because of the unknown origins of waste materials used for recycled papers, it is not possible to give accurate guidance on the presence of chlorine in the listed products.

European Organisations

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: To ask the Lord President of the Council what decisions have been reached concerning the improvement of communications facilities between the House, the Western European Union and the Council of Europe.

Mr. MacGregor [holding answer 18 February 1991]: The Select Committee on House of Commons (Services) last week approved in principle the provision to Members of free postage and telephone calls to certain European institutions.

These will largely comprise the main institutions of the European Community, but, as I have already indicated in correspondence with my hon. Friend, it is intended that direct dialling facilities should also be made available from the start to the Council of Europe in Strasbourg and the assembly of the Western European Union in Paris, and it is my hope that the new postage arrangements will similarly extend to these institutions.

Subject to the approval of the House of Commons Commission, which has financial responsibility for the provision of postal and telephone services, it is hoped that the new arrangements can be brought into effect early in the next financial year. A further announcement will be made in due course.

SCOTLAND

Jordanhill College

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will show the number of places available at Jordanhill College of Education for the BEd degree course in the present academic year and for next year.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In the current academic session there are 671 funded places in the primary BEd course at Jordanhill college of education. In session 1991-92 the number of funded places will rise to 711.

House Revaluation

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what arrangements he intends to make for 1991-92 to continue phasing in the effects of the 1990 revaluation.

Mr. Lang: We are committed to limiting annual increases in non-domestic rate bills resulting from revaluation to a maximum of 20 per cent. in real terms, and to only 15 per cent. for those ratepayers occupying properties with rateable values of less than £10,000. These arrangements will continue, but I intend to provide additional protection next year in the case of part-residential properties such as small hotels and guest houses with rateable values of less than £10,000. The increase in notional rateable values for these properties in 1991-92 will be limited to 10 per cent.

In order to maintain the level of non-domestic rate income to authorities this year we arranged to limit decreases in non-domestic rate bills resulting from revaluation to 11·5 per cent. in real terms, and to 16·5 per cent. for those ratepayers occupying properties with rateable values of less than £10,000. The limits for those who benefited from the revaluation will reduce by a further 11·5 per cent. and 16·5 per cent. in real terms in 1991-92.

These changes will be set out in regulations which I shall lay before Parliament in the near future. The regulations will prescribe the multipliers to be applied to the rateable values of properties in the valuation roll on 31 March 1990 to determine the upper and lower notional rateable values for the purpose of calculating non-domestic rate bills for 1991-92. The multipliers for the upper limits will be 1·936 for properties with rateable values as at 1 April 1990 of £10,000 or more, 1·778 for those with rateable values of less than £10,000 and 1·701 for part-residential properties with values of less than £10,000. The multipliers for the lower limits will be 1·052 for properties with rateable values as at 1 April 1990 of £10,000 or more and 0·937 for those properties with values of less than £10,000.

Assisted Places

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has decided on the level of fee remission grant which will be available to parents under the assisted places scheme in school session 1991-92.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. Friend is making £8·492 million available for fee remission in 1991-92. As in 1990-91, 59 schools across Scotland will participate in the scheme. The funding now available should increase the number of pupils benefiting towards the planned level of about 3,000 by the end of the session.

Local Health Councils

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is taking to ensure that members of local health councils fully reflect the views of the community they serve.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 18 February 1991]: Health boards have been advised to ensure that council members are drawn from throughout their area and that selection is made after consultation with all appropriate bodies.

Health Records

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the total sum paid by the Scottish Home and Health Department to the firm GPASS for computerising health centre records; and how many general practitioners and how many sites are covered by the work done.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: GPASS is an NHS-managed and funded computerised administration system for general practitioners and is in direct competition with commercial suppliers of GP computer systems. The cost of developing and maintaining the system is therefore commercially confidential and it would be inappropriate to divulge this information. The latest figures available indicate the GPASS software is used by 2,212 GPs in 622 practices which equates to nearly 66 per cent. of GPs and 55 per cent. of practices in Scotland.

THE ARTS

School Libraries

Mr. Flannery: To ask the Minister for the Arts what plans he has to update his survey into school libraries.

Mr. Renton: School libraries are the responsibility of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science.

"School Libraries: the Foundations of the Curriculum" was a report of a working party set up by the Library and Information Services Council for England to consider the future of school library services. There are no plans to update this, but the council maintains a regular interest in school libraries and associated services.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

New Forest

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what restrictions are placed on the holding of cash collections in the New Forest by Forestry Commission byelaws; and under what circumstances and by what authority these byelaws may be waived.

Mr. Curry: The Forestry Commission byelaws do not place any restrictions on the holding of cash collections in the New Forest.

Battery Farms

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many battery hen farms were visited by his Department's veterinary inspectors in each of the last five years; and what other efforts are made by his Department to monitor compliance with the code of recommendations for the welfare of domestic fowl.

Mr. Maclean: The information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Officers of the state veterinary service monitor welfare whenever they visit livestock farms and will advise farmers on the welfare codes whenever necessary.

Tobacco

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total sum devoted by the EC to tobacco production in the most recent annual period for which figures are available; and how much was expended by the community in the storage and export of such EC produced tobacco.

Mr. Curry: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 11 February, Official Report, col. 376.

Low-energy Light Bulbs

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to encourage the use of low-energy light bulbs in his Department's offices and other buildings.

Mr. Curry: As part of the Department's campaign to save energy by all practical means, more energy-efficient lighting has been installed in our regional office at Reading and is currently being installed in the headquarter offices in Whitehall and Whitehall place and in the central science laboratory at Slough. In other locations similar measures are under consideration and these will be carried forward wherever practicable.

Botswana (Beef Imports)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much beef on average is imported into the United Kingdom from Botswana each year.

Mr. Curry: Imports into the United Kingdom of fresh, chilled and frozen beef and veal from Botswana over the most recent three years for which figures are available are as follows:

(tonnes product weight)

Year	Quantity
1989	4,848
1988	2,600
1987	2,499

Source: Her Majesty's Customs and Excise.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has on the import by the EC of beef from Botswana

Mr. Curry: Under the Lomé convention the Community provides a reduced levy annual import quota for 18,916 tonnes of beef from Botswana. In the last three years for which figures are available the following quantities of beef have been imported into the Community:

	Tonnes
1989	9·988
1988	6·118
1987	8·322

NATIONAL FINANCE

Income Tax

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the latest forecast collection of receipts from the higher rate of income tax in 1990-91; and what was the comparable figure for the collection of receipts from the higher rates of income tax in 1978-79.

Mr. Maude: In 1978-79 income tax liability at the higher rate was about 9 per cent. of total income tax liability. In 1990-91 it is estimated that liability at the higher rate will be about 20 per cent. of total liability.

TESSAs

Mr. French: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many financial institutions known to him have introduced tax-exempt special savings accounts.

Mr. Maude: A total of 150 so far.

Mr. French: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the level of savings deposited in tax-exempt special savings accounts.

Mr. Maude: It is too early to make a firm estimate.

Banks (Loans to Employees)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has concerning the number of employees who currently receive loans at non-commercial rates from employers in the banking and financial sectors.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 15 February 1991]: I have no firm data on the number of banking and financial sector employees currently receiving cheap loans from their employers.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the influence on the effectiveness of his interest rate policy of the current policy of many banks in making reduced-rate loans to their employees.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 15 February 1991]: I have made no such assessment.

Reduced-rate Mortgages

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he would make of the annual value to an employee with an average-sized mortgage on his home of a reduced-rate 5 per cent. loan from his employer compared to a similar employee borrowing a similar amount at commercial rates.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 15 February 1991]: The value for 1990-91 for a basic rate taxpayer is just over £2,000 after taking account of mortgage interest tax relief.

Reduced-rate Loans

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has any plans to treat reduced-rate employee loans as a taxable perk; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 15 February 1991]: The benefit of interest free or cheap loans provided for employees by employers is already taxable as a benefit-in-kind.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he makes of the potential revenue to the Exchequer if reduced-rate employee loans were treated for tax purposes in a similar manner to company cars.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 15 February 1991]: The estimated yield for 1990-91 from the existing tax charge on loans made to employees by their employers is £65 million.

Married Women's Income Tax

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the annual income tax payable under the new arrangements by married women with a gross daily income of (a) £0·5 million, (b) £1 million and (c) £1·8 million.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 18 February 1991]: If all the income were subject to tax and the only relief available were the personal allowance, the income tax liability for 1990-91 would be:

(a) £72,995,693
(b) £145,995,693
(c) £262,795,693

Wine Imports

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the quantity of wine imported into Britain from non-EC countries, giving the country, and also the import levy paid for each of the last five years.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 18 February 1991]: Wine from non-EC countries has not been liable to import levy during the last five years although an import duty may be payable.

I regret that the detailed breakdown which the hon. Member requests would be available only at disproportionate cost. But the "Overseas Trade Accounts", copies of which are in the Library, show that the total quantities of wine imported from non-EC countries in each of the last five years were as follows:

Imports of Wine from Non-EC Countries

Year	Quantity (Tonnes)	(Litres)	Value (£000s)
1986	54,183	47,992,883	31,245
1987	66,014	56,942,130	41,361
1988	74,302	63,360,450	59,037
1989	78,316	67,262,938	68,427
1990	94,883	79,006,661	89,054

Mr. Jackson: The information requested is not collected centrally. It could be obtained—in respect of employers in Scotland, Strathclyde region, Renfrew district and separately in Great Britain and Northern Ireland—only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the names of all the organisations which submitted a response to the consultative document, "Employment and Training for People with Disabilities".

Mr. Jackson: My Department has received responses from 333 organisations. My noble Friend Lord Ullswater will write to the right hon. Member with a list of the organisations and place a copy of his reply in both Libraries.

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures he intends to introduce to allow people with disabilities to participate fully in the work force.

Mr. Jackson [holding answer 18 February 1991]: My Department already operates an extensive range of measures designed to help people with disabilities to participate fully in the workplace. These services and schemes were recently reviewed, following which we invited comments on a number of issues and proposals from a wide range of interested parties. We are presently considering responses to these consultations and will decide what changes to the existing measures are required in the light of comments received.

Fit-for-Work Awards

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many fit-for-work awards were given to employers in the last year in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) Scotland, (c) Strathclyde region and (d) Renfrew district.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service executive agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Public Sector Pay

Mr. Higgins: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the public sector pay negotiations he expects to be concluded in the next six months.

Mr. Forth: The timing of the conclusion of public sector pay negotiations is a matter for the employing organisations and the unions concerned.

Euratom

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when and where European Community directives 80/836 Euratom and 84/467 Have been implemented in United Kingdom law.

Mr. Forth: European Council directive 80/836/Euratom, as amended by European Council directive 84/647/Euratom, was implemented in the United Kingdom in 1985. The bulk of the requirements were covered by the Ionising Radiations Regulations 1985 and supporting approved code of practice. The residual requirements were covered by existing legislation:

The Radioactive Substances Act 1960.
The Food Act 1984.
The Medicines (Administration of Radioactive Substances) Regulations 1978.

Vocational Training

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what consultations he has had with the chairman of South Glamorgan TEC regarding the setting up of a centre of excellence in the vocational training field in Cardiff.

Mr. Jackson: My department has had no consultations with the chairman of the South Glamorgan TEC about the establishment of such a centre.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will institute a study jointly with South Glamorgan TEC into the most convenient location or locations for vocational training activities dependent on public funds.

Mr. Jackson: TECs contract with my Department to meet the training needs of their local communities. It is for the TEC and their providers to determine the most convenient locations for training.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what duties training and enterprise councils have in the field of urban regeneration.

Mr. Jackson: TECs contract with my Department to meet the training and enterprise needs of their local communities, including urban areas where relevant.

Mr. Jackson: I have had no such consultations.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Paper Industry

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will make it his policy to restrict the import of chlorine-bleached pulp into the United Kingdom.

Mr. Leigh: Pulp mills in Sweden are going over to other methods of bleaching and those in north America are refining their methods to produce much lower levels of dioxins. United Kingdom industry is voluntarily going over as quickly as possible to wood pulp bleached by other methods, or to unbleached pulp. So there is no need to restrict imports.

Trust Ports

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list and place in the Library copies of all the reports which his Department's marketing initiative has requested relating to trust ports, including that by GP Wild International Ltd. in February 1990.

Mr. Leigh: No. All consultants' reports produced as a result of projects carried out under my Department's consultancy initiatives scheme are commercially confidential in nature. It would not be appropriate therefore for me to list or place in the Library copies of such reports.

1851 Exhibition

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the holder of his office last attended a meeting of the royal commissioners for the exhibition of 1851.

Mr. Leigh: According to the royal commissioners' records, neither the current Secretary of State for Trade and Industry nor the holder of his office has attended commissioners' meetings in the past five years.

Software Directive

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will reconsider the proposed language of the EC software directive to ensure that legitimate activities, hitherto legal under United Kingdom law, do not become inadvertently violative of copyright;

(2) what work his Department has undertaken to study the legislative implications in the United Kingdom of the draft EC software directive.

Mr. Leigh: My Department has kept legislative implications continually under review during negotiations on the directive. The Department's assessment of those implications was set out in the explanatory memorandum submitted to the Scrutiny Committee on 20 November 1990. The directive will require member states to give copyright protection to computer programs as literary works, which is already the case in the United Kingdom. The protection affordable and the legality of current activities will not change to any significant degree.

Bottled Gas

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will publish in the Official Report the percentage increase in the price of bottled gas since the beginning of the Gulf crisis;

(2) what representations he has received regarding recent changes in the price of bottled gas.

Mr. Redwood: My Department does not collect information on price changes for bottled gas. I have received a number of representations about increases in the price of liquefied petroleum gas following recent developments in the Gulf. Copies of all correspondence received have been passed to the Director General of Fair Trading who is making some inquiries into recent changes in the price of LPG. His purpose is to establish whether action is warranted under the competition legislation.

Low-energy Light Bulbs

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to encourage the use of low-energy light bulbs in his Department's offices and other buildings.

Mr. Leigh: The Department's energy efficiency unit is tasked with promoting energy efficiency awareness in all the Department's accommodation management teams, including awareness of the benefits to be gained from energy-efficient lighting.

The Department incorporates energy-efficient lighting schemes in all its building modernisation projects.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many directors were disqualified under the Insolvency Act 1986 during each of the years 1987, 1988, 1989 and 1990, respectively; and how many individual and how many corporate insolvencies there were in each of those years.

Mr. Redwood: There are no provisions in the Insolvency Act 1986 which disqualify directors but every individual who is declared bankrupt by the courts is prohibited from acting in the management of a company for the duration of the bankruptcy, usually three years.

There were provisions relating to director disqualification in the Insolvency Act 1985 and the Companies Act

1985. However, these were consolidated into the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986. The number of directors disqualified under these Acts and the number of individual and corporate insolvencies from 1987 to 1990 are as follows:

	Corporate insolvencies	Individual insolvencies	Disqualification orders
1987	15,030	7,427	193
1988	14,226	8,507	333
1989	16,305	9,365	352
1990	23,630	13,987	382

Kuwait (Reconstruction)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the 168 firms mentioned in his letter to hon. Members on 12 February concerning the reconstruction of Kuwait; and if he will explain the basis on which these firms have been selected.

Mr. Lilley: Details of these companies are set out in the prospectus on "Restructuring Kuwait", copies of which are in the Library of the House. They were selected as providing good examples of United Kingdom industry's experience and capabilities in the areas likely to be of greatest importance for the reconstruction of Kuwait, in close consultation with the six Government-industry sectoral sub-groups which are co-ordinating the United Kingdom's proposals. The prospectus recognises that there are many other British companies capable of assisting Kuwait.

Major Shareholdings Directive

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to publish a consultative document on implementation of the EEC major shareholdings directive.

Mr. Redwood: My Department has today published a consultative document on proposals for implementing the EC directive on the information to be published when a major shareholding in a listed company is acquired or disposed of. Copies are being placed in the Library. The closing date for comments on the proposals is 15 April.

Citizens Advice Bureaux

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the funding over the next three years of DTI grant in aid to the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux and Citizens Advice Scotland.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 11 February 1991]: Details of the DTI grant in aid to NACAB and CAS for the next three years are not available. Expenditure plans for 1991-92 will be published next month in the supply estimates.

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last met representatives of the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux to discuss Department of Trade and Industry grant in aid.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 11 February 1991]: Ministers from my Department meet NACAB from time to time to discuss matters of mutual concern, including funding. Mr. Leigh [holding answer 12 February 1991]: In the financial years 1983-84 to 1989-90, ECGD insurance services covered short-term exports worth £82·5 billion of which 1·6 per cent. related to the export of services.

ECGD's published annual trading accounts include an analysis of the costs of operating ECGD as a whole but do not separately identify the costs of operating the insurance services group.

EC Consumer Policy

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress the Council of Ministers and the European Commission have made in securing common policies at EC level to protect consumer interests.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 12 February 1991]: The Government's White Papers on developments in the European Community, which are published every six months, list measures which have been agreed by the Council of Ministers. A Council resolution on future priorities for relaunching consumer protection policy was adopted in November 1989. Draft directives on general safety, unfair terms in consumer contracts and liability for services have been submitted to the Council by the Commission.

Inward Investment

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his best estimate of the percentage of United Kingdom inward investment projects going to (a) Wales, (b) Scotland and (c) the northern region of England as measured by jobs promised in the period (i) April to October 1989, (ii) October to March 1989-90 and (iii) April to October 1990.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 14 February 1991]: The table sets out the number of investment decisions known to the Invest in Britain Bureau for the periods 1 April 1989 to 30 September 1989, 1 October 1989 to 31 March 1990 and 1 April to 30 September 1989 and the jobs anticipated for each of the regions specified as a proportion of total inward investment known for the United Kingdom during those periods.

The decisions recorded include the establishment of new business, expansion or acquisition of an existing business and involvement in joint venture. The figures are based on information provided by the companies themselves at the time of the investment and take no account of subsequent developments.

Inward Investment decisions and expected new jobs from April 1989—October 1990, broken down into 6 month periods for Wales, Scotland and North East England as a proportion of the total

	Wales		Scotland		North East		Total numbers of
	Projects	Jobs	Projects	Jobs	Projects	Jobs	Projects	Jobs
1 April to 30 September 1989	12·4	15·6	10·6	19·2	10·6	15·9	161	17,030
1 October 1989 to 31 March 1990	22·8	7·6	9·3	29·0	9·8	6·4	193	15,661
1 April to 30 September 1990	16·9	9·5	10·4	31·8	13·0	8·9	154	12,028

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 14 February 1991]: The information requested by the hon. Gentleman is unavailable.

Departmental Purchases

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of (a) the furniture and (b) office equipment and computers purchased by his Department since 1979 was made in the United Kingdom; and what is his Department's policy towards purchasing foreign goods where a British supplier is available.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 18 February 1991]: Details of the British-made proportion of DTI purchases since 1979 in the categories listed are not maintained centrally.

The Government's policy is that Departments should base all procurement of goods and services on value for money, including quality (or fitness for purpose) and delivery against price. In accordance with that policy, goods and services are acquired by competition unless there are convincing reasons to the contrary. Under EC rules, and the GATT Government procurement agreement where appropriate, my Department is obliged to award relevant contracts in accordance with prescribed procedures aimed at avoiding discrimination on grounds of nationality.

Bankruptcies

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the bankruptcies or receiverships in industry, by sector, specifying in particular coal mining, ship building, iron and steel, and agriculture, for each year from 1979 until the latest available date.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 18 February 1991]: The available information on company insolvencies in England and Wales and in Scotland is published in the annual reports on companies; that on personal insolvencies in England and Wales is in the annual report on bankruptcy up to 1987, and for 1988 and 1989 in the annual report on insolvencies. Copies of these publications are available in the Library of the House of Commons.

Consumer Protection

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give figures for forecast outturn for 1990-91 and planned expenditure for 1991-92 to 1993-94 for (a) consumer and investor protection, including separately (i) nationalised industries consumer councils, (ii) miscellaneous consumer protection and advisory services, (iii) investor protection and (b) regulation of trade and consumer protection grants in aid including separately, (1) the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux and the Scottish Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux, (2) consumer groups councils and (3) the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 18 February 1991]: For each of the services mentioned, the forecast outturn for 1990-91 was reflected in the winter supplementary estimate for class IV vote 2, and planned provision for 1991-92 will be set out in the supply estimates to be published in March. The Department's overall plans for expenditure on statutory and regulatory work, including technological support, and consumer protection are set out in "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1991-92 to 1993-94: Trade and Industry" (Cm. 1504).

DEFENCE

The Gulf

10. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the development of and support given to groups assisting the families of those serving in the Gulf.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The services have a well-established structure which combines the work of official and voluntary organisations in the support of personnel and their families. Since deployment to the Gulf began, steps have been taken to provide increased welfare support to families and we are particularly grateful for the many offers of help we have had from groups and individual people. We have encouraged the establishment of local Gulf support groups and contact points for them have been set up in the Ministry of Defence.

17. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are his estimates of the cost of replacing equipment lost in the Gulf war to date.

Mr. Tom King: To date the value of equipment lost and ammunition consumed since hostilities began is approaching £250 million. No decisions have yet been taken on the replacement of lost equipment.

18. Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on the level of civilian casualties in the Gulf war.

Mr. Tom King: Allied policy is to attack only military targets and facilities supporting Iraq's occupation of Kuwait. Great care is being taken to minimise the risk of injuring civilians and we greatly regret any that occur. Iraq has made various claims, but we have no way of checking them.

19. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest estimate for the cost of the British contribution to the Gulf operation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) earlier today.

21. Mr. Litherland: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he has taken to monitor radioactive fallout following air strikes on nuclear installations in Iraq.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) on 29 January, at column 504. We have no evidence of any release of radioactivity from Iraq's nuclear installations.

22. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest estimate of the number of persons killed on both sides in the Gulf war.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Members for Vauxhall (Miss Hoey) and for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on 18 February at column 62.

24. Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will review his "Options for Change" proposals in the light of experiences in the Gulf conflict.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Gulf conflict does not invalidate the work done so far on "Options for Change", which reflects the need to retain the capability to react to such emergencies. However, we will ensure that lessons learnt in the Gulf are incorporated in our planning.

Mr. Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to deploy fixed-wing naval aircraft in the Gulf.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Ministry of Defence has no plans at present to deploy fixed-wing naval aircraft to the Gulf.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many qualified plastic surgeons are available in the middle east to deal with burns and soft tissue injuries.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is not our practice to give details of support provision for the Gulf operation. Sufficient plastic surgery facilities are available in theatre to deal with burns and soft tissue injuries before medical evacuation of casualties to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether the tour of duty of television correspondents currently with British troops in the Gulf has been extended;

(2) whether he will publish a table showing the proposed dates of rotation for television correspondents attached to allied troops in the Gulf.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Ministry of Defence has not established a fixed programme for rotation of TV correspondents attached to British units in the Gulf.

Atomic Weapons Establishment

20. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received recently about the Government's proposed contractorisation of AWE.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Recently I have received a number of written questions from right hon. and hon. Members which have, in the main, raised various concerns, in particular the future of pensions and other conditions of service for AWE personnel. There have also been similar letters from individual members of the AWE staff.

Brawdy Defence Establishment

23. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he would make a statement on the future of the defence establishment at Brawdy in Dyfed.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We are continuing to examine the scope for rationalisation across the range of defence activities. Any decisions will be announced in the normal way.

Defence Review

25. Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether any further progress has been made in his Department's review of Britain's defence commitments.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State indicated on 21 January, Official Report, column 103, we are continuing to study the proposals in "Options for Change" which were announced last July. We intend to proceed with rationalisation and other support changes where these do not affect our efforts in the Gulf.

The Gulf conflict does not invalidate the approach we took last summer, which foresaw the need to retain the capability to react to such emergencies. However, the lessons learnt in the Gulf will be incorporated in our planning in due course.

Holy Loch Base

26. Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on the reduction of United States navy personnel at the Holy Loch submarine base at Faslane.

29. Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on the reduction of United States navy personnel at the Holy Loch submarine base at Faslane.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence said on 5 February, the United States navy will, by the end of this year, no longer have a requirement for its submarine support facility at the Holy Loch and this facility will therefore close. The exact date of closure has yet to be determined, but is likely to be some time in 1992. The Royal Navy base at Faslane is unaffected by the United States decision to withdraw from the Holy Loch.

European Co-operation

27. Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to meet the Secretary General of NATO to discuss European co-operation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My right hon. Friend has regular meetings with the Secretary-General of NATO. Their next scheduled meeting is in the spring. A range of defence issues will be discussed.

Staff Relocation

28. Mr. Holt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions in the past five years Defence Department Ministers have made parliamentary statements concerning the relocation of MOD staff subsequently to renege on the promises given.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: None. Of course, during the planning stages all relocation proposals are kept under review to ensure that they continue to meet the requirement to be operationally and economically viable.

Departmental Achievements

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the principal achievements of his Department since June 1987.

Mr. Tom King: The Ministry of Defence has continued its work, in concert with other Government Departments, to sustain national security, principally through a resolute commitment to the North Atlantic alliance. We have played a full part in NATO's response to changing security circumstances in Europe, as outlined in the London declaration of July 1990.

We are looking at "Options for Change" in our own armed forces to reflect the improved security situation in Europe, which should allow us to maintain strong defences with lower levels of armed forces.

Following Iraq's unprovoked invasion of Kuwait, British forces are now engaged in the international effort to secure Iraqi withdrawal and to restore international peace and security in the area, in accordance with United Nations Security Council resolutions.

We have supported and contributed to NATO's efforts to establish closer relations with the Soviet Union and the countries of eastern Europe, and have been actively engaged in European arms control talks. We have worked to strengthen the European pillar of the alliance, and through our chairmanship of the independent European programme group have helped to promote closer European co-operation in defence.

We continue to seek greater efficiency in the management of defence and are implementing a number of programmes to safeguard and build upon the Department's generally good record of protecting the natural environment.

British Aerospace plc

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what conditions Her Majesty's Government places on its contracts with British Aerospace plc concerning the locations where consequential manufacturing and employment occurs.

Mr. Alan Clark: As a general rule, my Department does not, in its contracts with British Aerospace or any other company, stipulate where work is to be carried out.

Ceremonies

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current estimated annual cost of ceremonial horses and soldiers in the defence budget; what percentage of the whole budget this represents; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Members of the Household Division and King's Troop Royal Horse Artillery are required to perform both military and ceremonial duties and therefore it is not possible, without disproportionate effort and cost, to separately identify the personnel costs of each of these roles. However, the Household Cavalry Mounted Regiment and King's Troop Royal Horse Artillery have approximately 400 horses which are used for ceremonial duties at an estimated cost of £0·47 million for financial year 1990-91. This represents 0·0022 per cent. of the defence budget.

Iraqi Nationals

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the status of Iraqi nationals held at Roleston; and by what authority they are held there.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Iraqi nationals at Rollestone are considered to be members of the Iraqi armed forces and, as such, are being held in accordance with the provisions of the 1949 Geneva convention relating to prisoners of war.

British Airways Tristars

Mr. Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions his Department is having with British Airways about purchasing its redundant Tristar aircraft.

Mr. Alan Clark: None.

HMS Endurance

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether HMS Endurance will end active duty at the end of her current cruise.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No such decision has been taken.

THE ARTS

Royal Opera House

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Minister for the Arts what representations he has received concerning Mr. Ewen Balfour; and if he will make a statement on the public accountability of the Royal Opera house, Covent Garden in respect of matters for which he is responsible.

Mr. Renton: I have received one letter about Mr. Balfour from a member of the public as well as a copy of my hon. Friend's letter to Lord Sainsbury, chairman of the Royal Opera house. The Royal Opera house is a revenue client of the Arts Council and is therefore directly accountable to the Arts Council on matters relating to its artistic and financial performance. The council is, in turn, accountable to me for the efficient administration of its grant in aid. Grant allocations to individuals clients is a matter for the Arts Council.

European Currency Unit

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer why he has issued a public loan based on the European currency unit; how much has been raised; and what is the interest rate.

Mr. Maples: The issue of a bond denominated in ecu shows the importance the Government attach to the strengthening of London's leading position in this growing market and demonstrates our commitment to the development of the ecu. The offer is for 2·5 billion ecu. The bonds carry a coupon of 9⅛ per cent. priced at par.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consultation he has had with the institutions of the EC about his decision to raise a loan in European currency units.

Mr. Maples: None.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what purposes his new European currency unit loan will be used.

Mr. Maples: The United Kingdom Government's 2½ billion ecu issue shows the importance we attach to strengthening London's leading position in this growing market and demonstrates our commitment to the development of the ecu. The proceeds will be added to our gold and foreign currency reserves.

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has on the rates of capital gains tax in EC and G7 countries and the Soviet Union.

Mr. Maude: The latest available information on EC and G7 countries is given in the table, which is supplemented by notes. No information is available on capital gains tax in the Soviet Union.

Countries have widely differing procedures for calculating the taxable proportion of a gain, and in many cases rates of tax depend on the type of asset on which the gain is made and the period for which the asset has been held. In most EC and G7 countries the gains of individuals and companies are added to income and taxed at the ordinary income or corporation tax rate as appropriate, but various reliefs and exemptions may apply.

The majority of these countries have no equivalent to indexation which substantially reduces the effective rate of tax in the United Kingdom and Ireland. Some countries have no equivalent of the £5,000 annual exemption in the United Kingdom. Where there is such an exemption, it is generally very much lower than in the United Kingdom.

Country	Nominal rates of tax on gains of individuals Per cent.	Companies Per cent.
EC
Belgium	0-33[1]	41[2]
Denmark	exempt or 22-68[3]	50
France	16 or 5-56·8[4]	34[5]
Germany	19-53	50
Greece	exempt or 10-25[6]	46
Ireland	30-50[7]	30-50[7]
Italy	10-50[8] plus 16·2 local tax	36 plus[9] 16·2 local tax
Luxembourg	10-56[10]	34 plus local tax (7·2-12)
Netherlands	35·75-60[11]	35
Portugal	exempt or 10[12]	36·5
Spain	25-56	35
United Kingdom	25 or 40[13]	25 or 35[13]
Other G7
Canada	17-29[14] plus provincial tax	38 plus[14] provincial tax
Japan	10-50 plus local taxes 5-15[15]	37·5 plus local taxes 17-20
USA	15 or 28[16] plus state tax	15-34 plus[16] state tax

[1] Gains are generally exempt, but some speculative gains are taxed at up to 33 per cent.
[2] Some gains are exempt and long-term gains are taxed at 20·5 per cent.
[3] A special flat rate of 50 per cent. applies to investment gains if the seller has a "substantial interest" in the company.
[4] The 16 per cent. rate applies to some gains including those on the sale of certain unquoted shares and shares which constitute a substantial interest in a company.
[5] Some long-term corporation gains are taxed at lower rates of 19 or 25 per cent.
[6] Gains on moveable assets, including shares, are not taxed. Gains on immovable assets are subject to capital gains tax at varying rates depending on period for which asset was held.
[7] Rates depend on period for which asset was held.
[8] Gains only taxed if deemed to be derived from business assets sold within five years of date of acquisition.
[9] Corporate gains not taxed if allocated to a special reserve or are reinvested within two years.
[10] Gains on sale of immovable property held between two and 10 years are taxed at half the average rate on the individual's total income.
[11] Gains on sale or private assets are exempt.
[12] Only 50 per cent. of the gain on some types of asset is subject to tax.
[13] The charge is confined to post-March 1982 indexed gains. Individuals are exempt from tax on gains not exceeding £5,000.
[14] Three quarters of post-1971 gains are included in income and taxed at appropriate rates. Provincial rates vary. Rates in Ontario, the most populous province, are 53 per cent. of federal income tax for individuals and 10 to 15·5 per cent. of gains for corporations. For individuals there is a cumulative exemption on gains up to a lifetime limit of $100,000.
[15] Gains by individuals taxable only if deemed to be business transactions.
[16] Most states impose a state tax on both individuals and companies. In California, the most populous state, the top rate of 9·3 per cent. produces effective maximum rates of approximately 34 per cent. for individuals and 40 per cent. for companies.

Civil Service Relocation

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the Government's policy on the relocation of Government Departments from London to the regions.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave on 23 January 1991, at columns 217-18, to my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell).

Manufacturing Trade

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the cumulative total of annual manufacturing trade balance of payments deficits between (a) 1975 to 1979 and (b) 1979 to 1990.

Mr. Maples: The latest information is available in table A9 of the monthly review of external trade statistics and its annual supplement, available in the Library of the House, or on the Central Statistical Office database, which may also be accessed through the Library.

Overseas Trade Statistics

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action he intends to take to ensure that overseas trade statistics will be published and available following the agreement of the House of Commons (Services) Committee that a return of statistics relating to overseas trade need no longer be laid before the House.

Mr. Maples: Following consultation with the House authorities and with the approval of the House of Commons (Services) Committee, it has been agreed to cease the requirement for overseas trade statistics (OTS) to be laid before the House.

The OTS will continue to be published by HMSO for the Central Statistical Office as a monthly and annual business monitor, (MM20 and MA20) "Overseas Trade Statistics", copies of which are and will continue to be available in the statistical section of the Library (and by green demand forms from the Vote Office). Summary information held on the CSO's database in the form of time-series can also be obtained by the Library.

Third World Debt

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current total of outstanding debt owed to the United Kingdom by third world countries.

Mr. Maples [holding answer 11 February 1991]: The total amount of debt owed to the United Kingdom Government by developing countries is currently about £7·3 billion.

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current annual value to the United Kingdom of debt interest payments from the third world.

Mr. Maples [holding answer 11 February 1991]: The United Kingdom Government received about £150 million in interest on outstanding debt from developing countries in 1989-90.

Inland Revenue Office, Glenrothes

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will outline (a) the number of jobs to be created by the opening of a new Inland Revenue office at Saltire house in Glenrothes, (b) how many jobs will be recruited locally and (c) what steps are being taken to advertise and recruit local staff.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 12 February 1991]: (a) It is not possible at present to specify the exact number of new jobs that will eventually arise. The office will have 45 staff by April this year and will build up, mainly from January 1992, towards full staffing in the second quarter of 1992. On current planning assumptions it is expected that there will be up to some 250 part-time and full-time jobs at that time.

(b) Most of the staff that are setting up the office have been transferred from nearby Inland Revenue offices. However, about 20 per cent. of those in post by April this year are expected to be new recruits from the local area, and it is planned that most of the additional staff required subsequently will be obtained as far as possible by local recruitment.

(c) The recruitment will be carried out in accordance with the guidelines laid down by the Civil Service Commission for all Government Departments. The Inland Revenue will notify the local careers office and job centre about the posts and will consider advertising in the local press as necessary.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to open a new Inland Revenue office at Saltire house in Glenrothes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 12 February 1991]: The Inland Revenue opened a new office at Saltire house in Glenrothes on 7 January 1991. The office is one of a number of new Inland Revenue offices opening throughout the United Kingdom in 1991 and early 1992. They will handle claims for repayments of tax, most of which will arise from the change in the taxation of interest from banks, building societies and other deposit-takers that comes into effect on 6 April 1991.

Investment

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the figures for investment in industry by sector in cash and real terms for each year from 1979 until the most recent period; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 18 February 1991]: The latest estimates of the volume of investment by manufacturing industry were published in the CSO press notice "Capital Expenditure: Provisional Estimates for Q4 1990" on 14 February, available in the House of Commons Library. The most up-to-date estimates for other industries may be obtained from the CSO databank, a collection of macro-economic time series in computer-readable form to which the Library has direct access.

Business investment reached an all-time high in 1989 —53 per cent. higher than its 1979 level.

Oil Tax

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total tax on North sea oil production, including royalties, paid by oil companies monthly from August 1989 to the present time; and if he will include any other revenues from petroleum products in that total.

Mr. Maples: The table shows tax receipts on North sea production and other taxes on petroleum products.

£ million

	Tax on North sea production	Hydrocarbon oil duties	VAT on petroleum products (quarterly)
August 1989	318	747	—
September 1989	205	739	290
October 1989	357	708	—
November 1989	68	765	—
December 1989	252	735	290
January 1990	193	698	—
February 1990	85	710	—
March 1990	679	708	290
April 1990	89	851	—
May 1990	87	802	—
June 1990	−15	839	320
July 1990	88	813	—
August 1990	106	847	—
September 1990	489	817	340
October 1990	517	776	—
November 1990	313	804	—
December 1990	−145	802	—

Taxes on North sea production include royalties, petroleum revenue tax and North sea corporation tax before ACT set-off. Receipts of hydrocarbon oils duties are published by the Central Statistical Office in "Financial Statistics". The figures for VAT on petroleum products are estimates, based on quarterly consumers' expenditure data.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out in the Official Report the reasons for the regional per capita distribution of departmental expenditure shown in annex 2 of the first report of Session 1990-91 from the Treasury and Civil Service Committee on the 1990 autumn statement—House of Commons Paper No. 41.

Mr. Mellor: Responsibility for allocation of departmental expenditure between regions lies with individual Departments. Questions about variations in expenditure between regions are matters for the responsible Department.

Savings

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish an analysis of United Kingdom savings totals by type of investment or investment product for the most recent three years for which figures are available.

Mr. Mellor: The table gives, for the period 1987-1989, the latest estimates of amounts invested—inflows net of realisations—by the United Kingdom personal sector in a range of financial instruments which are used to a considerable degree, if not exclusively, as repositories of savings. It is not possible to quantify total savings with precision because of the dual-purpose nature of many of these instruments; equally, other forms of asset, such as property, may at times be regarded by their owners as having a "savings" aspect as well as their primary function.

	1987 £ million	1988 £ million	1989 £ million
Life assurance and pensions	21,700	22,396	30,482
National Savings	2,439	1,409	−1,520
Building society deposits	13,635	20,165	17,461
Sterling time deposits with United Kingdom banks	771	8,092	10,968
Unit trusts units	3,239	− 248	− 719
British government securities	1,826	− 3,633	− 3,088
United Kingdom company securities	−9,850	−12,233	−18,398

Statistical series measuring the personal sector's net acquisition of these and other financial assets are published in the CSO's "Financial Statistics" and can also be found on the CSO database which is accessible through the Library.

Composite Rate Taxation

Mr. Lawson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of (a) the loss of revenue and (b) the increase in administration costs arising from the abolition of the composite rate of tax in the 1990 budget.

Mr. Norman Lamont In principle composite rate tax would produce the same yield as the system which is replacing it, but there are behavioural and timing effects which affect receipts. An estimate of the effect on receipts was given in the Financial Statement and Budget Report 1990-91. An updated estimate will be published in this year's Financial Statement and Budget Report.

The estimated increases in the Inland Revenue's administration costs in the current year and the next three years are approximately £55 million in 1990-91, £165 million in 1991-92, £110 million in 1992-93 and £90 million in 1993-94.

Exchange Rates

Mr. Shore: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, if the pound sterling reaches its floor within the ERM, there is any limit to the extent of funds which would be made available to support it from the central banks.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 19 February 1991]: I refer the right hon. Gentleman to the reply my right hon. Friend the former Chancellor of the Exchequer gave him on 22 October 1990, Official Report, columns 9-10.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Advisory Body for the Research Councils

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will state the purpose of the ABRC's flexibility margins.

Mr. Alan Howarth: When my right hon. and learned Friend announced the allocation of the science budget for 1991-92, and of the planning figures for 1992-93 and 1993-94 on 24 January, Official Report columns 286-87, he indicated that £39 million and £60 million remained unallocated in the latter two years and that he was expecting further advice on the distribution of those sums from the Advisory Board for the Research Councils in the spring. By that time the board will have received and considered the programme plans for the period 1992-93 to 1994-95 from each of the funded bodies.

CERN

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will state the reasons for the unpredicted rise in the British subscription to CERN.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The CERN budget for the forthcoming year is finalised each December by the CERN council, on which the United Kingdom is represented. Each member state's contribution is determined on an agreed formula based on relative GNP. The likely level of the United Kingdom subscription is therefore known in advance of the preparation of Supply estimates each year. The exact amount due is finalised during the year in question in the light of current United Kingdom/Swiss exchange rates and other relevant factors.

As my reply to my hon. Friend on 4 February 1991, Official Report, columns 8-9, showed, the United Kingdom's subscription to CERN has in fact been reduced since 1987-88.

Secondary School Pupils

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the cost of educating a secondary school pupil in (a) Surrey, (b) Kingston and (c) Sutton; what is the inter-authority recoupment payment between those authorities in respect of secondary pupils; and what provision is made to ensure that a school enjoys the full benefit of inter-authority recoupment payments which are made in respect of out-county pupils.

Mr. Fallon: In 1988-89, the latest year for which data are available, the school-based spending per secondary school pupil was £1,635 in Surrey, £1,905 in Kingston-upon-Thames and £1,630 in Sutton. Inter-authority recoupment rates are determined by local authorities and information on actual payments between individual authorities is not collected centrally. However, the inter-authority recoupment rates recommended by local authority associations for secondary school pupils in 1988-89 were £1,982 per pupil aged under 16 and £3,064 per pupil aged over 16 educated in the outer London area, which includes Kingston-upon-Thames and Sutton; and £1,889 per pupil under 16 and £2,920 per pupil over 16 educated in the London fringe area, which includes Surrey. These payments are to cover both school-based and central local education authority spending. Under authorities' schemes for the local management of schools, a school receives the same funding for all pupils of the same age—with a different weighting for different subjects in sixth forms under some authorities' schemes—whether such pupils are the financial responsibility of the providing or a different authority.

Higher Education

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he intends to hold back grant from the higher education funding councils next year in respect of pay settlements for lecturers in higher education.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes. My Department has written to the two higher education funding councils to convey my decision to hold back a proportion of grant for 1991-92 to be released in the event of pay settlements satisfying specified conditions. The sums withheld are £22 million in the case of the Universities Funding Council and £134 million for the Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council. Copies of the letters are being placed in the Library of the House.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Nursing Homes

Rev. William McCrea: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many beds are available in public nursing homes for the elderly; and what was the equivalent number five years ago.

Mr. Hanley: None. The health and social services boards have never been involved in the provision of nursing homes in Northern Ireland.

Rev. William McCrea: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) private nursing homes and (b) private residential homes there are in each of the health board areas in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: The information is as follows:

(a) At 31 December 1990, the latest date for which information is held centrally, the number of registered nursing homes in Northern Ireland was as follows:

Board	Private homes	Voluntary homes
Eastern	62	4
Northern	50	2
Southern	24	5
Western	17	—

(b) At 31 March 1990, the latest date for which information is held centrally, the number of registered homes for persons in need was as follows:

Board	Private homes	Voluntary homes
Eastern	66	30
Northern	37	9
Southern	21	3
Western	[1]3	[1]5

[1] The figures supplied in respect of the Western Board relate to 31 March 1989 as the information relating to 31 Maarch 1990 is not yet available.

WALES

Science Parks

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many science parks there are in Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: There are currently seven science parks in Wales, Aberystwyth science park, Cardiff business technology centre, Menai technology enterprise centre—MENTEC—Newtech science park, University College of Swansea innovation centre, Wrexham technology park and the Mid Glamorgan science park at Bridgend.

In addition, there are plans for the Imperial College science park at Duffryn, Gwent.

Company Losses

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the companies, and the numbers involved, which have ceased trading, gone into receivership and announced redundancies in each of the counties of Wales since 1 June 1990.

Mr. David Hunt: Figures for company failures are maintained and published by the Department of Trade and Industry on an England and Wales basis. Separate official figures for Wales are not available. Provisional figures provided by the Department of Employment on notified redundancies in Wales during the period June to December 1990 are as follows:

	Numbers
South Glamorgan	500
Mid Glamorgan	1,520
West Glamorgan	560
Gwent	911
Dyfed	137
Clwyd	520
Gwynedd	67
Powys	46
Wales	4,261

Over the same period, Welsh Development International recorded 83 new inward investment projects for Wales promising capital investment of £327 million and more than 5,000 new jobs.

Lithotripsy

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to see the installation of lithotripters in north and south Wales for the use of NHS patients; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: An all-Wales project group is presently considering the need for and specification of lithotripter facilities for Wales and appraising location options. The group is expected to report shortly.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number of manufacturing jobs lost in Wales since 1 June 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: Comprehensive information regarding jobs lost in the manufacturing industry in Wales is not available. There were 249,000 full-time and part-time employees in employment in the manufacturing sector in Wales—SIC 80 divisions 2-4—in June 1990, and 253,000 in September 1990, the latest month for which estimates are available.

Industrial and Regional Development

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to meet the Assembly of Welsh Counties to discuss industrial and regional development.

Mr. David Hunt: No such meeting has been arranged.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to meet the Committee of Welsh District Councils to discuss industrial and regional development; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: I intend to meet the Council for Welsh Districts in due course to discuss its strategy document "Wales: A Land of Opportunity".

Farming

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representation he has received from (a) the National Farmers Union in Wales and (b) Young Farmers Club representatives in Wales concerning the development of a co-ordinated marketing and processing structure for the livestock sector in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: Invited comments have been received from the National Farmers Union in Wales on the United Kingdom's draft sectoral plans prepared in connection with EC regulation 866/90 on the marketing and processing of agricultural produce. No recent representations have been received from Young Farmers Club representatives in Wales.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he has any plans to make representations to the European Commission requesting the use of European structural funds to provide a co-ordinated marketing and processing structure for the livestock sector in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: No. EC regulation 866/90, which provides grants for the marketing and processing of agricultural produce, is already in place.

School Class Sizes

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what have been the average class sizes in maintained primary and secondary schools in Wales in each year from 1976-77 to 1990-91.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The details of average class size are given in the following table. The primary school information relates to the average size of registered classes. In the case of secondary schools, the information is based on registered classes in years 1 to 5 for the period 1976-77 to 1988-89. Data on classes, as taught, is available only from 1986-87 onwards.

Information for 1990-91 is not available.

Farm Animals

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what advice he offers to local authorities concerning the disposal of impounded straying stock; and what safeguards are in force to ensure the proper disposal of the carcases of slaughtered animals.

Mr. David Hunt: Local authorities may exercise powers under existing legislation, or seek additional powers, to deal with straying stock including, where relevant, its disposal. The disposal of carcases is usually carried out by the rendering industry or by knackermen and similar operators, although alternatives are available. Advice on meeting health and environmental restrictions is available from the state veterinary service, ADAS, the National Rivers Authority and local authorities, and is contained in the draft code of good agricultural practice for the protection of water.

Dental Services

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the school dentist service consequent upon the new dental contracts.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The responsibility of district health authorities, via the community dental service, to provide school-based screening arrangements for children is not affected by the introduction of the new contract for general dental practitioners.

Under-fives

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list in rank order the percentage of under-fives in maintained nursery and primary schools in each Welsh local education authority.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The information as at January 1990 is as follows:

Swansea Accommodation for the Single Homeless

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give details of all support provided by the Welsh Office to SASH in Swansea.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The Department is providing the following support to Swansea Accommodation for the Single Homeless in 1990-91:

Under Section 73, Housing Act 1985	71,150
Urban Programme Funding	33,600
Grant under Section 28(a) of the National Health Service Act 1977	19,000

Mental Handicap

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultation took place between the Welsh Office and the advisory panel of the all-Wales strategy for mental handicap prior to the publication of his local management of schools draft circular of 21 December 1990 concerning the application of local management of schools procedures to special schools in Wales; and if he will list those items where there is a conflict between the local management of schools strategy objectives and the all-Wales strategy objectives.

Sir Wyn Roberts: There is no conflict between the local management of schools—LMS—arrangements and the all-Wales mental handicap strategy. Under LMS, local education authorities retain their statutory responsibility to ensure that proper provision is made for children who are the subject of statements of special educational need. The report of the all-Wales panel on educational provision and services in the mental handicap strategy recommended that the effects of LMS on the financing of special needs provision should be carefully monitored by the Department and local education authorities.

Low-energy Light Bulbs

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he is taking to encourage the use of low-energy light bulbs in his Department's offices and other buildings.

Mr. David Hunt: My Department will invest in high-efficiency lighting where it is cost effective to do so. A start has been made in our headquarters building, and lighting surveys for other offices are planned as part of a five-year energy efficiency programme.

Special Schools

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how his four key policy objectives for the local management of schools apply to special schools; and what benefit such schools will obtain from the implementation of these objectives.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the feasibility study carried out by the management consultants, Touche Ross, on extending local management to special schools, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he had with Mencap-in-Wales, with the Spastic Society in Wales and with the Wales Council for the Disabled, respectively, before publishing his draft circular of 21 December 1990, dealing with the application of LMS procedures to special schools in Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The draft LMS circular was issued as a consultation document. It is open to organisations such as Mencap-in-Wales to submit their views on the proposals. The closing date for receipt of comments is 1 March 1991.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will clarify his intentions with regard to allowing special schools to apply for delegated management under the provisions of the Education Reform Act, specifying who is empowered to make such an application on behalf of a special school; and what consultation procedures have to be fulfilled by such persons before the application can be made;

(2) whether in his proposals for the application of local management of schools provisions to special schools in Wales he intends local education authorities to make charges to the special schools in its area which have opted for local management, for centrally-organised resources such as educational psychology, pre-school assessment units, peripatetic special needs assessment teams, dyslexia units and those statutory responsibilities of the Education Act 1981 which cannot be delegated to special schools; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I am currently seeking the views of the LEAs and other interested parties on the proposals described in the LMS draft circular. It would not be proper for me to pre-empt the outcome of this consultation process.

Felinheli Bypass

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his written answer of 14 February to the hon. Member for Caernarfon, relating to the A487 Felinheli bypass, why supplementary orders were necessary; on what date they were published; until what date objections were accepted; how many objections were received to these supplementary orders; and what was the nature of the objections.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Supplementary orders were required to take account of recommendations by the public inquiry inspector and other changes identified later during the detailed design of the scheme. Drafts of the supplementary side roads order and the supplementary compulsory purchase order were published on the 19 October and 9 November 1990 respectively and the periods for objection expired on 30 November. There were eight objections and three representations which were mainly concerned with the effects on agricultural land; inadequacy of farm accesses; the acquisition of additional land and the dismantling of railway track.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales which consulting engineers were employed to design the A487 Felinheli bypass; and whether he intends to employ anyone else in this capacity to expedite the scheme.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Messrs Parkman consulting engineers. There are no plans to employ another consulting engineer.

Oil Spillage, Llanwern

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will instigate an inquiry into the fuel oil leak from British Steel's Llanwern plant, specifically to cover how the pipe was fractured and why such a large quantity of fuel oil was able to leak out; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The National Rivers Authority is currently investigating the Llanwern leak and we have asked to be kept informed. British Steel is also conducting an internal technical inquiry.

HEALTH

Waiting Lists

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what was the number and percentage of patients waiting for non-urgent operations in 1980, 1985 and 1990 (a) nationally and (b) in the Doncaster health authority area;

(2) what is the percentage of those waiting for non-urgent operations who wait longer than (a) one year, (b) six months and (c) two years (i) nationally and (ii) in the Doncaster health authority area.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information requested is given in the tables. Since March 1987 information on waiting lists has not been classified according to urgency of condition. Figures for 1990 therefore relate to all patients waiting for in-patient treatment in the surgical acute specialties.

It is the time people wait which is important. Since 1980 the number of patients waiting over a year for in-patient treatment in the surgical acute specialties has fallen by 61 per cent. in Doncaster health authority and by nearly 11 per cent. in England as a whole.

Numbers of non-urgent cases waiting on surgical specialty lists for in-patient treatment

Year	England	Doncaster
March 1980	580,598	3,718
March 1985	614,217	4,713

Total numbers waiting on surgical specialty lists for in-patient treatment

Year	England	Doncaster
March 1990	723,447	4,617

Source: KHO6/7/7A—March 1990.

Over the period 1979 to 1988-89, the NHS has increased inpatient treatment as follows:

	1979	1988-89
England	5,400,120	6,585,982
Doncaster	28,103	41,969

an increase of 22 per cent. nationally—49·3 per cent. in the Doncaster area.

Day case treatment also increased as follows:

	1979	1988-89
England	592,061	1,016,327
Doncaster	2,909	4,961

an increase of 71·7 per cent. nationally—70·5 per cent. in the Doncaster area.

Tobacco

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 11 February, Official Report, column 351, what steps he has taken to date to ensure that the health issues arising from the EC tobacco regime were given full consideration; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health has raised this matter with our EC partners on a number of occasions. She will do so again with the Luxembourg Minister of Health when he visits London today. Ministers at the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food have also raised the United Kingdom's concern about the tobacco regime with other EC Agriculture Ministers.

The Gulf

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provision is being made for trained experts in psychotherapy to be co-ordinated for the effective treatment of service men and women and their families suffering from trauma, stress and long-term mental illness consequent upon the war in the Gulf.

Mr. Dorrell: All services personnel and their families suffering from any form of stress or mental illness as a consequence of the war in the Gulf and referred to the National Health Service will have available to them the normal range of psychiatric services available in the health service. The Royal College of Psychiatrists has provided regional health authorities with a list of doctors specially able to advise on the co-ordination of effective treatment in such cases.

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what steps have been taken to increase the number of trained psychologists who specialise in therapy for the treatment of trauma, stress and long-term mental illness of service men and women and their families arising from the war in the Gulf; and what he is doing to ensure that this is done on a national basis;

(2) what additional funding is being made available for training to be given to nursing staff to deal with problems of trauma, stress and mental illness in the cases of families and service men and women arising from war in the Gulf.

Mr. Dorrell: In general, health authorities are responsible for deciding the training their staff require to carry out the services they undertake to provide.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what arrangements are being made for non-emergency patients whose admissions have been postponed as a result of the Gulf crisis.

Mr. Dorrell: There is no need for health authorities to prepare for Gulf casualties by clearing beds or postponing non-emergency admissions until significant ground operations begin. Health authorities will be responsible for making alternative arrangements for any deferred non-emergency admissions if Gulf casualties arrive for treatment in the NHS. The extra money available to meet the full costs of treating any Gulf casualties in the NHS would alleviate inevitable pressures on health authorities and ensure as far as possible minimum disturbance to the normal NHS workload.

Children

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provision is currently made for children with severe learning difficulties, extreme challenging behaviour and autism; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: Much provision for such children is made within the education service, which is the responsibility of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science. Health authorities and social services departments provide a range of services including treatment, respite and long-term residential care, and support to families.

Low-energy Light Bulbs

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to encourage the use of low-energy light bulbs in his Department's offices and other buildings and throughout the national health service.

Mr. Dorrell: The Department's building managers are instructed to consider installing low energy lighting when replacing existing installations. For the NHS comprehensive guidance on all aspects of lighting, including low-energy lamps, is included in volume 2 of the publication ENCODE issued to all health authorities in 1986, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Liver Transplants

Sir Anthony Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many liver transplant operations were conducted in Britain in the last 10 years; and how many such patients died within one year of the operation.

Mr. Dorrell: According to information supplied by the United Kingdom transplant service the number of liver transplants performed in NHS hospitals in the United Kingdom since 1982 were:

	Numbers
1982	21
1983	20
1984	51
1985	88
1986	127
1987	172
1988	241
1989	295
1990	[1]359

[1] Provisional.

Information on survival rates is not collected centrally. However a recent study at the Queen Elizabeth hospital, Birmingham indicated that the one-year survival rate had risen from 20 to 30 per cent. before 1980 to a current level of over 60 per cent.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Wolfson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, further to his announcement on 4 December 1990, Official Report, columns 173-76, if he will announce any other further expressions of interest by hospitals or other units which are proceeding to NHS trust status for April 1992; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have now agreed that a further six hospitals and other units, which have expressed an interest in trust status, can proceed to work up applications to become trusts on 1 April 1992. These are

West Berkshire Health Services
Ealing Acute Hospital
York Health Services
Lancaster Acute Hospital Services
Lancaster Priority Services
Bath and Wiltshire Community Services

Since I last announced a total of 123 expressions of interest, eight of these hospitals and other units have decided to work to a slower time scale in their consideration of trust status. These are

Darlington Health Services
Kendal Hospitals
West Norfolk and Wisbech Community Unit
East Surrey Mental Illness and Mental Handicap
Bexley Mental Health
Queen Victoria Hospital East Grinstead
Eastbourne Community Services
Dartford and Gravesham Acute Services

At this stage each unit is considering in detail the implications of NHS trust status, and this list will be subject to change until the formal applications are received.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Manufacturing Output

4. Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the increase in manufacturing output over the last decade.

Mr. Sainsbury: In 1989 manufacturing output was over 22 per cent. higher than it was in 1980.

Textiles and Clothing

19. Mr. Cunliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the future of trade in textiles and clothing.

Mr. Sainsbury: Multilateral negotiations to agree a successor regime to govern international trade in textiles after the MFA expires on 31 July 1991 are an element of the wider GATT Uruguay round discussions. The United Kingdom and EC, together with all other negotiating partners, remain committed to integrating the textiles sector into GATT on the basis of strengthening rules and disciplines.

Trade and Industry (North Devon)

22. Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will visit north Devon to meet the North Devon Manufacturing Association and the chambers of commerce and trade to discuss trade and industrial development.

Mr. Lilley: I have made no plans to visit north Devon, but hope that I or one of my colleagues in the Department of Trade and Industry will be able to do so during the course of this year.

GATT

23. Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has made any new proposals with regard to the current round of GATT talks.

Mr. Sainsbury: The European Commission represents the Community and the member states in the GATT negotiations. Community Trade Ministers, at their last meeting, called on the Commission to take all necessary action to reach a balanced agreement covering all sectors as soon as possible. Talks are continuing with a view to bringing this about.

Germany

24. Mr. Ron Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about trade relations with Germany.

Mr. Sainsbury: We have excellent trade relations with Germany. Provisional figures indicate that Germany was our top export market in 1990.

Manufacturing Industry (North-West)

25. Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the prospects for manufacturing industry in the north-west.

Mr. Leigh: The prospects for manufacturing in the North-West, as in the rest of the country, are excellent. Inflation is set to fall sharply, leaving industry well placed to build on the improvements of the past decade and to benefit from the completion of the single market and the opening up of eastern europe.

Trade and Industry (North-West)

26. Mr. Litherland: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with the north-west TUC, chamber of commerce and chamber of trade about the viability of trade and industry in the north-west region.

Mr. Leigh: I have held no meetings to date with these regional bodies. The Government's policies are aimed at the long-term prosperity of trade and industry in all regions of the United Kingdom.

Car Exports

27. Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of cars manufactured or assembled in the United Kingdom were exported in the years 1979 and 1990.

Mr. Lilley: A total of 31 per cent. of cars manufactured or assembled in the United Kingdom in 1990 were exported, compared with 34 per cent. in 1979.

Recession

29. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next plans to meet representatives of the Confederation of British Industry to discuss the recession in industry in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend regularly meets representatives of the Confederation of British Industry. He met the director general most recently last week.

39. Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will next meet representatives of the east midlands regional Confederation of British Industry to discuss the recession in industry.

Mr. Leigh: Officials of my Department keep in touch with the east midlands regional Confederation of British Industry on a wide range of business matters.

Cars (EC Access)

30. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with the EC about access by Japanese-owned British car firms to the EC; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: I have had a number of discussions with the EC Commission and with other member states about trade in cars within the EC and between the EC and Japan. The Government have consistently taken the line, which the Commission accepts, that cars produced in the United Kingdom by Japanese-owned companies must be treated as European products in every respect.

South Africa

31. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the level of trade with South Africa in the last 12 months; and whether he expects any change.

Mr. Sainsbury: In 1990 the value of United Kingdom visible exports to South Africa was £1,113 million. Visible imports totalled £1,079 million. This represents an increase in exports of 7 per cent. over the 1989 figure. I hope to see this upward trend continue.

Trade Deficit

32. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to revise his estimate of the trade deficit at the end of the current year.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be publishing new forecasts for the balance of payments at the time of his Budget statement.

Credit

33. Mr. Conway: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what actions the Government have taken to ensure that lenders take reasonable precautions against sending credit offers to minors and consumers who have said they do not want to receive circulars; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh: The Government are consulting interested parties on their proposals to make regulations requiring persons licensed under the Consumer Credit Act to take reasonable precautions against sending credit circulars to minors and to people who have given notice that they do not wish to receive circulars. Details of the proposals are set out in the consultative document "Proposals for New Legislation on Credit Marketing" copies of which are in the Library and in the Vote Office.

Invisible Exports

34. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his estimate of the United Kingdom's invisible exports for the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: The latest information is available from the balance of payments Pink Book 1990 and the quarterly balance of payments press notice, available in the Library of the House, or on the Central Statistical Office's database, which may also be accessed through the Library.

Between the first three quarters of 1985 and 1990 invisible credits rose by 40 per cent. In 1988, the latest year for which figures are available, the United Kingdom had the second largest share—14·3 per cent.—of world invisible credits, ranking after the United States of America.

Science Parks

35. Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the number of science parks attached to universities and polytechnics today and in 1979.

Mr. Leigh: There were two science parks attached to universities in 1979. Today there are 39 linked with universities or polytechnics. In addition, a further 20 are either in construction or under consideration.

Kuwait

36. Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps his Department is taking to ensure that British companies share in the restructuring of Kuwait.

Mr. Sainsbury: The Department of Trade and Industry co-operated with industry in preparing a prospectus of United Kingdom capabilities which was presented by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary on his recent visit to the Kuwait Government in Saudi Arabia, accompanied by a team of senior business men led by Department of Trade and Industry officials. My Department will continue to encourage and reinforce the efforts of United Kingdom industry.

Securities and Investments Board Rules

37. Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received about the new draft rules published by the Securities and Investments Board.

Mr. Redwood: While the core rules are a matter for the Securities and Investments Board, I have received a number of comments generally supporting a clear and straightforward set of rules for the regulation of investment business.

Car Industry

38. Mr. Madel: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the inward investment in the United Kingdom car industry.

Mr. Lilley: The Government welcome inward investment in the car industry, as in other industries.

Greece, Portugal and Spain

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on United Kingdom trade with Greece, Portugal and Spain.

Mr. Sainsbury: The latest information on United Kingdom trade with Greece, Portugal and Spain is published in Business Monitor MM20 "Overseas Trade Statistics" which is available in the Library of the House. United Kingdom exports to these countries increased by 19·5, 12·5 and 19·5 per cent. respectively from 1989 to 1990.

Furniture (Fire-resistant Materials)

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on EC proposals to reduce the current standards of fire-resistant materials used in furniture.

Mr. Leigh: The Commission has consulted member states about a proposal for a directive on the fire behaviour of upholstered furniture. We understand that the Commission will shortly publish a draft directive which will go forward as a formal proposal to the council. It remains our negotiating aim to secure a directive that will provide a level of fire safety consistent with that provided for domestic upholstered furniture in the United Kingdom by the Furniture and Furnishing (Fire) (Safety) Regulations 1988, as amended in 1989.

Trust Ports

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list those trust ports which have received European regional development fund grant in each of the last five years specifying the amount already given and details of future commitments already agreed.

Mr. McLoughlin: I have been asked to reply.

The information is as follows:

Export Control

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list those international agreements to which the United Kingdom is a party, covering export controls on sensitive equipment and materials; and if he will indicate in each case the primary purpose of the agreement and when the United Kingdom joined.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 12 February 1990]: I have been asked to reply.

The United Kingdom is a depositary power to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty which was opened for signature in 1968. The treaty aims to prevent proliferation of nuclear weapons, and ultimately to secure complete and general, as well as nuclear disarmament. In addition, the treaty provides a framework for peaceful nuclear co-operation. We are also members of the International Atomic Energy Authority, the Zangger committee and the Nuclear Suppliers Group, all of which play an important part in the non-proliferation regime. The United Kingdom is also a founder member of the missile technology control regime, established in 1987 to control the proliferation of ballistic missiles.

The United Kingdom is a party to the Geneva protocol (1925) which bans the use of chemical and bacteriological weapons and to the convention on the prohibition of the development, production and stockpiling of bacteriological and toxic weapons and on their destruction (1972). We are committed to securing a global, comprehensive and verifiable convention banning chemical weapons. Until that is achieved, we are working with other like-minded countries in the Australia Group to prevent proliferation of chemical and biological weapons, and their precursors.

The United Kingdom is a member of the co-ordinating committee for multilateral export controls (COCOM) which was established in 1949. It provides an informal framework within which controls can be agreed for strategic reasons on the export of sensitive goods to the proscribed destinations, principally the Soviet Union, eastern Europe and China.

These obligations and commitments are given effect through the maintenance of stringent export controls on sensitive equipment, materials and technology under the Export of Goods (Control) Order.

ENERGY

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list all future (a) conferences, (b) seminars and (c) meetings which Ministers in his Department have been invited to attend (i) in the United Kingdom, (ii) in the European Community and (iii) elsewhere; and if he will list the dates of these events for the next three months.

Mr. Wakeham: For obvious reasons, it is not normal practice to publicise information on Ministers' engagements this far in advance.

Coal Imports

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what assessment he has made of the strategic importance of avoiding reliance on imported coal in the generating of electricity.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Decisions on fuel procurement are a commercial matter for the electricity generating companies, subject only to compliance with the fuel stocking directions given under section 34 of the Electricity Act 1989. Both National Power and PowerGen have stated that they will seek to diversify their fuel sources.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what powers he has to prevent the privatised electricity generating companies from becoming dependent on imported coal.

Mr. Heathcoat Amory: It is not the Government's policy to place any restrictions on coal imports. The Government have no powers to do so other than in emergencies.

Fluidised Bed Combustion

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects development of fluidised bed combustion technology to be economically desirable and commercially viable.

Mr. Moynihan: Fluidised bed combustion is already an established technology available in the marketplace. More than 100 combustor units have been installed in the United Kingdom alone.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Polwhele Laboratory

Mr. Robert Hicks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to change the status of the Polwhele veterinary investigation centre laboratory; and if he will make a statement about its future.

Mr. Curry: We expect to be able to make an announcement shortly on the outcome of the review of the veterinary investigation service, including the Polwhele —Truro—centre.

Milk

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many prosecutions there have been in 1990 and 1991 for violations of the Milk (Special Designation) Regulations 1989.

Mr. Curry: In England and Wales these regulations are enforced by this Department in respect of untreated milk producers and by local authorities in respect of processing dairies and distributors of untreated milk. The Department has not mounted any prosecutions under these regulations in 1990 and 1991. However, 147 producers of untreated milk have had their licences suspended for inability to comply with the regulations in the period 1 April to 31 December 1990. Information on prosecutions and other enforcement action taken by local authorities is not held centrally.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will introduce legislation to ensure that bottles of untreated milk contain health warnings on the side of the bottle, rather than on the bottle cap.

Mr. Curry: The Milk (Special Designation) Regulations 1989 already require that where untreated milk is sold in a bottle, the words

"This milk has not been heat treated and may therefore contain organisms harmful to health" must appear elsewhere than on the cap.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to introduce legislation to ban the sale of untreated milk.

Mr. Curry: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) on 30 January, Official Report, column 546.

Set-aside Scheme

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for what reasons the set-aside scheme was introduced; when it came into effect; and what is the total sum expended by each European Community nation and by the European Community institutions on the scheme in the most recent annual period for which figures are available.

Mr. Curry: The EC set-aside scheme was introduced as part of the EC stabilisers package. It was intended to provide farmers with an alternative source of income, while they adjusted to the effects of price constraint, and to reduce production of surplus arable crops. The scheme was agreed by the Council of Ministers in April 1988 and member states were required to introduce schemes by mid-July 1988. No member state fulfilled this obligation, although the United Kingdom, Netherlands and the Federal Republic of Germany introduced national schemes by mid-August 1988.

Information on expenditure in individual member states is not available but the Commission has estimated that the amount reimbursed by the European Agricultural Guidance and Guarantee Fund in 1990 in respect of the scheme was 42·3 mecu—£29·5 million.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many hectares of land have been approved for subsidy in each member state since the introduction of the set-aside scheme.

Mr. Curry: The latest information available indicates that the following areas have been entered into set-aside in the first two years of the scheme.

	Hectares
United Kingdom	100,809
Germany	222,384
Netherlands	8,737
Belgium	490

Italy	251,617
Luxembourg	37
Denmark	0
Total	688,804

Note:—Portugal is not required to implement the scheme until 1995.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many hectares of land were devoted to cereal production in each member state, respectively, before the introduction of the set-aside scheme; and how many hectares were devoted to this production purpose at the most recent date for which figures are available.

Mr. Curry: The information is as follows:

Million hectares

	1988 cereals harvest area	1990 cereals harvest area[1]
Belgium	0·35	0·35
Denmark	1·60	1·56
Germany	4·73	4·49

3. Portugal is not required to implement the scheme until 1995.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the production of the various forms of cereals which are covered by the set-aside scheme in each member state in the annual period before the introduction of set-aside; and what are the comparable annual figures in respect of the most recent period for which figures are available.

Mr. Curry: The information requested is as follows:

Belgium	2·21	2·05
Denmark	8·07	9·82

Sellafield

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the present level of radioactive emissions from Sellafield into the Irish sea; and what the comparable figures were five years and 10 years ago.

Mr. Curry: Under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is jointly responsible with the chief inspector of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution for the authorisation of radioactive discharges from sites such as Sellafield.

The Ministry conducts a regular and extensive programme of monitoring for radioactivity in the marine environment around the United Kingdom coastline, including the Irish sea and the results are published annually in reports entitled "Radioactivity in Surface and Coastal Waters of the British Isles", copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

These reports show that the levels of radioactivity in liquid discharges from the Sellafield site to the Irish sea have been reduced very substantially in recent years, as indicated in the table.

Sellafield sea pipeline:
Beta radioactivity (TBq)	4,058	1,190	101·4
Alpha radioactivity (TBq)	62	14	2·7
Seaburn Sewer:
Total radioactivity (TBq)	0·011	0·0038	0·0012

As a result, even those people living near the site who consume large amounts of local fish and shellfish will in 1989 have received a radiation dose of only 0·19 mSv, less than one fifth of the internationally recommended limit of 1 mSv.

Captive Birds

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further information he has on the levels of mortality in imported captive birds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: The second report by the Ministry on mortalities in imported captive birds, relating to imports in 1989, shows that of 184,600 birds, 4,000 were dead on arrival and a further 19,500 died in post-import quarantine. The average mortality has fallen slightly to 12·7 per cent. compared with 13·7 per cent. in the previous year, but the figures are still a grave cause for concern. I am placing copies of the report in the Library of the House.

For wild-caught birds these statistics do not reveal the full extent of losses. We do not know how many birds are dying from stress just after capture and in transport within the country of origin, but it must be assumed that numbers will be high. I do not find such levels of mortality acceptable and the Department is doing all that it can to reduce losses.

In the past year our veterinary officials have visited certain major exporting countries and more visits are planned. During these visits we impress on the relevant authorities the need to fulfil our import requirements and to follow International Air Transport Association—IATA—standards during flights to the United Kingdom. We are considering revised requirements for pre-export isolation and certification where appropriate. We will cease to authorise imports of birds from any country which fails to co-operate in implementing our requirements.

I have written to airlines to emphasise the importance of complying with the IATA rules and of reviewing airline procedures where necessary. Since then some have decided not to transport birds on certain routes.

I have instituted a review of standards in quarantine premises for birds with particular reference to stocking densities. As a result, the number of birds permitted in each quarantine premises, based on their physiological and behavioural needs, will be specified. These measures, which will be introduced as quickly as possible, are expected to result in a reduction in consignment sizes in many cases especially for non-psittacine species. Irrespective of this the maximum number of non-psittacines in any consignment permitted in any licence issued from 1 April will be reduced from 6,000 to 4,000.

Applicants for licences to import birds are also now required to provide more detailed information. Further changes are also being considered to tighten the application of our disease prevention rules.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is considering what further action can be taken within his responsibilities. We have also drawn our concerns to the attention of the European Commission who have agreed that controls are needed on trade in species which are particularly vulnerable during captivity and transport. This issue, and the development of common welfare standards for transport, will be taken forward in Community discussions.

Government action can, however, only achieve so much. Many of the problems with this trade would be reduced if the public no longer purchased captive birds. There are a number of species of birds which simply should not be taken from the wild and subjected to captivity. No one should even consider buying or keeping birds unless proper care and facilities are available. Captive bred stock should be used whenever possible in order to minimise the taking of wild specimens.

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all future (a) conferences, (b) seminars and (c) meetings which Ministers in his Department have been invited to attend (i) in the United Kingdom, (ii) in the European Community and (iii) elsewhere; and if he will list the dates of these events for the next three months.

Mr. Gummer: For obvious reasons, it is not normal practice to collate and publicise information on Ministers' engagements this far in advance.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Severely Disabled People

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the number of severely disabled people in employment, or self-employment, who require nursing or personal care to enable them to continue to work, the average number of hours required per week and the average cost of such care.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is not available.

Housing Benefit, Lambeth

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people in Lambeth are receiving housing benefit based on claims for reimbursement made by Lambeth council.

Miss Widdecombe: At 30 November 1990, the housing benefit caseload in the London borough of Lambeth was 29,380.

Vibration White Finger

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claimants in Newcastle upon Tyne have received payment for vibration white finger since December 1989.

Mr. Scott: The information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Telephone Facilities

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will now make available the British Telecom star service facilities to Members of Parliament and their secretaries' telephones in the House of Commons throughout the entire British Telecom network.

Mr. MacGregor: British Telecom's star service is available for all single-line customers whose telephone has a multi-frequency signalling capacity with a time break recall and is served by a digital exchange. The lines provided for Members from the Palace of Westminster telecommunications exchange are not compatible with that system, nor is the exchange itself designed to provide such access.

Oral Questions

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Lord President of the Council if there has been a statistical sampling test by operating computer software or otherwise to ensure that oral questions submitted by hon. Members are being selected on a proven random basis.

Mr. MacGregor: The "shuffle" to determine the order in which tabled oral questions appear on the Order Paper is conducted under arrangements approved by Mr. Speaker. I refer my hon. Friend to Mr. Speaker's statement of 15 November 1989, Official Report, column 356, on the occasion that the computerised shuffle was introduced. I understand that appropriate tests were run on the computer software before the system was introduced. Further information may be obtained from the Table Office.

ENVIRONMENT

Crown Supplies

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total salary cost, including pay bonuses and compensation paid on termination of contract of the Crown Suppliers main board members in the period January 1990 to January 1991.

Mr. Yeo: A total of £291,344·50 in the calendar year 1990, excluding two payments under the principle civil service pension scheme for compulsory early retirement and one payment in 1991 in respect of a board member whose service ceased in 1990. In addition, £44,349·11 was paid in 1990 to the non-civil servants who acted as TCS chairman and special projects director.

Departmental Achievements

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the principal achievements of his Department since June 1987.

Mr. Heseltine: The Government have played a leading role in developing environmental protection measures both nationally and internationally. The privatisation of the water industry in 1989 strengthened pollution controls and resulted in increased investment: some £28 billion will be spent in the next decade. The Environmental Protection Act 1990 provided for a new system of integrated pollution control and waste disposal management. In September 1990 the White Paper "This Common Inheritance" set out the Government's environmental strategy for the next decade.

The Government have promoted several initiatives for the conservation of nature and the countryside. They have improved the efficiency of the land use planning system as an instrument for guiding development in ways that both facilitate economic growth and protect the environment. They have made good progress with the regeneration of our inner cities, including the creation of 10 new urban development corporations since 1987 and doubling the number of inner city task forces to 16.

The Government have continued to promote the growth of owner-occupation; have increased the choices available to tenants, in particular by deregulating rents of new private lettings; and have obtained better value for money from public expenditure by ensuring that investment and subsidies are increasingly focused where they are most needed.

In local government, the Government have reformed the system of local government finance and taxation. They have also promoted the efficiency of local authorities by requiring competition in the provision of certain services. A new review is now looking afresh at the structure and finances of local authorities.

Housing

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will break down all housing development started since the urban development corporations began their operations, by tenure.

Mr. Portillo: There were an estimated 16,100 housing completions in urban development corporation areas to March 1990. Of the 15,247 completions for which information is available, 12,226—80 per cent.—were for private ownership, 2,191—14 per cent.—for housing associations and 830—6 per cent.—were private or local authority rental.

Homelessness

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set up a permanent helpline to his Department to give advice to homeless people sleeping on the streets.

Mr. Yeo: My Department provides £2 million this year and £4·5 million next year to voluntary organisations providing advice and practical help to homeless people. A substantial proportion is targeted on rough sleepers. Among the projects receiving grant aid is a 24-hour telephone housing advice service in London.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what advice his Department is giving when contacted by homeless people sleeping rough or their representatives on the availability of emergency shelter;

(2) what information is made available to people sleeping rough about the locations of emergency shelters; and where it is available.

Mr. Yeo: Those seeking advice are referred to the help lines being run by the Piccadilly advice centre and the housing advice switchboard. These organisations have information on the availability of accommodation in emergency shelters and other hostels, as do the Metropolitan police and the voluntary organisations working with single homeless people.

Community Charge

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the number of community chargepayers in each district of Northants who will benefit from the community charge reduction scheme.

Mr. Key: Community charge registers for individual local authorities are not held centrally and I am not, therefore, at present able to make detailed estimates by local authority area. Estimates for England of the numbers likely to benefit from the community charge reduction scheme are based on sample survey data.

The table shows, for each district in Northamptonshire, the level of rateable value below which a community charge reduction may be available for a two adult household; and shows this rateable value as a percentage of the average rateable value of domestic properties in each district. Reductions will depend on the number of chargepayers resident in a property on 31 March 1990, and will be payable to chargepayers who have not changed their sole or main residence since that date.

Level of rateable value below which two adult households benefit from community charge reduction scheme

Corby	240	130·7
Daventry	221	97·4
East Northamptonshire	211	117·5
Kettering	219	122·5
Northampton	221	108·7
South Northamptonshire	227	99·4
Wellingborough	193	105·0

Mr. Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much assistance a couple living in a property of half average rateable value in Bury will receive under the community charge reduction scheme in 1992.

Mr. Portillo: In 1991-92 a couple living in a property with half the average rateable value in Bury will be entitled to a reduction under the community charge reduction scheme of £373. If the 1991-92 community charge set by Bury is less than £380, the reduction will be smaller. Community charge benefit will further reduce the community charge for couples with low incomes.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much assistance a couple living in a property of half average rateable value in (a) Lancaster and (b) Wyre borough will receive under the community charge reduction scheme next year.

Mr. Portillo: In 1991-92 a couple living in a property with half the average rateable value in the area will be entitled to a reduction under the community charge reduction scheme of (a) £497 in Lancaster, and (b) £420 in Wyre, provided they have not moved since 31 March 1990, and assuming that the community charges set are not less than £402 in Lancaster and £376 in Wyre. Community charge benefit will reduce further the community charge for couples with low incomes.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what criteria are taken into consideration and what procedures are followed in the designation of new sites of special scientific interest;

(2) what criteria are taken into consideration and what procedures are followed in determining whether designated sites of special scientific interest remain sites of special scientific interest; and how often the special scientific interest of a designated site is re-assessed.

Mr. Trippier: The procedures for designating sites of special scientific interest are set out in section 28 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, as amended by the Wildlife and Countryside (Amendment) Act 1985.

The Nature Conservancy Council's "Guidelines for Selection of Biological SSSIs" together with the first volume of guidelines in respect of geological and physiographical SSSIs, give details of the scientific criteria for selection. Copies of these documents have been placed in the Library of the House.

The successor bodies to the Nature Conservancy Council will develop a programme for the regular monitoring of SSSIs. The reassessment of the special scientific interest of will reflect the results of this programme.

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all future environmental (a) conferences, (b) seminars and (c) meetings which Ministers in his Department have been invited to attend (i) in the United Kingdom, (ii) in the European Community and (iii) elsewhere; and if he will list the dates of these events for the next three months.

Mr. Trippier: For obvious reasons, it is not normal practice to collate and publicise information on Ministers' engagements this far in advance.

Colliery Spoil

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to encourage the use of colliery spoil for infilling and other civil engineering projects and to consult those officials of British Coal who are qualified to provide assessment of such matters.

Mr. Yeo: My Department already encourages alternative uses of colliery spoil where practicable, environmentally acceptable and economically viable. Circular 20/87, issued in conjuction with the Department of Transport and the Welsh Office, advises highway authorities to inform the local planning authorities and waste producer of road schemes at an early stage, so that information on waste materials as potential sources of fill can be incorporated into the instructions for tenderers. The Government also set aside £2·5 million to fund a number of colliery-spoil disposal demonstration schemes so that the practical, environmental and economic aspects of utilising colliery spoil for engineered fill and civil engineering projects could be investigated. More generally, I am concerned that potentially valuable waste materials, including colliery spoil, are under-utilised and my Department has commissioned research to appraise their occurrence and use. This study is looking at the physical and economic constraints to their greater utilisation and will identify ways in which these could be overcome. The research is being carried out in full consultation with officials at British Coal.

Housing Investment Programme, Rutland

Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will give details of the calculations which led him to announce a basic credit approval of £372,000 in 1991-92 for the housing investment programme of Rutland district council; and what was the bid submitted by the council.

Mr. Yeo: Rutland's guidelines for all services totalled £717,000. From this figure was deducted £238,000 for receipts taken into account. The resulting basic credit approval of £479,000 may be allocated as the council wishes.

Contaminated Clinoptilolite

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what methods exist for the disposal of radioactively contaminated clinoptilolite.

Mr. Trippier: Clinoptilolite is used to remove radioactivity from liquids in the Sellafield ion exchange plant. Radioactively contaminated clinoptilolite, like other intermediate-level waste, is currently stored on site. It is proposed that it be treated in the new encapsulation plant and stored prior to final disposal in the Nirex deep facility.

PRIME MINISTER

Antarctic Minerals

Mr. Cash: To ask the Prime Minister which Departments are involved in the review of policy towards Antarctic minerals, in addition to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

The Prime Minister: The Departments of the Environment, of Trade and Industry and of Energy.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what instructions have been given to the British representative at the current session of the United Nations Human Rights Commission in Geneva to stress the need for the commission to take active note of gross violations of human rights by the Government of Ethiopia; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The head of the British delegation to the United Nations Human Rights Commission is fully aware of the concern about human rights violations in Ethiopia and will be guided accordingly.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Animal Experiments

Mr. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many infringements of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 have come to light in each year since the implementation of the Act; what were the offences charged; how many defendants were convicted and for how many offences; what was the range of punishments imposed; and how many experimenters had their licences revoked.

Mrs. Rumbold: In 1987, the first year of the operation of the Act, nine cases of infringements were decided. None of the cases was sufficiently serious to merit referral to the Director of Public Prosecutions. In one case a licence was revoked.

In 1988, 20 cases of infringements were decided, of which two were referred to the Director of Public Prosecutions. In both cases the Director of Public Prosecutions decided not to institute criminal proceedings. In two cases the relevant licences were revoked.

In 1989, 14 cases of infringements were decided. No cases were referred to the Director of Public Prosecutions. In one case a licence was revoked.

In 1990, 14 cases of infringements were decided. No cases were referred to the Director of Public Prosecutions. In three cases, a total of seven project and personal licences were revoked.

Infringements may include breaches of conditions of licences as well as possible offences under the Act. Where licences are not revoked, an infringement may lead, where appropriate, to the imposition of additional strict conditions on the project or personal licences or on the certificate of designation for the establishment.

Mr. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many visits by inspectors to animal experimentation laboratories were carried out in each of the past five years.

Mrs. Rumbold: Details for 1978 to 1988 are given in "Statistics of Scientific Procedures on Living Animals, Great Britain, 1988"—Cm 743—and details for 1989 in the 1989 volume—Cm 1152. The figures for 1989 reflect a change in the system for recording visits made by inspectors in the light of the change in their duties under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986.

Mr. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of laboratories licensed for animal experimentation under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 in each year since the entry into force of the Act.

Mrs. Rumbold: At 31 December 1987 there were 372 such establishments. On the same date in 1988 and 1989 there were 375.

Police Force, Wales

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the capital budget of each police force in Wales for 1991-92; and what were the comparable figures for each year from 1979 onwards.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Capital budgets for police forces are the responsibility of police authorities, but annual returns of capital spending, which police authorities have made to the Welsh Office, show that capital expenditure by police forces in Wales since 1983-84 was as follows:

£ million

	Dyfed Powys	Gwent	North Wales	South Wales	Total
1983-84	0·093	0·887	0·822	2·793	4·595
1984-85	0·324	1·147	0·876	2·538	4·885
1985-86	2·396	0·835	1·232	2·527	6·990
1986-87	2·611	0·687	1·011	1·228	5·537
1987-88	1·355	0·589	1·056	2·894	5·894
1988-89	0·705	0·838	1·510	2·943	5·996
1989-90	0·675	2·360	2·852	4·379	10·226

Under new arrangements for financing police capital expenditure, which came into operation on 1 April 1990, Government grant on police capital expenditure is allocated to individual police authorities in advance and is cash limited. The grant allocated to police authorities in Wales will support the following expenditure:

£ million

	Dyfed Powys	Gwent	North Wales	South Wales	Total
1990-91	0·653	2·196	0·846	1·512	5·207
1991-92	1·634	4·959	1·462	4·145	12·200

It is open to police authorities to incur capital expenditure above these levels, but such expenditure would not attract Government grant and would have to be met from their own resources.

Naturalisation

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the average time currently being taken to process applications for naturalisation;

(2) how many applications for naturalisation submitted in (a) 1988 and (b) 1989 remain outstanding.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The average time now being taken to complete applications for naturalisation is 32 months. At the end of January, 16,302 applications submitted in 1988 and 19,495 submitted in 1989 remained outstanding.

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of prisoners held on remand in police cells on 1 February.

Mrs. Rumbold: On Friday 1 February there were 604 prisoners in police cells. The precise split between remand and other prisoners is not available centrally but most would have been remand prisoners.

Public Information Films

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list all the public information films and the subject matter of each that was shown on each channel of (a) the BBC and (b) commercial television, during 1989, 1990 and the first two months of 1991.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: This material is not readily available in the form requested. I will write to the hon. Member with the information we can provide.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Gulf Oil Slicks

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action has been taken by Her Majesty's Government in pursuit of the United Nations General Assembly second committee resolution 44/224, dated 24 November 1989, as a result of the occurrence of oil slicks in the Gulf.

Mr. Heseltine: I have been asked to reply.

In response to this resolution, the executive director of the United Nations Environment Programme—UNEP—commissioned a feasibility study into proposals for improved international co-operation in the monitoring, assessment and anticipation of environmental threats and assistance in the case of environmental emergencies. The United Kingdom Government look forward to discussing the study's proposals at UNEP's governing council in June this year before they are submitted to the United Nations General Assembly.

Meanwhile, the United Kingdom has also provided expert advice and other assistance to the Governments of the Gulf states as set out in my letter to hon. Members of 6 February. The International Maritime Organisation, a specialised agency of the United Nations based in London, is co-ordinating offers of pollution control equipment and expertise to assist with the oil spill. The United Kingdom is co-operating fully and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Transport has contributed secretariat support and other services to the IMO for this purpose.

Soviet Union

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made in respect of Leonid Zolotarevsky of Tallin and Leah Yusyfiva of Dzhezkazgan who have been unsuccessfully applying to leave the Soviet Union.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We can certainly raise these cases with the Soviet authorities, but in order to make our representations most effective we shall need further details.

Immigration

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the current queues of applicants for entry clearance in each category for the latest available month and the numbers in each queue at the posts at (a) Bombay, (b) Karachi, (c) New Delhi, (d) Dhaka, (e) Nairobi, (f) Calcutta, (g) Islamabad and (h) Dar es Salaam.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: As at 31 December 1990, the estimated waiting times, in months, for persons applying for entry clearance were:

Settlement	Q1	Q2	Q3	Q4
Bombay	0	5	9	10
Karachi	1	3	3	6
New Delhi	1	3	6	10
Dhaka	3	4	4	9
Nairobi[1]	—	—	—	—
Calcutta[2]	—	—	—	—
Islamabad	3	5	8	15
Dar es Salaam[3]	—	—	—	—

[1] One day for all settlement applicants.
[2] No settlement queues.
[3] Less than one week's delay for all settlement applicants.

The number of applicants waiting in the queues for first interview, as at 31 December 1990, were:

Settlement	Q1	Q2	Q3	Q4
Bombay	0	130	372	119
Karachi	13	86	25	1
New Delhi	5	261	281	120
Dhaka	425	816	132	619
Nairobi[1]	—	—	—	—
Calcutta[1]	—	—	—	—
Islamabad	96	2,312	468	393
Dar es Salaam[1]	—	—	—	—

[1] No settlement queues.

Settlement queues are organised as follows:

Q1—Persons with a claim to the right of abode, dependent relatives over 70 years old, special compassionate cases.
Q2—Spouses, and children under 18 yeas old.
Q3—Fiance(e)s and others applying for the first time for settlement.
Q4—Re-applicants.

Applicants for visit visas in Islamabad requiring a full interview can expect to wait five days. Elsewhere they are dealt with on the day of application.

Tamils

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has concerning the numbers of Tamils who have been killed or wounded during the civil war in Sri Lanka.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Reliable information on the number of casualties is not available either for Tamils or for other ethnic groups.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Sri Lanka about human rights violations and attacks against civilian populations in Tamil areas of that country by Government armed forces.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We regularly raise with the Sri Lankan Government our concerns about their human rights performance and the conduct of its security forces in dealing with the terrorist challenge they face. I did so when I met the Sri Lankan high commissioner on 19 December. The British high commissioner is also in touch with the Sri Lankan Government's special task force, established to investigate reported human rights violations.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the civil war in Sri Lanka.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We deeply regret the continuing violence in Sri Lanka, which stems from a decision by the "Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam" to abandon long-running negotiations with the Sri Lankan Government in June 1990 and resume terrorism. We support the Sri Lankan Government in their efforts to overcome the terrorist challenge they face, but, at the same time, have made clear our concerns that human rights should be fully respected.

Bulgaria

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the allocation of money from the know-how fund for Bulgaria.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced on 18 February the extension of the know-how fund for eastern Europe to Bulgaria. This is in recognition of Bulgaria's commitment to political and economic reform and requirement for "intellectual know-how". There is no formal commitment to spending on individual countries under the know-how fund in any one year. Actual disbursement will depend on the identification of sensible projects in priority areas. An early visit to Bulgaria is planned to discuss our overall strategy with the Bulgarian authorities.

Antarctica

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made since the end of the Vina del Mar conference on 6 December 1990, towards the preparation of a draft environmental protocol to protect Antarctica.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The Antarctic treaty parties have had no formal consultations since the meeting in Vina del Mar in December and so no further progress towards the preparation of a draft environmental protocol to protect Antarctica has been made. Discussion on the protocol will continue at the reconvened XIth special consultative meeting in Madrid in April.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs following the recent consultative meeting in Chile, what options he is considering for Her Majesty's Government's policy in respect of mining in Antarctica; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: It was clear at the meeting in Chile that neither the Antarctic minerals convention alone nor a simple ban on mineral activity provide for a solution of the minerals issue. We are considering how best, in these circumstances, to achieve a return to consensus.

Lithuania

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he intends to raise the result of the independence referendum held in Lithuania with the Security Council of the United Nations or with the Council for Security and Co-operation in Europe; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No. We do not believe discussion in the United Nations Security Council would provide an answer to the problem. We raised the Baltic issue at meetings of the CSCE in Vienna and Valletta in January. With our partners in the European Community, we have invoked the CSCE human dimension mechanism. The mechanism enables CSCE states to raise human rights questions directly with the state concerned.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has been in contact with European Community Foreign Ministers to discuss the outcome of the independence referendum in Lithuania; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs met his EC colleagues in Luxembourg on 19 February for a European political co-operation ministerial meeting. The situation in the Soviet Union and the Baltic republics was among the subjects discussed. We have noted the outcome of the Lithuanian referendum with interest, and hope that genuine negotiations will now take place about the way forward.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government will grant recognition to the republic of Lithuania following the outcome of the independence referendum held in Lithuania on 9 February; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No. Lithuania does not fulfil the well-established criteria that we have applied to the recognition of a state. These are that it should have, and seem likely to continue to have, a clearly defined territory with a population, a Government who are able of themselves to exercise control of that territory, and independence in its external relations. However, we recognise and support the wish of the Lithuanian people to determine their own future. We believe that the way forward is through peaceful negotiations between the Soviet authorities and the elected Lithuanian authorities.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to or received from President Landsbergis of Lithuania, President Gorbachev of the USSR, the embassy of the USSR in London and the Lithuanian Association in London, following the result of the independence referendum in Lithuania.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have received no representations on this specific question. We are in frequent contact with the Soviet authorities, and with the authorities of the Baltic republics, over developments there.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next intends to meet his European Community counterparts; and if he will raise the question of how the European Community should respond to the outcome of the independence referendum held in Lithuania.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs met his EC colleagues in Luxembourg on 19 February for a European political co-operation ministerial meeting. The situation in the Soviet Union and the Baltic republics was among the subjects discussed. We have noted the outcome of the Lithuanian referendum with interest, and hope that genuine negotiations will now take place about the way forward.

Baltic States

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations or offers of assistance his Department has made to the Inter-Parliamentary Union to facilitate the sending of an all-party parliamentary delegation to the Baltic states.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have made clear to the IPU that the FCO would be happy to facilitate the proposed visit of an all-party parliamentary delegation to the Baltic states. Her Majesty's embassy in Moscow has been in contact with the Supreme Soviet to urge it to give an early response to the IPU's initiative.

Soviet Union

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the claim by the Soviet Prime Minister Valentin Pavlov that western banks were in a plan to destabilise the Soviet currency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have no information to substantiate Mr. Pavlov's claim. Both our interests and those of the Soviet Union would be best served by the emergence of a free market there. An unstable currency would hinder, not help that process.

Belgium (Arms Dealers)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to discuss with his Belgian counterpart ways of developing international restrictions on conventional arms and ballistic missile system sales by arms dealers operating out of Brussels.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We discuss the export of arms with Belgium and with our other partners in the Twelve. We expect to work more closely together in this field in the future. Both Britain and Belgium are also members of the missile technology control regime which aims to combat the proliferation of ballistic missile equipment and technology.

Nuclear Facilities

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Dr. Thomas) of 12 February, Official Report, column 387, whether the United Kingdom made any substantive input into the discussions at the non-proliferation treaty review conference concerning the threat of military attacks on nuclear facilities.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The United Kingdom made substantive input into all discussions at the NPT review conference.

Kuwait (Reconstruction)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the names and companies of those business representatives who accompanied him when he visited the Kuwaiti Government in exile; on what basis these representatives were selected; if any part of their travel or other expenses was met from public funds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 19 February 1991]: The business representatives who accompanied my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State were selected on the basis of their position in the sectors of British industry which are most likely to play a part in the reconstruction of Kuwait. They were:

Mr. Peter Berry — Managing Director, Crown Agents.
Mr. Alan Cockshaw — Chairman, AMEC PLC.
Mr. David Douglas Home — Chairman of the Committee on Middle East Trade and Director of Morgan Grenfell.
Mr. Allan Gormly — Chairman of the Overseas Projects Board: MD of John Brown Engineering and Director of Trafalgar House PLC.
Mr. Jim Langford — Chairman, Engineering and Construction Division, Costain Group PLC.
Mr. Bill Pirie — Chairman, Middle East and North Africa Committee, British Consultants Bureau and Associate, Sir Alexander Gibb and Partners Ltd.
Rt. Hon. Lord Prior — Chairman GEC PLC.
Mr. Adrian White — Chairman, Biwater.

No part of their travel or other expenses was met from public funds other than the cost of transport by coach between Jeddah and Ta'if.

TRANSPORT

Light Aircraft (Insurance)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to require light aircraft owners to take out insurance which would safeguard the general public.

Mr. McLoughlin: My right hon. and learned Friend has received, in response to requests to the chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority, advice on the issues relating to the introduction of a compulsory insurance scheme for all aircraft registered in the United Kingdom. My right hon. and learned Friend is considering that advice.

Badgers

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when considering the proposed route for the M3 extension what consideration was given to the impact of the route through meadowland on the habitat for badgers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: During the many discussions between my Department and ecological and conservation interests, there have been no suggestions or evidence of badger activity in the vicinity of the proposed route for the final section of the M3 motorway at Winchester. A habitat survey will be carried out this spring and if evidence of badger activity is found appropriate measures including the need for crossings will be considered.

Drink Driving

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research evidence he has received on the comparative reductions in numbers of drink drivers in Great Britain and New South Wales since either the year before or the year after the introduction of random tests in New South Wales.

Mr. Chope: Random breath testing was introduced in New South Wales in December 1982. One measure of the subsequent reduction in the numbers of drink drivers is the fall in the proportion of drivers killed whose blood alcohol level was known who were over the limit. This has fallen from 36 per cent. in 1983 to 33 per cent. in 1989. The comparative figures for Great Britain show a fall from 28 to 19 per cent., a fall of nine percentage points.

Passenger Safety

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about the effects on passenger safety of overloading British Rail trains.

Mr. Freeman: The Department of Transport received around 4,000 letters about British Rail in the last year, some of which raised questions about various aspects of overcrowding. Precise figures could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Train Services

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the effects of British Rail's proposed reduction of train services on the Stoke on Trent to Derby service on the local transport infrastructure in the light of his Department's west midlands regional brief, published in January; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: The level of service on individual lines is a matter for British Rail, subject to the quality of service standards set by the Government.

East Coast Main Line

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the footpath and bridleway crossings of the east coast main line for which he has made orders under section 124 of the Transport Act 1968; and if he will place copies of those orders in the Library.

Mr. Freeman: Her Majesty's railway inspectorate has no record of any order being issued under section 124 of the Transport Act 1968 in respect of footpath and bridleway crossings on the east coast main line.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what is his policy on the divestment of public land in a depressed market;

(2) how many acres of land surplus to operation requirements are owned by British Rail.

Mr. McLoughlin: The policies that the Government look for in the handling of British Rail land require that the board should make a commercial plan for indentifying and divesting itself of all its underused or surplus property for early outright disposal subject to the need to avoid distress sales. Some 21,500 acres of surplus land are held by British Rail and are available for disposal.

Rail Safety

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he intends to ask the railway inspectorate to prescribe maximum safe carrying capacities for British Rail trains.

Mr. Freeman: No. Her Majesty's railway inspectorate's advice is that British Rail's rolling stock is designed to be safe, whatever the numbers travelling on board. Sir Anthony Hidden's report on the Clapham rail accident concluded that if the trains in that accident had been overcrowded, passengers having to stand would not have been at any greater risk than those sitting down. The inquiry into the Cannon Street accident will be considering whether overcrowding on that train had any effect on the risk of injury to which individual passengers were exposed. As a matter of comfort rather than safety, British Rail's current objectives include train loading standards.

Hazardous Substances

Sir Bernard Braine: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about the possible replacement of the Hazchem safety code with the European Community's Kemler code; and what consultation there has been on this subject with the Health and Safety Commission and local authorities.

Mr. Chope: We have received a number of representations from hon. Members and local authorities, all prompted by the Chief and Assistant Chief Fire Officers' Association—CACFOA. On 16 October 1989, my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) received a deputation of north-eastern Members with the president of CACFOA who spoke in favour of the Hazchem code. The Health and Safety Executive has initiated a review of the Dangerous Substances (Conveyance by Road in Road Tankers and Tank Containers) Regulations 1981 which contain the requirements for placards. They have been discussing with all interested parties, including local authority organisations, what should be done, taking account of the fact that the Kemler code is used throughout Europe whereas the Hazchem code is only used in the United Kingdom.

HGV Licences

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he plans to require all drivers of heavy goods vehicle-type vehicles used in road construction to hold heavy goods vehicle licences; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: No. Drivers of road construction machines, engineering plant, works trucks and digging machines will continue to be exempt from the requirement to hold heavy goods vehicle and large goods vehicle drivers' licences in the new licensing system.

Road Schemes

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the road schemes in which his Department has extended the distance limit for safeguarding purposes beyond the 67 m limit specified in article 15(1)(b) of the General Development Order 1988.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 18 February 1991]: The distance limit for safeguarding purposes has been extended beyond 67 m in only one case. That is the proposed widening of an approximately 80 mile-long section of the M1 in the east midlands, which forms part of our published intention to widen the motorway between junctions 6A and 33. In this case the safeguarding distance is 67 m from the centre line of each carriageway, slip road, junction and service area or 30 m beyond the existing motorway boundary, whichever is the greater.

SCOTLAND

Skills Improvement

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on what occasions in the past five years financial expenditure has been given or offered by the Industry Department of Scotland to help existing or incoming firms with the upgrading of the skills of their present or proposed work force.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Until 15 December 1988 when the scheme was closed training grants under section 7 of the Industrial Development Act 1982 were available to help companies in the assisted areas meet the training costs of new investment projects. Between 1 April 1985 and 15 December 1988, 10 offers of such grant were accepted by Scottish companies. Further details are available in successive annual reports of the Industrial Development Act.

Homelessness

Mr. Ron Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people are currently homeless in Lothian and Edinburgh respectively; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Figures available centrally relate to the number of households which apply to local authorities and are assessed by them under Part II of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987. Over the 12 months to 31 March 1990, the number assessed as homeless in Edinburgh was 1,957; the corresponding figure for Lothian was 2,636. I announced in December 1990 that an extra £2 million allocation would be made available in 1991-92 for homelessness projects in the four cities. An announcement of the schemes to be assisted will be made very soon.

Mentally Ill People (Homelessness)

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the percentage of mentally ill people who have been homeless for more than (a) four weeks, (b) eight weeks, (c) six months, and (d) one year in (i) Scotland, (ii) Strathclyde and (iii) Glasgow.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not collected centrally.

Sheltered Accommodation (Renfrew)

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how long he estimates it will take to provide a sheltered home for every person in Renfrew district who desires one, if expenditure is maintained at its current level.

Lord James Douglas Hamilton: No such estimates are made centrally. The provisional housing capital allocations for 1991-92 issued to Renfrew district council total £21·561 million. Apart from £0·757 million which is earmarked to fund innovative housing projects in the Ferguslie Park partnership area, the remainder of these resources are available for use at the discretion of the local authority to meet housing needs in the area, including the provision of sheltered housing if that is a local priority.

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people are waiting on a sheltered home within Renfrewshire district.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not held centrally.

Milk

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much organic milk is produced in Scotland; and what proportion is pasteurised.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: No record is held centrally of the volume of milk described as organic, produced in Scotland; any milk sold to the public would require to be heat treated—pasteurised, sterilised, UHT—in accordance with the Milk (Special Designations) (Scotland) Order 1988.

Neil Duncan Case

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that the interests of youths named in the Crown Office indictment against Neil Duncan and others have been adequately safeguarded; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: None. My noble and learned Friend, the Lord Advocate, has the universal and exclusive title to prosecute on indictment in the public interest.

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the role of the Crown Office in the case of the Crown v. Neil Duncan and others.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The role of the Crown Office in this case did not differ from its role in any other proceedings on indictment.

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the cost to the Exchequer of Crown Office time in preparing the indictment against Neil Duncan and others.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The cost has been calculated as about £225.

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he has taken to satisfy hmself that it was necessary for the Crown Office to name youths who were unconnected to the charges with which the Crown eventually proceeded, in the indictment against Neil Duncan and others.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: None. The indictments were drafted in accordance with the rules of criminal procedure in Scotland without challenge.

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the cost to the Exchequer of legal aid in the case of the Crown v. Neil Duncan and others, including the sums paid in respect of defendants whose pleas of not guilty were accepted by the Crown.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information will not be available until the solicitors' accounts are received by the Scottish Legal Aid Board.

Disabled Workers

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the percentage of the Scottish work force in each industrial sector who were registered as disabled for each year since 1980.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Information is not available in the form requested.

Law Reform

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what correspondence he has received from Murgitroyd and Company about section 25 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1990; and what reply he has sent.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State recently received a letter from Mr. Ian Murgitroyd of Murgitroyd and Company to which a reply will be sent shortly.

Official Visits

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he, or any of his ministerial team, next plans to make an official visit to the Paisley, South constituency.

Mr. Lang: There are no plans at present to visit the hon. Member's constituency in Paisley, South.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report all the designated sites of special scientific interest currently in force in Roxburgh and Berwickshire showing the owner of each site.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information is not held centrally. I have asked the Nature Conservancy Council to write to the hon. Member.

Low-energy Light Bulbs

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is taking to encourage the use of low-energy light bulbs in his Department's offices and other buildings.

Mr. Lang: Most Scottish Office buildings have fluorescent lights, and these are cleaned and relamped regularly. Low-energy lamps are fitted wherever possible. A number of incandescent lights have either been replaced with low-energy compact fluorescent units or converted to accept these.

Food Hygiene

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money is spent annually on specific research programmes to investigate food poisoning; what funds are made available to develop accurate techniques to identify the causes of food poisoning; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The estimated cost of research projects on the microbiological safety of food commissioned by the Scottish Office in the current financial year is £187,000. This is part of a much larger programme of research which is sponsored by other Government Departments.

Pollution

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the appeals under section 10 of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 currently under consideration, showing the dates when they were first lodged; and how many such appeals have been determined in the last six months.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Two appeals, lodged on 24 October 1989 and 27 October 1990, under section 10 of the Control of Pollution Act 1974, are currently under consideration in Scotland. The appeal lodged on 24 October 1989 is in abeyance pending the outcome of a planning inquiry.

Three such appeals have been determined in the last six months.

Scenic Areas

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list each national scenic area in Scotland, the square kilometres occupied by each area, the total of all national scenic areas in the Shetland islands, the Orkney islands, the Highland region, the Western isles, Grampian region, Tayside region, Strathclyde region, Central region, Fife region, the Borders region, and Dumfries and Galloway region; what is the total percentage cover of national scenic areas over the whole area of Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is given in the table, with areas shown in hectares. National scenic areas which lie in more than one region are marked with an asterisk. There are no national scenic areas in Fife or Lothian regions.

The total hectarage amounts to 1,017,300, or approximately 12·91 per cent. of Scotland's surface.

"National Scenic Area" is a designation which recognises the character and quality of those landscapes which are considered to merit special protection in a national context.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is now the number of hospital beds available to national health service patients in (a) Glasgow, (b) Strathclyde, and (c) Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The latest information centrally available is for the year ending 30 September 1990. The average number of available staffed beds then is set out in the table.

	Number
Greater Glasgow Health Board	11,824
Strathclyde[1]	23,543
Scotland	51,503

[1] This covers Greater Glasgow, Lanarkshire, Argyll and Clyde and Ayrshire and Arran health boards.

Local Health Councils

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will consider holding elections for local health council members.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 18 February 1991]: No.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will reconsider his decision to abolish independent local health councils and replace them with councils appointed by the health board.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 18 February 1991]: Local health councils will continue as in the past to be independent bodies. The difference is that places will no longer be reserved for certain groups. Instead all members will be chosen for their individual attributes and on the basis of the contribution which they can make. The Government's decision on this matter was broadly welcomed by the Opposition Front Bench and I see no need to reconsider it.

Wetlands

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those estuaries and other wetlands with nature conservation protection designations, currently facing urban/recreational or industrial development proposals.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 19 February 1991]: The information is not held centrally. However, the Nature Conservancy Council has conducted a review of the estuaries of Great Britain. I understand the full report will be published soon although a summary was published on 13 February .

Lithotripsy Service

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, further to his reply of 28 January, Official Report, column 416, about the Scottish lithotripsy service, what is the level of demand that would justify a lithotripsy service in the West of Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 11 February 1991]: It would be for a health board to consider whether current and likely future demand could justify the considerable capital investment involved in providing a second lithotripsy service. However, since the existing service can treat urgent cases within a few days and routine cases within two weeks, it is unlikely that the case for such investment could be made in the foreseeable future.

Health Board Appointees

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what qualifications are possessed by Mr. J. Cahill, Mr. W. M. Ritchie, Mr. I. B. Valentine, Mr. J. W. G. Donaldson, Mrs. A. Dumbar and Dr. K. G. Fegan relevant to their appointment as non-executive members of Ayrshire and Arran health board; whether any record is kept of their political affiliations; what other appointments by the Secretary of State are held by any of them; and what are the conditions of termination of their appointment following a change of Government.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 15 February 1991]: All the non-executive members are considered to have experience and ability enabling them to make a valuable personal and collective contribution to the board's work. A central record is not maintained of health board members' political affiliations. The persons in question do not hold other appointments by the Secretary of State. Non-executive members of health boards are appointed for a fixed term of office of two or four years.

EMPLOYMENT

Training, Merseyside

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what plans he has to improve training opportunities on Merseyside;

(2) if he will take steps to improve training opportunities on Merseyside in the light of the announcement that the Merseyside Council for Voluntary Services will cut by 50 per cent. its training places for adults in the coming year.

Mr. Jackson: The Merseyside TEC is expected to become fully operational in June 1991. It will be for the TEC to address the training needs of Merseyside, making use in its plans of the new range of flexibilities recently introduced for the major training, enterprise, and educational programmes.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current level of employment in Wiltshire; and what were the figures in 1985 and 1980.

Mr. Jackson: Employment estimates for counties are compiled only when censuses of employment are taken. The most recent figures available are for September 1987 when there were 206,400 employees in employment in the county of Wiltshire. This compares with 196,700 in September 1984 and 193,800 in September 1981 when the previous censuses were taken. The figures exclude the self-employed and members of Her Majesty's forces.

Low-energy Light Bulbs

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he is taking to encourage the use of low-energy light bulbs in his Department's offices and other buildings.

Mr. Forth: My Department attaches great importance to promoting energy efficiency and has introduced the following measures to ensure that energy efficient lighting is installed in all of our offices and other buildings.

1. The specification for new buildings and major refurbishments of existing buildings now includes a requirement that only energy-efficient fluorescent tubes and miniature fluorescent lamps may be used, unless, for exceptional reasons this is not practicable.
2. Fluorescent tubes and metal filament bulbs in other buildings are being systematically replaced with energy-efficent alternatives.

My Department closely monitors its energy consumption, and introduces energy-saving measures whenever suitable opportunities occur.

Departmental Objectives

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what changes to departmental aims and objectives have been made in the past year; and what is his estimate of their impact on expenditure plans for 1990-91 and future years.

Mr. Jackson: My Departmen's aims and objectives—as set out in the departmental report—Cm. 1506. February 1991—were revised during 1990 to focus them more closely on labour market outcomes and to take account of changes in the labour market and in the Department's programmes and activities. The changes to the aims and objectives in themselves had no impact on my Department's expenditure plans.

The previous set of aims and objectives were presented in the Department of Employment Chapter of "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1990-91 to 1992-93"—Cm. 1006, January 1990.

Employment Training

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give for unemployed people in Avon undergoing employment training on the schemes which have been unsuccessful in their tender for contracts for the year commencing 1 April 1991, the numbers and proportion of those on ET (a) who will be able to continue the same or similar course at another site from April 1991 and (b) of those who will not be able to continue on ET, the numbers and proportion who will instead (i) be referred to a job club, (ii) be referred to a Restart counsellor, (iii) be referred to job interview guarantee, or (iv) receive a training credit.

Mr. Jackson: Every effort will be made to ensure that those currently on ET who want to continue their training do so. All trainees affected will be reviewed individually so that alternative arrangements of their choice can be identified. Where a person expresses a wish not to continue training they will receive other appropriate help, for example to enhance their job prospects.

"Next Steps" Agencies

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what progress he has made in establishing "next steps" agencies; and if he will make a statement on the arrangements for financial accountability of each agency that has been established.

Mr. Jackson: In April 1990 my right hon. and learned Friend established the Employment Service as a "next steps" agency. The Employment Service employs some 35,000 people and its priority is to give positive help to unemployed people through its job placement services and other programmes, and by the payment of benefits and allowances to those entitled to them. It is the biggest agency to be set up so far under the "next steps" initiative.

The arrangements for the financial accountability of the Employment Service are set out in the financial agreement between the Employment Department and the Employment Service, which is annex 2 to the framework document. The financial agreement sets out the respective financial responsibilities of the Department and the agency and seeks to ensure continued accountability for the use of public funds while at the same time allowing ES the necessary flexibility to manage effectively as a "next steps" agency.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what annual reports are to be issued by departmental "next steps" agencies; when they are scheduled to appear; and how they relate to the departmental annual report.

Mr. Jackson: My Department has a single executive agency: the Employment Service—ES—which was launched on 2 April 1990. The chief executive will report to the Secretary of State on ES achievements and use of resources at the end of the financial year. The report will be published in the summer. The departmental report published on 5 February contains Employment Department group expenditure plans for the three years from 1 April 1990.

Training, Devon

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the training providers for the county of Devon in the coming year; and if he will list those agencies whose services he has dispensed with, together with his reasons.

Mr. Jackson: Contractual arrangements with training providers are commercial in confidence and are the responsibility of the Devon and Cornwall TEC.

Textiles and Clothing

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will take steps to monitor job losses in the textile and clothing industry by region and travel-to-work area.

Mr. Forth: Estimates of changes in employment in the textile and clothing industry for regions and for travel-to-work areas are available from the biennial censuses of employment.

Employment service local offices receive advance notice of large scale redundancies and are ready to consider, with the companies involved, specific responses in individual cases. The Department also produces figures on confirmed redundancies for standard regions only, provided that this does not enable individual companies to be identified. I do not intend to add to the burdens on business by extending this information.

DEFENCE

D Notices

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what D notices have been issued during the current year.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No new D notices have been issued in 1991 although on a number of occasions D notice advice has been offered to the media on the basis of the current eight standing D notices on which the system runs and which have been largely unchanged since 1982.

Military Bases

Dr. Hampson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been spent on the development of military bases in Yorkshire and Humberside since 1979.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Over £300 million has been spent on substantial enhancements to military bases during this period.

Stand-off Nuclear Missile

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) when he expects to announce his decision on a stand-off nuclear missile for the Royal Air Force;

(2) what factors will influence his decision on a stand-off nuclear missile for the Royal Air Force.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: As with all equipment procurement decisions, a variety of factors will be taken into account, including cost, performance, time scale and technical risk. Our consideration of the various options is continuing. The House will be informed as soon as a decision is taken.

Reserve Forces

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the current establishment of the Territorial Army; and how many vacancies there are;

(2) what will be the establishment of the Territorial Army if the proposals contained in "Options for Change" are fully implemented;

(3) what units of the Territorial Army will be retained if the proposals contained in "Options for Change" are fully implemented.

Mr. Maddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total spent in the last year on recruitment to the reserves; how much has been spent from 1 January to date; whether the reserves are at full establishment level; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [holding answer 14 February 1991]: Spending on recruitment for the reserves in 1989-90 totalled some £3·55 million. A total of £1·5 million has been spent in the current financial year, up to the end of January, of which some £10,000 relates to bills presented since 1 January.

Previously announced plans for the Territorial Army envisaged an expansion to a total strength, including the Home Service Force, of about 90,000. The current strength is about 75,000. We are not yet in a position to take final decisions on the future size and shape of either organisation.

Territorial Army

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the existing units of the Terrritorial Army; and where they are located.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces will write to the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Type 23 Frigates

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he next expects to place an order for a batch of type 23 frigates.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I have nothing to add to my answer of 4 December 1990 to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), at column 104.

The Gulf

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the estimate of the costs of the Gulf hostilities at the latest date.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The additional costs of the Gulf conflict so far assessed are some £1·5 billion including equipment lost and munitions used. On the basis indicated by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in the autumn statement last week, we expect that the eventual costs could be £3 billion.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the Red Crescent has sent him any official figures of the number of civilians killed in recent bombing raids on Iraq; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My right hon. Friend has received no such reports from the Red Crescent.

Bunkers, Iraq

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what contacts his Department has made with British companies or design consultants involved in the building of underground bunkers in Iraq since 1980.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is not the practice to comment on such matters.

The Gulf

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many United Kingdom ground force troops are available for combat in the Gulf;

(2) how many (a) MoD personnel, (b) United Kingdom service personnel and (c) United Kingdom medical personnel are deployed in the Gulf.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The United Kingdom has committed some 43,000 personnel in total to the coalition force. It would not be appropriate to provide a detailed breakdown of this total, for operational security reasons.

Written Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

Greater Manchester Relief Road

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what alternative solutions to the problem of traffic congestion on the M62 motorway were considered and rejected in favour of the Greater Manchester western and northern relief road.

Mr. Chope: Expanding capacity by widening of the existing motorway; reducing demand for the road by limiting access to the motorway for local traffic or encouraging alternative modes of transport.

Bus Lanes, Westminster

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on what action is to be taken to enforce no parking in bus lanes in Westminster; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Enforcement is entirely a matter for the police. My right hon. and learned Friend has no power to intervene in the way suggested.

Airport Congestion

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the study that his predecessor commissioned on ways in which the system for allocating slots at congested airports might be improved.

Mr. Rifkind: The consultants, SD-Scicon UK Ltd, have completed stage one of the study. I have placed copies of their report in the Library of the House and shall be circulating it to interested parties.

The consultants have identified a number of options for allocating slots which could merit further study and have developed a technique for standardising the assessment of different methods.

I have asked the consultants to proceed to stage two of their study and to present a further report to me in the summer.

Retail Deliveries

Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to encourage out-of-hour retail deliveries.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 19 February 1991]: I have no current plans to do so. The matter is best determined by highway authorities in response to local circumstances under the wide powers available to them in the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984. A considerable volume of out-of-hours deliveries already takes place under these arrangements and through agreements between businesses and distribution firms.

A2070

Mr. Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to announce the date for the public inquiry into the route of the A2070 Ham street bypass in Kent.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 19 February 1991]: I cannot give a date until Kent county council proposes dates for the inquiry convenient to itself, whereupon the Secretary of State will arrange for the appointment of the independent inspector.

ENVIRONMENT

Expenditure, Yorkshire and Humberside

Dr. Hampson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide a breakdown, by programme, of his Department's expenditure in Yorkshire and Humberside from 1979 to the present.

Mr. Key: A breakdown of the Department's main programmes is given in the table for the years 1986-87 to date. In the case of some DOE programmes, the information available relates to allocations or approvals rather than expenditure.

Information for the years 1979-80 to 1985-86 is not readily available.

Mr. Key: A breakdown of the Department's main programmes is given in the table for the years 1986-87 to date. In the case of some DOE programmes, the information available relates to allocations or approvals, rather than expenditure.

Satellite Receivers

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice he gives to planning authorities on the fixing of satellite receivers on the outside of properties; under what conditions permission to site such a receiver may be refused; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: Where the installation of a satellite dish does not fall within the general permission granted by the Town and Country Planning General Development Order, it is in the first instance for the local planning authority to consider whether planning permission should be granted or refused, having regard to all material considerations. We hope later this year to publish planning guidelines which will give advice on unobtrusive siting of dishes.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he intends to amend the regulations specifying the planning conditions for the fixing of a satellite receiver on the outside of a property; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answers given by the then Minister for Planning to my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) on 1 November, Official Report, column 695, and my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) on 13 November, Official Report, column 93. We hope to announce shortly how the Town and Country Planning General Development Order 1988 will be amended in the light of the consultation exercise undertaken last summer and the subsequent Sky-BSB merger.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the accuracy of the advice given to purchasers of a satellite receiver by the suppliers in respect of planning conditions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: No representations have been received. The forthcoming departmental planning guide for the siting of satellite antennas will be widely distributed among the suppliers of antennas. This should help to improve the quality of advice and also the standard of installation.

Waste Disposal Plants

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to encourage the use of electromagnets at waste disposal plants.

Mr. Baldry: The potential return on the use of magnetic separation at a waste disposal plant should be enough to encourage the use of electromagnets without any Government intervention.

Nevertheless, we have made available £10 million in supplementary credit approvals for local authorities in England in 1991-92, for investment in recycling facilities.

Countryside Premium Scheme

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many farmers are currently eligible for admission to the countryside premium scheme; how many are actively enrolled in the scheme; what is the current cost of the scheme; and what percentage of the total amount is reimbursed from CAP funds.

Mr. Baldry: All farmers in Bedfordshire, Cambridgeshire, Essex, Hertfordshire, Norfolk, Northamptonshire and Suffolk entering permanent fallow land into MAFF's set aside scheme are eligible for admission to the countryside premium scheme. Land set aside for rotational fallow, grazed fallow or non-agricultural use may also be eligible in certain circumstances. There are currently about 850 farmers in the seven counties with set-aside land in these eligible categories.

To date, the Countryside Commission has made agreements under the countryside premium scheme with 160 farmers and, in 1991-92, expenditure is expected to be £750,000. The scheme is not currently eligible for reimbursement from CAP funds.

Structure Plans

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what employment factors he takes into account when approving structure plans.

Sir George Young: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 12 February, Official Report, column 426. The economic factors taken into account by local planning authorities and my right hon. Friend would include considerations such as current and possible future levels of employment in the area.

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whom he expects to consult on his proposed modifications to the Cheshire structure plan in the spring.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend will notify Members of Parliament of the proposed modifications of the Cheshire structure plan who have expressed an interest, and all those who represent Cheshire, together with the participants at the examination in public. Cheshire county council will be asked to place copies of the proposed modifications and supporting documents on deposit for public inspection. It must advertise that this has been done and inform those who made representations on the plan.

Low-energy Light Bulbs

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to encourage the use of low-energy light bulbs in his Department's offices and other buildings.

Mr. Baldry: My Department's policy relating to the promotion of low-energy lighting is, wherever practicable, to replace all standard luminaires, both tungsten and fluorescent, with low-energy consuming equivalents.

In the three largest headquarters buildings a programme of lighting improvements is currently being carried out. All these projects incorporate the installation of low-energy fluorescent tubes and miniature fluorescent fittings. The number of tungsten bulbs in current use throughout the Department's offices is minimal, but these will be replaced as part of the ongoing programme to reduce overall energy consumption.

Radioactivity

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what levels of radioactivity are permitted for release to the atmosphere after the incineration of radioactively contaminated materials.

Mr. Baldry: Radioactive waste may be disposed of only if an authorisation has been issued under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960 by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution. Authorisations impose strict conditions and activity limits and are issued only after careful assessment is made of the environmental impact of proposed disposals to ensure that doses to the public are below the maximum permissible limits as recommended by the International Commission on Radiological Protection. As for disposal by incineration, authorisations are issued on a case-by-case basis taking all the local circumstances into account. However, it is usual to permit disposals of up to 4 megabecquerels per day of the commonly used tritium and carbon-14 without this detailed examination.

Pollution Control

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he expects all requisite guidance to be in place before the implementation of integrated pollution control under the Environmental Protection Act 1990 on 1 April; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: General guidance on the operation of integrated pollution control will be issued before 1 April. More detailed guidance on particular categories of process will be made available in accordance with the timetable for bringing processes in these categories under integrated control.

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from the speciality chemicals industry about integrated pollution control requirements under the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

Mr. Baldry: The Department has received representations from the speciality chemicals industry about particular characteristics of the processes they operate. In addition, we have consulted the industry's main representatives, the Chemical Industries Association, in drawing up guidance and preparing regulations on integrated pollution control.

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will further consult the speciality chemicals industry before the detailed implementation of integrated pollution control.

Mr. Baldry: The Department has already drawn on the expertise of the speciality chemicals industry in preparing regulations and drawing up general guidance for the implementation of integrated pollution control. Final versions will be published shortly. Further consultation will be undertaken on detailed issues as appropriate.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to adopt the principle of a presumption in favour of unrestricted access for the public to information held by pollution control authorities.

Mr. Baldry: Yes. The Water Act 1989 and the Environmental Protection Act 1990 provide for public access to information in respect of water pollution, integrated pollution control and local authority air pollution control.

Fire Safety

Mr. Ken Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many members serve on the fire advisory panel; and how many of those members are also members of the Society of Fire Safety Engineers.

Mr. Yeo: The Fire Advisory Panel has 13 outside members, of whom seven are also members of the Society of Fire Safety Engineers. In addition, eight officials regularly attend its meetings, and of those, three are members of the society.

Bathing Beaches

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will name the designated bathing beach in England which had the highest number of total coliforms present in any single water sample taken during the 1990 bathing season; and if he will indicate the level reached;

(2) if he will name the designated bathing beach in England which had the highest number of E. coli present in any single water sample taken during the 1990 bathing season; and if he will indicate the level reached.

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Member to the publication "Bathing Water Directive (76/160/EEC) Article 13 Report (1990 Survey Results) United Kingdom", copies of which are available in the Library.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to publish information concerning the presence of chemicals and the level of general pollution as part of the beach standards test list.

Mr. Baldry: Monitoring of the quality of bathing water is carried out in accordance with the requirement of directive 76/160/EEC. In England and Wales the results of the monitoring are maintained on public registers by the regional offices of the National Rivers Authority. Summary results are published in "Bathing Water Directive (76/160/EEC) Article 13 Report (1990 Survey Results) United Kingdom", copies of which are available in the Library.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report a list of the designated bathing beaches in England, indicating for each the date that they became designated in accordance with the 1976 EC bathing water directive.

Mr. Baldry: The dates on which bathing waters were identified as being subject to the requirements for standards specified in directive 76/160/EEC are as follows:

Estuaries

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the estuaries in the United Kingdom which are regarded as of environmental importance and those which require to be protected under the terms of the Ramsar convention.

Mr. Baldry: The information readily available relates to Great Britain. The majority of our estuaries encompass areas that are of environmental importance and where appropriate these are protected as sites of special scientific interest. The Nature Conservancy Council has undertaken a review of the nature conservation interests of the estuaries of Great Britain and I understand that its full report is due to be published on 25 March. Sites which contain estuarial areas where it has been agreed that the Ramsar criteria are met, and which have been designated, are as follows:

1. Bridgewater Bay
2. Cors Fochno and Dyfi
3. Lindisfarne
4. Minsmere-Walberswick
5. North Norfolk Coast
6. Chesil Beach and The Fleet
7. Dee Estuary
8. The Swale
9. Alt Estuary
10. Rockliffe Marshes
11. Chichester and Langstone Harbours
12. Upper Severn Estuary

Local Government Finance

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the implications for the voluntary sector of changes in local authority funding levels.

Mr. Key: It is for each individual local authority to decide on the level of its funding for the voluntary sector. We have increased the amount of external support to local authorities next year by 12·8 per cent.

The Gulf

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on action to mitigate oil spills and ecological damage in the Gulf.

Mr. Heseltine: The states whose coastlines are most at risk from the oil deliberately released from Iraqi installations or as a consequence of Iraqi shelling have the primary responsibility for response action. Recognising the unprecedented scale of the threat, both the coalition Governments and the wider international community have offered assistance to the Gulf states in the form of expertise or pollution control equipment. I described the initial assistance offered by the United Kingdom in my letter to hon. Members of 6 February which included both expert advice on pollution control and assessment of the biological effects of the oil spill. Our current information is that the largest oil slick has had a serious impact along parts of the coastline of Saudi Arabia from Khafji as far south as the island of Abu Ali. Protective booms are in place round the intakes for major industrial and desalination plants along the Saudi coast and work has begun on protecting the most ecologically sensitive sites.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the destruction of coral reefs in the Gulf forming the spring spawning grounds for large shrimp fisheries.

Mr. Heseltine [holding answer 18 February 1991]: The assessment of the biological effects of the Gulf oil spill carried out by the Natural Environment Research Council for my Department includes a description of the likely effects of oil on the coral ecosystem in the Gulf. A copy of this report is in the Library. We do not yet have sufficiently detailed information from the Gulf to determine how serious the impact of the slick has been, but it is likely that at least some of the coastal reefs between Khafji and Manifa in Saudi Arabia have been affected.

Litter Code

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities submitted comments on his proposals to implement the litter code under the Environmental Protection Act 1990 into existing compulsory competitive tendering arrangements, as set out in his letter of 9 January to the three local authority associations; and what proportion of the comments he received were in favour of the proposals.

Mr. Trippier: The Department received 39 responses to its consultation letter of 4 January setting out the Government's proposals for introducing transitional arrangements to facilitate the implementation of the litter duty in cases where street cleaning contracts had already been let by local authorities. The respondents, who included the main local authority associations in England, Wales and Scotland and various other representative associations, made a significant number of constructive comments. These comments are being carefully considered and an announcement will be made shortly.

Interim Development Orders

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any proposals to alter the procedures relating to interim development orders; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: Yes. The Government believe that it is inequitable that the extent and terms of these permissions, which have been in existence for close to 50 years, are not recorded and that householders and others may have been disadvantaged by this lack of knowledge.

The Government intend, therefore, to table amendments during the passage of the Planning and Compensation Bill to provide that, unless the holder of an IDO permission applies to the appropriate mineral planning authority within four months of the date of the commencement of the provisions for the permission to be registered, the permission will cease to have effect. My Department will consult on the detail of what we have in mind, including the appropriate time period for applications to be submitted.

The Government recognise that registration in itself will not deal with the problems of the lack of conditions attached to such permissions. Residential and other development may have been built on or near IDO permission areas; similarly, parts of IDO sites may have been designated as sites of special scientific interest or of other environmental importance—without knowledge of the fact that the permission existed or the terms of the conditions attached to it. The Government are therefore considering whether to require that applications for registration of IDO permissions are accompanied by schemes of operating, restoration and, where appropriate, aftercare conditions for the approval of the mineral planning authority. The Government take the view that it would be sensible to use the opportunity of registration to apply conditions and believe that responsible operators would share that view. Applicants would be able to appeal to the Secretary of State against refusal or the imposition of unreasonable conditions by the authority. My Department will be issuing today a short consultation paper on these proposals, copies of which have been placed in the Libraries of the House, and will consider the response before taking a firm decision. The question of the impact of the proposals on the compensation rights of operators would be covered in the consultation exercise.

The Government have also considered carefully whether it would be right to take statutory measures now to deal with the problems of unworked land and IDO permission boundaries. Although we fully appreciate the strength of feelings on this issue and the legitimate concerns expressed, we are not convinced that it would be right to expropriate legitimate mineral working rights without a detailed examination of all the implications and full and considered consultation on any proposed changes.

My Department will therefore look at these issues very closely in its comprehensive review of the existing powers available to mineral planning authorities for dealing with inadequate permissions and we shall be considering whether we can reach early conclusions on the compensation aspects. In the meantime, I intend to invite the industry, in the context of agreeing a scheme of operating and restoration conditions with the mineral planning authority, to discuss an adjustment to the boundaries of their rights where appropriate.

These proposals are subject to consultation with representatives of the local authorities, environmental groups, the industry and land-owners. They aim to provide the right balance between the needs of the country for a secure and effective supply of minerals, together with information about where these sites are worked and ensuring that the minerals are extracted in an environmentally sensitive way. As we made clear in the Environment White Paper it is necessary to strike a careful balance between the interests of amenity and the need to exploit the resource. Mineral operators must take account of best environmental practice and aim to be good neighbours. I am aware that increasingly the industry accepts its responsibility to work sites in an environmentally sensitive manner and to restore land once working has ceased.

Rent Arrears

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what the latest figures are on the arrears of rent outstanding to each local housing authority in England; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: I have today arranged for the information to be placed in the Library.

As at 1 April 1990, rent arrears owing to all English housing authorities amounted to some £360 million, (7·8 per cent. of the total rent collectable.) This is an increase of 12 per cent. compared with the figure at 1 April 1989. The 10 authorities with the worst arrears represent 37 per cent. of the total; their level of arrears ranges from about 18 per cent. of the rent collectable, in Camden, to about 45 per cent., in Brent. London accounts for 46 per cent. of the national total; total London arrears are £165 million and nine of the 10 worst authorities are in London; but I am glad to see that seven London boroughs have reduced the amount of rent outstanding to them.

The figures are an indictment of too many authorities for their poor management and, while a third have improved their performance and deserve commendation for this, the figures show that far too many are not acting upon the advice on rent collection given by the Department and the Audit Commission.

The three poorest performing authorities are those that turned in the worst performance last year. In Brent, Lambeth and Southwark, tenants between them owe over £60 million worth of rent. Since the introduction of the new housing finance system in April 1990, the cost of arrears are borne by the tenants who do pay their rent. If some tenants do not pay, either rents generally will go up or the level of service will fall. Authorities are also required to account to their tenants for their housing management by publishing indicators of their performance, from April this year onwards. I expect tenants to demand major changes in authorities' policies towards non-payers, and to put pressure on them to ensure that arrears of this magnitude become a thing of the past.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Birmingham Pub Bombings

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Attorney-General (1) what consideration was given to seeking an order to restrain former Chief Superintendent George Reade from going to Australia prior to the hearing of the appeal of the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when he was first made aware that former Chief Superintendent George Reade was proposing to travel to Australia; and what undertaking he sought as regards Mr. Reade's availability for inquiries relating to the appeal of the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings.

The Attorney-General: This case remains under consideration by the courts. I will write to the hon. Member after the appeal has been determined.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Attorney-General what was the cost to public funds of sending Devon and Cornwall police officers to Australia to interview former Chief Superintendent George Reade.

The Attorney-General: The Director of Public Prosecutions has arranged for the chief constable of the Devon and Cornwall police to write to the hon. Member giving the information requested.

Pre-trial Issues

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement concerning the inter-agency working group on pre-trial issues.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor, the Home Secretary and I have received a report from the working group on pre-trial issues which makes a number of detailed and far-reaching recommendations for improvements in the processing of criminal cases to the point of trial.

We welcome the report as a valuable basis for action in consultation with the CPS, the police, the courts, and other organisations and bodies with a direct interest in the implementation of the recommendations. We have appointed a steering group of officials to carry forward implementation of the report and to undertake these consultations in order to establish the resource implications of the proposals made, and to provide by the summer recess a costed action plan for implementation.

Copies of the report have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses and sent to the Select Committee on Home Affairs which last year conducted an inquiry into the impact on the criminal justice system of the establishment of the CPS and made many recommendations which the working group has carried forward.

CIVIL SERVICE

Disabled Employees

Mr. Allen: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service what steps he is taking to promote the meeting of legal quotas for employing disabled people in Government Departments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: All Departments and agencies aim to employ a 3 per cent. quota of registered disabled staff. My Department has introduced a range of initiatives, outlined in the code of practice on the employment of people with disabilities in the civil service, to help Departments and agencies to achieve this. The annual report on progress will be published next month in the magazine "Independent". Copies will be placed in the Library of the House.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Human Rights

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the incorporation of the European convention on human rights into United Kingdom law.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have no plans to propose legislation to incorporate the European convention on human rights and fundamental freedoms into domestic law. We are committed to, and support, the principles of human rights in the convention, but we believe that it is for Parliament rather than the judiciary to determine how these principles are best secured.

Magistrates Courts

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what assessment he has made of the efficiency of magistrates courts' committees; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he has received any representations on the report of the scrutiny team concerning magistrates courts; and if he will make a statement;

(3) whether his Department has any plans to reform the financial administration of magistrates courts; and if he will make a statement;

(4) if he will make a statement on his Department's response to the scrutiny report on magistrates courts' services.

Mr. John Patten: No decisions have yet been reached on the proposals for reorganising and financing the magistrates' courts service contained in the scrutiny report on the service. We have received views from the representative organisations of the service, magistrates courts' committees, individual members of the service and other interested parties. We are considering these views in the light of the assessment by independent consultants last year of the costs of implementation.

Community Charge

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will give the number of court actions which have so far been undertaken in the Mansfield court area for the non-payment of the poll tax;

(2) if he will give the number of court actions which have so far been undertaken for the non-payment of the poll tax by petty sessions division area.

Mr. John Patten: The available information, which is provided by justices' clerks on a clerkship basis, is placed in the Library as soon as possible after its collation. Information for the period 1 April to 30 September 1990 is already in the Library and for the period 1 October to 31 December 1990 will be placed in the Library this week.

Immigration

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many outstanding cases there were for October, November, December 1990 and January 1991 under the headings of (a) naturalisation, (b) registration, (c) refugees, (d) asylum seekers, and (e) general immigration; and what was the number of new casework applications in each of those areas for each month.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The number of outstanding cases and intakes in the immigration and nationality department by the categories requested is as follows:

	Nationality
	Naturalisation[1]	Registration[1]	General immigration casework[1,2]	Asylum and related casework[1,3]
Outstanding cases
October	63,553	24,485	20,910	29,936
November	64,818	23,853	21,931	32,566
December	63,597	22,677	21,765	35,304
January	61,331	21,859	20,919	37,666

December	1,334	667	21,467	4,740
January	1,514	883	27,356	6,513

[1] Does not include applications received in the Department but which await allocation to caseworkers.
[2] Includes referred entry clearance applications, and enquiries submitted by letter, as well as variation of leave cases. Includes both general and eastern European casework (the latter was absorbed into general casework in July 1990).
[3] These figures are a total of all work outstanding in the refugee unit.

Police Costs

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current cost of the Metropolitan, West Midlands and Merseyside police forces expressed in terms of cost per crime cleared up.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The available information on the amount of police time spent on different types of activity, including clearing up crime, does not yet make it possible to produce an accurate and consistent unit cost of crime cleared up for each force. A programme of work, following a joint Home Office/Treasury study of police manpower, is under way to develop standard methods of activity analysis in forces. This should in due course make it possible to attribute time and cost to different activities, including those relating to crime.

Asylum

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list the total number of people who sought asylum in the United Kingdom in each quarter of 1990;

(2) if he will list the total number of people who sought asylum in the United Kingdom in 1990; and how many (a) were awarded refugee status, (b) were awarded exceptional leave to remain and (c) were refused entry.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Reliable quarterly estimates of the number of applications for asylum in the United Kingdom in 1990 cannot yet be made, but provisional indications are that the total in 1990 was of the order of 30,000, including associated dependants.

Comprehensive information on decisions in 1990 on asylum applications is not yet available. Decisions recorded to date are shown in the following table, but these understate because of delays in recording.

Decisions[1] on applications[2] for asylum in the United Kingdom made in 1990 as recorded at Mid-February 1991

	Numbers
Granted asylum	1,600
Granted exceptional leave	3,700
Refused asylum or exceptional leave	650

[1] Including associated dependants.
[2] Decisions do not necessarily relate to applications made in 1990.

Fuller and more reliable estimates of applications and decisions in 1990 will be published as usual in the annual Home Office statistical bulletin "Refugee Statistics, United Kingdom" later this year.

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for each year since 1985 the number of applicants for asylum in the United Kingdom who have been held in detention for more than one month.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. On 15 February, 110 persons who had claimed asylum had been detained under Immigration Act powers for more than one month.

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the conclusions of the Council of Europe ministerial conference on east-west migration in Vienna regarding the asylum question.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I attended the ministerial conference in Vienna on 24 and 25 January, at which representatives of Council of Europe member states, as well as all the states of central and eastern Europe, Australia, Canada and the United States were present. The conference was not concerned specifically with asylum, but with the problems posed for both receiving countries and countries of origin by the growth of migration from central and eastern Europe. There was general agreement on the need for international co-operation on measures to limit migratory flows, including action in respect of economic migrants who seek to exploit the asylum process and on the importance of tackling the root causes of migration in the countries of origin. A group of senior officials from the participating states was invited to follow up the recommendations of the conference.

A copy of the final communiqué of the conference has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration he is giving to the establishment of a European appeal court to give a right of appeal against a refusal to grant asylum; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: None. I see no merit in such a proposal.

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how he distinguishes in policy between measures taken to combat abuse of the asylum procedure and measures taken to regulate the flow of asylum seekers.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Our policy is to meet our international obligations towards refugees who may properly look to the United Kingdom for protection, while taking firm action to maintain normal immigration control in respect both of those who have already found safety elsewhere and of those whose applications for recognition of refugee status have no basis in the criteria of the 1951 United Nations convention.

National Boundaries

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if Her Majesty's Government will join the Schengen process.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We do not intend to accede to the convention on the abolition of checks at common borders which was signed by the Schengen group of countries in June last year.

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if Her Majesty's Government will press for the adoption of the convention on the crossing of the communities' external frontiers by all member states of the European Community.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The draft convention on the crossing of external frontiers is still under discussion between the member states and is not yet ready for signature.

Racial Attacks

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which police forces in the United Kingdom record racially motivated attacks; if he will arrange for the latest figures for each force to be published, together with the figures for the comparable period of the previous year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: All police forces in England and Wales record incidents as being racially motivated if the victim, the investigating officer or a third party witness perceive them to be so. Publication of such information is for chief officers. Some include statistics in their annual reports, while others may decide to make such information available in response to a particular inquiry.

Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary examines carefully during inspections forces' response to racially motivated crime. The Government are currently monitoring the impact of recent guidance to the police and other agencies, and will be formally reviewing progress with all statutory bodies. The Government have made it clear to the police service that racial attacks must be tackled as a priority.

Tote

Mr. Holt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department who owns the Tote; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Horserace Totalisator Board (the Tote), by virtue of section 12(1) of the Betting Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963, is established as a body corporate. It is therefore an independent legal person.

Boundary Commission

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Boundary Commission for England has decided when to start the next general review of constituencies in England.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The commission has given notice of its intention to commence a general review forthwith. It is required to report between February 1993 and February 1998.

Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received a report from Viscount Colville of Culross QC on the operation in 1989 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have received such a report from Viscount Colville and have placed copies in the Library.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Savings

Mr. Alton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list, as a percentage of total household disposable income, net savings in the United Kingdom in each year since 1985.

Mr. Maples: The estimates for the period 1985 to 1989 are as follows:

Balance (household income less expenditure) as percentage of total household disposable income

	Percentage
1985	0·5
1986	−0·4
1987	−1·9
1988	−2·6
1989	−1·8

Community Charge

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 28 January to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside, Official Report, column 391, on the community charge reduction scheme, if he will publish in the Official Report the assumptions used in reaching the figure given.

Mr. Mellor: The savings on community charge benefit resulting from the introduction of the community charge reduction scheme are a broad estimate based, like all the figures for the scheme, on the family expenditure surveys for 1987-89. Account has also been taken of preliminary information on the numbers of people claiming community charge benefit.

Pensions (Tax Relief)

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the amount of tax relief given in respect of moneys invested by individuals and companies in all types of pensions and pension funds during the last five years.

Mr. Maude: Latest estimates are as follows:

£ million

	Relief for:
	Employees contributions to occupational pension schemes	Employers contributions to occupational pension schemes[1]	Contributions to personal pensions and retirement annuity contracts[2]
1986-87	1,700	3,300	475
1987-88	1,700	3,000	525
1988-89	1,800	3,100	625
1989-90	2,000	3,500	950
1990-91	2,200	3,800	1,100

[1] On the basis that under present arrangements, employers' contributions are not taxable as a benefit in kind for the employee.

[2] Includes income tax relief on FSAVCs.

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what studies his Department has carried out of the impact of corporation tax on smaller businesses and the survival rate of small companies.

Mr. Maude: The impact of corporation tax on small companies is kept under regular review. The profits limit for the small companies relief has been doubled in the last two years so that 40,000 more companies now pay tax at 25 per cent.—the small companies rate of corporation tax. And we have reduced the small companies rate itself from 42 per cent. to its present level of 25 per cent.

Nursing Agencies

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what legislative or administrative changes have been made since 1 January 1989 affecting the liability for VAT of nursing agencies.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: None. The United Kingdom has always exempted from VAT the supply of services by a person registered or enrolled in any of the medical or paramedical registers. However, under both United Kingdom and EC law this relief does not extend to the services of non-professionally qualified people.

Financial Reporting

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to improve financial reporting to Parliament and to departmental Select Committees.

Mr. Mellor: The Government set out their proposals for the presentation of financial information in their White Paper "Financial Reporting to Parliament" (Cm 918). These proposals were implemented by the introduction this year of departmental reports. As the White Paper makes clear, the Government will keep the arrangements for the presentation of financial information under review.

Departmental Reports

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the departmental reports published to date and those that are outstanding.

Mr. Mellor: The information is as follows:

There are no departmental reports outstanding.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what response he has had to the new Budget format of departmental reports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We shall be reviewing all aspects of departmental reports in the light of comments received from departmental Select Committees and others over the coming months.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what requests from Chairmen of departmental Select Committees he has received to discuss the new departmental reports.

Mr. Mellor: This is a matter for the Chairmen of departmental Select Committees.

Real Interest Rate

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list in tabular form the real interest rate for each month for the last year; and if he will make a statement on the apparent trend.

Mr. Maples: There is no agreed definition of the real interest rate. The table shows the average three-month inter-bank rate, for each month for the last year, deflated by the 12-month all-items RPI inflation rate for that month. In the three months to end January, the average real interest rate was 4·1 per cent. compared with an average of 7·0 per cent. for the same three months a year earlier.

WALES

Employment Practices

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) which district health authorities in Wales have (a) adopted and (b) implemented policy statements on child care facilities for staff employed within the districts; how many hospitals in each health authority area offer child care facilities and how many take advantage of such facilities; and whether he has any plans to issue guidelines, including the issuing of targets for child care facilities in the health service;

(2) which district health authorities have produced guidelines or policy statements concerning the application of job-share schemes; how many job-share posts have been (a) advertised and (b) filled in each district health authority in Wales; and how many of these job-share schemes applied to (i) health visitors, (ii) district nurses, (iii) midwives, (iv) sister nurses and (v) staff nurses.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The information requested is not held centrally. Whilst there are no guidelines and targets for child care facilities, health authorities are encouraged, through the annual manpower resource planning process in particular, to consider and develop a range of employment practices. These include child care facilities and job-share schemes. However, the adoption and implementation of such practices is a matter for local employers to decide.

Dental Services

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many dental check-ups were performed in Wales on (a) children (b) adults and (c) pensioners in each of the health areas in Wales for the years 1986 to 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The available information is in the tables.

Table 1 gives the number of examinations, scheduled for payment during the appropriate year, performed within the general dental service.

Table 2 gives the number of inspections performed within the community dental service during the year in question. These figures include inspections conducted as part of screening programmes carried out by the community dental service to indentify patients requiring full examination.

Foreign-based Employers

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list in the Official Report the 25 largest foreign-based employers, by numbers employed, country of origin, location and date and size of initial investment in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: The following table lists the 25 largest overseas employers in Wales, together with information on location and the date of the commencement of their operations in Wales. Current employment and capital investment details for individual companies are confidential. In total, however, these companies employ some 30,000 in Wales.

[1] A number of overseas companies listed in the table have more than one plant in Wales, in which case the location and date of their first known investment is given.
[2] Some overseas companies became established in Wales by acquisition of then United Kingdom owned assets; these are separately identified by the notation 2, and the date given is the date of change of ownership to overseas.
[3] This was the merger, in 1989 between a United Kingdom company with plants in Wales and a French company.
[4] This is the date of the first investment at Treforest, subsequently the business was transferred to Llantrisant.

Notes:
1. Changes of asset ownership between one foreign company and another foreign company are not identified; and the commencement date is the date of the first known overseas investment.
2. It is possible for an overseas company first established in Wales by direct new investment to have subsequently expanded by means of acquisition of existing assets.
3. The primary data source for the above table is the Welsh Office Regional Data System.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for 21 February.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

The Gulf

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Prime Minister (1) if he will place in the Library a copy of the translated text on which he based his initial response to the statement issued by the Iraqi Government on 15 February;

(2) when he received an expert translation from the original of the statement put forward by the Iraqi Government on 15 February; and if he will arrange for it to be placed in the Library.

The Prime Minister: We received a copy of the full BBC translation of the Iraqi statement during the early afternoon of 15 February. This proved to be the same in all major respects as the English translation issued later by the Iraqi Government. Arrangements have been made for a copy of both texts to be placed in the Library of the House.

Norwegian Prime Minister

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what proposals were made by his Norwegian counterpart during their recent meeting; and what response he made.

The Prime Minister: I had discussions with Mrs. Brundtland on 13 February 1991 which covered a range of issues including developments in the Baltics, Europe and the Gulf.

Hypothermia

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's progress in the last 10 years on achieving a co-ordinated policy for reducing hypothermia.

The Prime Minister: There has been a significant overall decline in the levels of excess winter mortality (the difference between the number of deaths in the quarter from January to March and the quarter from July to September) between 1979 (47,311 deaths) and 1989 (23,853 deaths). In only a very small number of these was hypothermia identified as the underlying cause: 166 in 1989, plus an additional 209 cases where it was a contributory factor.

While there is clearly a correlation between excess mortality and winter weather, the exact causes of increased deaths in winter are extremely complex. Factors include diet, alcohol intake, smoking, clothing (especially dressing appropriately when going out of doors in cold weather) and exercise, as well as adequate warmth in the home. The need for further research in this area is being investigated by the Medical Research Council.

The improved figures in recent years are no doubt due in part to the progress we have been able to achieve through the collaborative efforts of Government, the statutory services and the voluntary sector, in the provision of community health and personal social services, as well as to the more general improvements in housing, social security benefits and overall standards of living.

Arms Register

Mr. Madden: To ask the Prime Minister what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the establishment by the United Nations of a register of arms; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: We are playing a full part in the United Nations study group set up to look at ways and means of promoting transparency in international transfers of conventional weapons, including the possibility of establishing a universal and non-discriminatory United Nations register. It is hoped that a report will be made to the United Nations Secretary-General later this year.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Antarctica

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals he will be putting forward on the minerals issue at the April meeting of the Antarctic treaty parties.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) on 20 February at column 177.

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many representations he has received from hon. Members and members of the public on the issue of Antarctic minerals.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have received over 2,000.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his present policy towards a prohibition on mining in Antarctica.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State to him on 20 February 1991 at column 177.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if it remains Government policy to ratify the convention on the regulation of Antarctic mineral resource activities.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: There are at present no plans to ratify the convention on the regulation of antarctic mineral resource activities (CRAMRA).

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures he will take to prevent any waste disposal in Antarctica.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The British Antarctic Survey complies fully with the waste disposal provisions of Antarctic treaty recommendation XV-3.

The long-term policy of the survey is that all wastes, other than human or kitchen waste, should be removed from the Antarctic treaty area. This policy goes further than is required by measures currently under consideration in the Antarctic treaty consultative forum.

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list all future (a) conferences, (b) seminars and (c) meetings which Ministers in his Department have been invited to attend (i) in the United Kingdom, (ii) in the European Community and (iii) elsewhere; and if he will list the dates of these events for the next three months.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: It is not our normal practice to announce future engagements more than a few days before they are due to take place.

St. Helena

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 1 February, Official Report, column 697, if he will outline the rights of Portuguese fishing vessels in St. Helena's coastal waters.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Portuguese vessels do not enjoy automatic fishing and access rights in the waters of St. Helena and the dependencies, but can acquire them by separate and negotiated agreement. The only such agreement in force permits two Portuguese vessels to fish for an experimental period of two years within restricted areas of the waters of St. Helena and Ascension island.

Bulgaria

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much financial aid has been provided to Bulgaria to the most recent available date.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The European Commission, as chairman of the group of 24 donor countries, publishes a regular "scoreboard" of assistance to all eastern European countries, including Bulgaria. The latest edition, issued on 30 January, has been placed in the Library of the House.

The Gulf

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs from whom he obtained the English translation of the statement broadcast by Iraqi Radio on 15 February; if he will place a copy in the Library; if he is aware of any discrepancies in translation of the broadcast; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the time and date when his office first received from the Government of Iraq their statement of 15 February in both Arabic and English.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We received a full English text of the Iraqi statement, translated by the BBC monitoring service, during the early afternoon of 15 February. A copy of the Arabic text was received, also from the BBC, later that afternoon. In the late afternoon of 16 February we received an English text issued by the Iraqi Government, which was the same in all major respects as the BBC translation. I am arranging for copies of both texts to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent conditions have been set by the Austrian Government concerning the issuing of permits for the overflight of Austrian territories by British aircraft flying to the Gulf region.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The details of bilateral arrangements with other countries covering military overflights are classified and it is not our policy to comment on such matters.

Military Exhibition, Baghdad

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if any of his officials attended the first international exhibition for military production held in Baghdad in 1989.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Members of the British embassy in Baghdad attended the exhibition.

ENERGY

Insulation

Mr. Rost: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his reply of 30 January, Official Report, column 507, what information he has on the proportion of the 43 per cent. of eligible homes in England and Wales with 4 in. or more of loft insulation which have 150 mm or more of loft insulation, as recommended in his Department's publication entitled "Energy in Your Home".

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Information on levels of loft insulation in existing homes is derived from surveys undertaken annually by Audits of Great Britain. Information currently available from these surveys does not enable identification of specific levels of loft insulation in excess of 4 in. in homes in England and Wales.

Electricity Supplies

Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what changes have been made as a result of the electricity privatisation legislation concerning the distribution companies' ability to cut off the electricity supply to households during periods of cold weather.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The public electricity supply licences issued to the regional electricity companies under the Electricity Act 1989 require them to produce a code of practice on payment of bills and to draw up methods for dealing with customers in debt. The Director General of Electricity Supply has now approved the code and methods submitted by Yorkshire Electricity and the submissions of the other companies are expected to be approved shortly. Disconnections now stand at their lowest level since records began, and the Director General has stated that one of his priorities is to secure a continuing and significant reduction in disconnections.

Topping Cycle Technology

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will provide support for research and development in relation to the pursuit of topping cycle technology.

Mr. Moynihan: The Government announced at the beginning of February that they would be providing an additional £3·7 million this financial year for research into British Coal's topping cycle project at Grimethorpe. This brings the Department of Energy's total contribution to the project this year to £9·2 million and maintains the project's schedule.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy on how many occasions since the publication of the White Paper "This Common Inheritance" the ministerial committee on energy efficiency has met under his chairmanship; and whether he intends to increase the frequency of such meetings.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The ministerial committee meets approximately every two months and has met twice under the chairmanship of my right hon. Friend. Four further meetings are planned this year.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Departmental Achievements

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the principal achievements of his Department since June 1987.

Mr. Lilley: The Department of Trade and Industry continues to pursue the objective of encouraging enterprise, as set out in the 1988 White Paper "DTI—The Department for Enterprise". Towards this end, a number of notable achievements have been recorded across the whole range of the Department's activities: the enterprise initiative, bringing together a range of DTI services, was successfully launched in January 1988 and continues to stimulate business development and innovation; further privatisations have taken place, notably through the sale of Rolls-Royce plc, Rover Group, British Steel and Girobank; a major campaign has been undertaken to inform businesses about progress on the single market; major legislation, in particular the Companies Act (1989) and the Consumer Protection Act (1987), has been implemented to maintain a satisfactory framework for the operation of businesses and the protection of the consumer while, at the same time, further progress has been made towards removing unnecessary burdens placed on business by regulations and bureaucracy. Innovative activity by smaller firms is being stimulated by a comprehensive package of assistance including the small firms merit award for research and technology (SMART) and three new schemes, support for products under research (SPUR), the manufacturing, planning and implementation studies scheme (MPI), and the small and medium-sized enterprises technical advice service (SMETAS). DTI has also been at the forefront of implementing the Government's "next steps" initiative. Since 1988, nine agencies have been established within DTI involving roughly half the total manpower of the Department.

Graylaw Holdings Ltd.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has released the inspector's report on Graylaw Holdings Ltd. to any organisation.

Mr. Redwood: It would be inappropriate for me to discuss details of individual unpublished reports. Such reports, which include that into the affairs of Graylaw Holdings Ltd., are disclosed where appropriate under the Companies Act 1948 (as amended), under part XIV of the Companies Act 1985 (as amended), and under the Financial Services Act 1986.

Exports

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list, for each year since 1985, the (a) agricultural and (b) the manufacturing goods exported from the United Kingdom to each one of the countries in (i) the Persian Gulf region and (ii) the Maghreb, indicating their value in 1990 moneys.

Mr. Sainsbury: Volume indices of trade by product category are published in the "Monthly Review of External Trade Statistics". A copy is available in the Library. However, estimates at constant prices of exports by product category to individual countries are not kept.

Smoke Detectors

Mr. John Garrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recommendations the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee has made on the disposal of smoke detectors containing Americium 240.

Mr. Leigh: The Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee has made no recommendation to me about the disposal of smoke detectors containing Americium 241. But the National Radiological Protection Board has assured me that they can be disposed of safely with domestic rubbish.

Mr. John Garrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has for requiring the packaging of smoke detectors to indicate that they contain radioactive material.

Mr. Leigh: The proposed Radioactive Products (Safety) Regulations will require approved products to be labelled "approved by the National Radiological Protection Board under the Radioactive Products (Safety) Regulations". It is therefore unnecessary to indicate that a product contains a radioactive substance since the product will bear a label indicating that it has been approved as safe.

Military Exhibition, Baghdad

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if any of his officials attended the first international exhibition of military production held in Baghdad in 1989.

Mr. Sainsbury: No.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much was spent by his Department on activities arising from the first international exhibition of military production held in Baghdad in 1989.

Mr. Sainsbury: No financial support was given by my Department in respect of this event. Some staff time was involved in providing the non-financial assistance mentioned in my reply on 31 October 1990 to the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) at column 608. It is not possible to quantify expenditure on the staff time involved.

Legislation

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what process is undertaken to ensure that all new Government legislation avoids adding to the costs and reducing the economic viability of British industry.

Mr. Redwood: The White Paper "Releasing Enterprise" (Cm 512, 1988) committed Departments to compile compliance cost assessments (CCAs) for every regulatory proposal that could affect business. A CCA, which is to be drawn up before decisions are taken, seeks to identify the following: the sectors affected and any additional costs (recurring and non-recurring) they will have to bear; the impact on a "typical" business in the sectors principally affected and any differential effect on small firms; and any effect on international competitiveness. To ensure that estimated costs are as accurate as possible, when business is consulted about regulatory proposals, information about compliance costs is to be requested and current estimates exposed in the form of a draft CCA.

SCOTLAND

NHS Hospitals (Readmissions)

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it his policy to collect central information for all national health service patients in Scotland who, having been discharged from national health service hospitals, required subsequent hospitalisation for (a) the same complaint or (b) a different but related complaint.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Arrangements are already in train to provide this kind of information through record linkage based on the SMR (Scottish Medical Record) system. When fully in operation this will enable episodes of care to be linked together for the same patient and it will be possible to work out details of subsequent hospitalisation for the same condition and for different but related conditions.

Community Psychiatric Nurses

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the number of community psychiatric nurses in post at 1 April each year from 1982 to 1 January 1991 for each health board in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information available centrally for community psychiatric nurses is given in the following table.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Local Government Finance

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the regional rate for Northern Ireland in each financial year since 1985.

Dr. Mawhinney: The regional rate for Northern Ireland for each year since 1985 is as follows:

1989-90	138·07
1990-91	148·27

Domestic ratepayers have received a reduction of 12p in the poundage each year through the domestic rate aid grant. The resulting domestic regional rate poundages were:

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the overall rate payable by ratepayers in each district council area in Northern Ireland for each financial year since 1985.

Housing

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the number of new houses built by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive for each year since 1979.

Mr. Needham: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I have been advised by the chief executive that the number of new houses completed by the Housing Executive in each year since 1979 is as follows:

	Number
1979-80	2,952
1980-81	2,701
1981-82	2,342
1982-83	3,628
1983-84	3,874
1984-85	3,384
1985-86	3,160
1986-87	2,222
1987-88	1,805
1988-89	1,653
1989-90	1,577
[1]1990-91	1,151

[1] The figure for 1990-91 is for the period April 1990 to January 1991.

Manufacturing Jobs

Rev. William McCrea: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the number of manufacturing jobs lost in Mid-Ulster since 1 April 1990.

Mr. Needham: The information available relates to redundancies notified to the Department of Economic Development involving 10 or more employees at any specific workplace. This shows that 77 redundancies have occurred in the manufacturing sector in the Mid-Ulster parliamentary constituency since 1 April 1990.

Animal Transport

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he is taking to secure the welfare of livestock in transit (a) in Northern Ireland and (b) for export outside Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: Present Northern Ireland measures, as updated in 1989 and enforced by the veterinary inspectorate of the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland; provide wide protection of the welfare of animals both on internal and international journeys.

The controls conform to the standards of the EC directives on international transport. These will be adjusted as required following the current EC review of welfare of animals in transport.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give details of the numbers of (a) cattle, (b) horses, (c) sheep, (d) chickens and (e) other livestock killed in transit each year in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: The information requested is not held by the Department.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will introduce a measure to require drivers of animal transit vehicles to have basic skills in animal welfare matters.

Mr. Hanley: Current Northern Ireland, Great Britain and EC legislation for the protection of animals in transit places a duty on drivers to exercise care in the loading, unloading, feeding and watering of such animals.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Audit Commission

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what role the Audit Commission will have in respect of the auditing of (a) grant-maintained schools and (b) city technology colleges.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Auditing of grant-maintained schools and city technology colleges is the function of external auditors appointed by each school and college. The Audit Commission has successfully tendered to become the external auditors of several grant-maintained schools under the provisions of section 220 of the Education Reform Act 1988.

Geography

Mr. Jack Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what account he has taken in the preparation of the national curriculum geography draft order of the recommendations of the geography working group and the National Curriculum Council regarding the inclusion of inquiry skills and the possible conflict between geography and environmental education.

Mr. Eggar: The draft order for geography accepts the greater part of the National Curriculum Council's advice. This advice was based on proposals for the geography curriculum published in June last year, which were based on the geography working group's final report. In publishing the draft order my right hon. and learned Friend explained his view that the main emphasis of the attainment targets should be on the assessment of pupils' knowledge and understanding of aspects of geography, and less emphasis should be placed on the assessment of skills which are not particular to geography and the study of people's attitudes and opinions. The draft order confirms the importance of environmental education in geography through the inclusion of a separate attainment target devoted to this subject.

Stratford School

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what advice he was given by the governors of Stratford school, Forest Gate, London E7 on the application for grant-maintained status.

Mr. Eggar: A majority of the governing body of Stratford school was opposed to grant-maintained status, and advised rejection of the application.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what the implications are for Newham council educational reorganisation and case for a secondary school in docklands of the decision to allow grant-maintained status to Stratford school, Forest Gate, London E7.

Mr. Eggar: The first phase of Newham education authority's reorganisation was approved by the then Secretary of State in April 1990, some six months before any decision was made about Stratford school. The possible long-term need for a secondary school in the docklands development area was not a factor in the decision to give grant-maintained status to Stratford school. My right hon. and learned Friend will consider any proposal for a new school in docklands on its merits.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many hon. Members contacted him expressing support for the granting of grant-maintained status for Stratford school, Forest Gate, London E7.

Mr. Eggar: None.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has on the number of pupils at Stratford school, Forest Gate, London E7 (a) before grant-maintained status was given and (b) at present; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Stratford school had 765 pupils in January 1990. I understand that there were 393 pupils on roll in January 1991. In March 1990 the school published proposals for the acquisition of grant-maintained status. These were approved in October 1990. The school will transfer to grant-maintained status on 1 April 1991.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will place in the Library copies of advice and memoranda from Her Majesty's inspectors of schools regarding the application for grant-maintained status in respect of Stratford school, Forest Gate, London E7;

(2) pursuant to his answer of 8 February, Official Report, column 257, if the advice from Her Majesty's inspector of schools was in favour of granting grant-maintained status to Stratford school, Forest Gate, London E7; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Advice provided by Her Majesty's inspectors of schools is confidential to Ministers.

Education Resources

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what measures he is taking to ensure that more resources are delegated to schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon [pursuant to his reply, 11 December 1990, c. 324-29]: We have now received the budget statement prepared by Waltham Forest local education authority under section 42 of the Education Reform Act. The two tables update the figures published in my original reply to include data from Waltham Forest and revised information from Barking and Dagenham local education authority.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The Gulf

Mr. Madden: To ask the Lord President of the Council, pursuant to his remarks in the House on 14 February, Official Report, column 1002, who, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, has made representations to the broadcasting authorities concerning coverage of the Gulf war; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: No formal representations have been made.

HEALTH

Funding, Leeds

Dr. Hampson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much expenditure has been allocated to Leeds from regional and central funding in each year since 1979.

Mr. Dorrell: The information derivable from annual accounts submitted to the Department is shown in the table.

Source:

Annual accounts of the Leeds Western and Eastern health authorities (Leeds area health authority for the years prior to 1982-83) and those of the Yorkshire regional health authority.

Notes:

1. HCHS covers all services directly managed by the health authorities concerned including hospital, community health and other services. Expenditure on family practitioner services (now family health services) is not strictly attributable to districts and is excluded. However, the figures for the years prior to 1985-86 include small elements relating to the administrative expenses of the former Leeds family practitioner committee which were included in relevant annual accounts but are not separately identifiable.
2. The figures for capital expenditure include amounts in respect of schemes within Leeds districts but recorded in the annual accounts of the Yorkshire regional health authority. All other expenditure incurred by the latter authority for the Leeds area or the Yorkshire region as a whole is excluded. Expenditure met on a national basis by other NHS organisations or by the Department is similarly excluded.
3. Figures for capital expenditure at regional and sub-regional levels tend to fluctuate year on year mainly reflecting changes in the pattern of capital investment throughout the country.

Myodil

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a further statement on the Government's response to the side effects of the drug Myodil.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave to the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) on 13 December 1990 at columns 466-69.

Breast and Cervical Cancer

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average waiting time for results from cervical smear tests by region and district; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not available in the form requested. Health authorities are asked to ensure that laboratories return results of smear tests to the smear-taker within one month. A survey of laboratory backlogs and workload carried out in the second half of 1990 indicated that around two thirds of laboratories were meeting that target in July 1990. In those areas where backlogs existed the average processing time was 7·5 weeks.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cervical smear tests have been carried out on women for each year since 1980 (a) per region and (b) per district; and if he will state by (i) district and (ii) region how many are still to be dealt with.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Information on the number of cervical smear tests carried out on women for each year from 1980 to 1989 is given in the table by region. The 1988-89 figure is for 193 out of the 200 laboratories which submitted a return in that year. The information is collected from laboratories. It is not possible or relevant to produce it by district. Smears taken from women in a particular region are sometimes analysed by laboratories in other regions.

Information on the number of smears outstanding was collected for the 1988-89 year, but the quality and completeness of the data were such that no useful figures can be produced.

Improvements are being set in hand to improve the quality of this new data collection system.

Sir David Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made by the national screening programme for breast and cervical cancer towards achieving its objectives; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This is the first country in the EC to have a nationwide call and recall scheme for both breast and cervical cancer screening.

Breast Screening Programme
Between 1987 and 1990 £55 million was allocated in England to set up and run the nationwide breast screening programme. Women aged between 50 and 64 will be invited every three years for mammographic screening. Specialised screening centres are now operating over most of the country and all eligible women throughout England should have been invited for screening by 1993. Figures for those centres operational for the whole of 1988-89 indicate that around 70 per cent. of women receiving invitations are accepting them. A report issued in January 1991 by the Advisory Committee on Breast Cancer Screening supported the current programme and concluded that it could reduce mortality in the eligible age group by around a quarter by the year 2000.

Cervical Screening Programme
Computerised call and recall systems were implemented in all district health authorities by April 1988. Women aged between 20 and 64 should have been invited for screening by 1993 and will be recalled at least every five years. Health authorities must ensure that all abnormal smears are followed up and facilities for investigation and treatment are available.
In the first six months since the introduction of the GP's contract 54 per cent. of GPs received payment for 80 per cent. coverage of women screened and 35 per cent. for 50 per cent. coverage.
The NHS has set up the national co-ordinating network for the cervical screening programme which supports managers and others responsible at local level. £95,000 has been awarded to the network for each financial year 1990-91 and 1992-93.

Abortion

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he intends to bring forward the necessary measures to implement the conscience clause of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I announced on 14 February that a commencement order will be laid which will enable the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority to assume its full powers on 1 August 1991. The commencement order will bring section 38 (conscientious objection) of the Act into force at the same time.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement giving details of the proposed timetable for the implementation of the different sections of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: A commencement order and regulations relating to the termination of pregnancy (section 37 of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act) will be laid shortly. A commencement order and regulations necessary to enable the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority to function fully from 1 August 1991 will be brought forward later this year. The implementation of secton 30 of the Act (to facilitate parental orders where a surrogate mother is involved) depends on certain sections of the Children Act 1989 which are expected to come into force in the autumn of this year.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) when he will respond to the 10th report of Session 1989-90 of the Social Services Committee on the working of the conscience clause of the Abortion Act—House of Commons Paper No. 123;

(2) what action he has taken to ensure that candidates for medical school are no longer asked their views on abortion.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We are carefully considering the Committee's report and will be publishing our response shortly.

Food Hygiene

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he proposes making any changes to the Food Hygiene (Amendment) Regulations 1990 which introduce new temperature controls from 1 April.

Mr. Dorrell: New controls on the temperature of foods during production, storage, distribution and service to the consumer were announced on 18 July 1990 and regulations specifying relevant foods and control temperatures come into force in stages from 1 April.

The requirements are introduced to help minimise the opportunity for growth of pathogenic micro-organisms such as listeria and salmonella. For many food businesses the regulations represent the first statutory requirement to maintain temperature control. The controls are additional to the general provisions contained in the Food Safety Act on the safety of food for the consumer.

I am concerned that requirements are not introduced which unnecessarily alter working practices where there is no overriding food safety reason for doing so. I am also concerned that the regulations should be practical to implement.

Together with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Foods and the Welsh Office I have considered representations made on the way in which the regulations apply to certain foods. I believe that in certain areas it is reasonable for changes to be made to the regulations which would not present a public health risk.

Officials will therefore be consulting interested parties on further changes to the regulations and a copy of the consultation document will be placed in the Library. When the consultation is complete, further amending regulations will be laid before Parliament.

The main changes proposed are:

to allow a two hour period immediately after baking before certain bakery products need to begin to be chilled. Any micro-organisms present after baking would take at least two hours before starting to multiply to levels which could give rise to health concerns. I am satisfied that this relaxation would make a significant difference to the investment required by industry and is consistent with the food safety objectives of the temperature control regulations; to allow certain uncut baked egg pastry products, such as custard tarts and Yorkshire curd tarts, to remain outside temperature controls if to be sold on the day of their production. I am satisfied that this exemption would allow craft bakers to continue their traditional practice whilst still safeguarding public health; to allow an exemption of four hours outside temperature controls for foods displayed on premises such as railway buffet cars, mobile catering facilities, or marquees provided that no more food than necessary is displayed. This exemption extends to these facilities the exemption already available to catering premises; to extend the deadline for compliance with the temperature controls, which operate from 1 April 1991, to 1 April 1992 for some airline catering where compliance can only be achieved by refrigeration of highly specialised delivery vehicles; to exempt foods delivered by mail order through the post or by courier to allow industry more time to develop practical means of achieving necessary controls. Research studies have been commissioned by Government to identify ways of maintaining product stability in this area and further discussion with industry on practical solutions will be needed. This exemption will be kept under review and we shall be examining urgently ways of providing consumers with information on these products.

Other detailed points are contained in the consultation document. Comments on these changes are being sought from consumer interests, industry, and enforcement agencies. I understand that my colleagues at the Scottish Office will also now be conducting a consultation on parallel draft Scottish regulations.

The temperature controls are an important new measure in seeking to improve food safety and I shall continue to keep their operation and effectiveness under review to ensure they achieve the intended objectives while being practical. I am conscious that there will be an important period of education and learning for all concerned in the early stages of the new controls. Enforcement agencies will clearly want to bear in mind the proposed changes when considering advice and action to enforce the Food Hygiene (Amendment) Regulations 1990.

Blood Products

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what steps are being taken to ensure that products of the blood products laboratory meet the conditions laid down under the Medicines Act and enforced by the Medicines Control Agency;

(2) what proposals his Department has to import unlicensed plasma products from unlicensed overseas sources.

Mr. Dorrell: The bioproducts laboratory is not at present covered by the licensing requirements of the Medicines Act because of Crown immunity. However, some of its products are so licensed and it will be seeking licences for other products under the arrangements leading to the removal of Crown immunity. For many years the BPL has been inspected by the medicines inspectorate and its products have been tested by the National Institute of Biological Standards and Control, as are similar licensed pharmaceutical products.

The Department has no plans to import plasma products.

Brook and Greenwich Hospitals

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has received about the number of operations cancelled at the Brook and Greenwich district hospitals during 1989-90; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: We do not collect information about the number of operations cancelled. We collect information about operating theatre sessions held and cancelled in each district health authority. This information is not broken down by hospital.

Fostering

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many responses he has received to paragraph 16 of his draft guidance notes on gay and lesbian fostering; how many were (a) in favour and (b) critical of the proposals; and if he will list those in each case from organisations;

(2) what plans he has to review his guidance notes on gay and lesbian fostering, paragraph 16, following representations he has received.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The responses received on the foster placement consultation document are now being considered. We plan to issue guidance that the interests of children are paramount.

I shall write to the hon. Member about the general responses, letters and pre-printed postcards.

Diploma in Social Work

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dipiomas in social work courses he expects to have been approved by October 1991.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Approval of courses is a matter for the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work (CCETSW). The council's current targets for full approval are a total of 19 by 31 March 1991 and 59 by 31 March 1992. Planning figures for March to October 1991 are not available.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the maximum number of diplomas in social work courses that he expects to be approved.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Approval of diploma in social work courses is a matter for the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work (CCETSW). The council has no plans at present for a maximum number of courses but expects a total of 109 throughout the United Kingdom by 1993-94.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many diplomas in social work courses he expects to be approved in the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work northern region.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work has set a target of 20 courses providing 1,700 student places by the end of 1993-94.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he is seeking a regional balance of diploma in social work courses.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Approval of diploma in social work courses is a matter for the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work (CCETSW). The council is seeking to ensure that there is a reasonable distribution of courses throughout the United Kingdom, and within each region of the United Kingdom, reflecting service needs.

Social Services Departments (Women Managers)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many women there are in senior management positions in local authority social services departments.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information requested is not routinely collected centrally. However a recently published report of the social services inspectorate entitled: "Women in Social Services, a neglected resource" identified the following distribution of women senior managers in local authorities in England and Wales:

Senior Managers in Social Services Departments in England and Wales 1990

	Directors		Deputies		Assistant/Divisional Directors or equivalent		Totals		Percentages
	M	F	M	F	M	F	M	F	M	F
English Counties	38	1	30	3	185	36	253	40	86	14

Percentages	88	12	90	10	80	20	82	18

Note: Not all posts are included because of vacancies.

Women make up 86·5 per cent. of the local authority personal social services work force and 12 per cent. of senior management.

Miscarriage Association

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will now announce the core grant for central administrative costs to the Miscarriage Association for the next three years.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Recipients of awards made under section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968 will be informed about their grants shortly.

Female Circumcision

Mrs. Roe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will obtain a videocassette and transcript of the BBC 2 "Forty Minutes" television programme on female circumcision to be shown on 21 February for his departmental library.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Yes. The Department is already aware of the proposed broadcast and will obtain a copy.

DEFENCE

Night Flying

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the comparative noise levels at take-off and requirement to conduct flying exercises at night as between F15 and F111 aircraft operated by the USAF from Lakenheath.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The F15Es to be introduced at RAF Lakenheath are expected to operate to the same night flying restrictions which apply to the F111F aircraft presently stationed at the base, with an increase of around 12 sorties a month currently planned. Noise levels generated by F111F and F15E aircraft are very similar. It is our practice to review existing compensation arrangements when aircraft deployments change, and this will apply at RAF Lakenheath once the F15E aircraft are in place.

The Gulf

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the adequacy of supply of sunglasses to troops serving in Operation Desert Storm.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: To date some 49,000 pairs of sunglasses have been dispatched to the Gulf. This is an adequate supply to provide one pair of sunglasses to each of the troops serving there.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether a soldier aged 17 years and three months and eligible to serve with the British Army in the Gulf can be required to take part in military action.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Yes.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many people in the reserve forces have refused to serve in the Gulf; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [holding answer 14 February 1991]: Of those reservists issued with compulsory call-out notices 33 made successful appeals for exemption on the basis of difficult personal circumstances or conscientious objection. A small number of reservists have failed to report for duty without apparent good reason. A decision on what action should be taken in respect of these non-reporters has yet to be made.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many (a) British service personnel and (b) service personnel from each of the coalition forces have been killed or injured in the Gulf since 17 January to date; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what are his estimates of dead and injured Iraqi military in Iraq and Kuwait since 17 January to date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Her Majesty's Government are not in a position to provide overall estimates of the number of allied or Iraqi military personnel killed or injured so far during hostilities. The United Kingdom has no personnel confirmed as killed or injured as a direct result of hostilities.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the major producers of small arms ammunition which have been given contracts to replace the munitions being used by British forces in the Gulf.

Mr. Alan Clark: The question of replacing small arms ammunition used in the Gulf has not yet arisen.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many people in the reserve forces, who volunteered to serve in the Gulf, were refused; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [holding answer 14 February]: No Royal Navy or Royal Air Force reservists who volunteered for service in the Gulf were rejected. Of the 1,124 Army reservists who volunteered, 206 were rejected for various reasons.

Call-out procedures have proved satisfactory and the requirement has been met largely on a voluntary basis.

RAF Honington

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has for the future of RAF Honington.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: As part of our studies following the statement on "Options for Change" by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 25 July 1990 at col. 470, we are considering the future of a number of RAF stations in the United Kingdom, including Honington, but no decisions have yet been taken.

Defence Quality Assurance

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has determined a date for the relocation of the directorate general of defence quality assurance.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: It was proposed to move some 1,600 posts of the directorate general, defence quality assurance to Stockton-on-Tees between 1993 and 1995. This project is now being reassessed and I will make an announcement in due course.

Military Exhibition, Baghdad

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if any of his officials attended the first international exhibition for military production held in Baghdad in 1989.

Mr. Alan Clark: No.

Military Personnel

Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many military personnel have so far been returned to the United Kingdom for medical treatment since the commencement of Operation Granby; and if he will broadly classify the cases according to treatment, and identify the regional health authorities involved.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A total of 467 service personnel have been returned to the United Kingdom from the Gulf for medical reasons since the commencement of the deployment. Those involved have suffered varying degrees of accidental injury or have illnesses which could be best treated in the United Kingdom.

One case has been referred to the NHS—South Western regional health authority.

HMY Britannia

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the daily cost of running HMY Britannia; and how much is to be charged per day for any commercial usage.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The daily cost of running HMY Britannia in 1990-91 is about £25,400, including an allowance for servicing work undertaken during the year. Catering and other additional expenses incurred are charged for her use on commercial activities in support of British industry.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on proposals to convert HMY Britannia for hospital use in the Gulf war.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave on 4 February to my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans) at column 69.

Nuclear Warships

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions he has declined to follow the advice of the nuclear-powered warship safety committee in every particular.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I can confirm that it is the MOD's policy to act in accordance with the independent expert advice of the nuclear-powered warships safety committee on the construction, operation and maintenance of our nuclear submarines.

Lundy Island

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration he has given to the nature conservation status of Lundy island and to the preservation of its rare coral when designating an area close by for bomb disposal.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) on 15 February at column 621. B52 aircrews have been instructed to avoid Lundy island if an exceptional emergency requires them to jettison bombs in the danger area off Hartland point.

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration he has given to the protection of small fishing vessels and their crews when designating the area off Lundy island and Hartland point for bomb disposal at sea.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Newport, West on 15 February at column 621.

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will consider a site 40 miles south of Lundy island for B52 bomb disposal at sea in preference to the Lundy island area.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No.

EMPLOYMENT

Departmental Annual Report

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what significant changes have been introduced in terms of content and presentation in his first annual report—Cm 1506—when set against the 1990 public expenditure White Paper; what steps were taken to draw it to the attention of the media and other possible interested parties; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether his Department has any plans to develop its annual report further.

Mr. Jackson: The report shows the wide range of opportunities offered by my Department for training, enterprise, education and special help for the unemployed and the way it is promoting a fairer and safer workplace. Each part of the Employment Department group now has a separate section in the report describing its expenditure on programmes and services which reflects broadly the order in which the estimate for 1991-92 will be presented. This enables an easier read across to estimates than the 1990 public expenditure White Paper presentation by departmental objectives. The report introduces more detail on running costs, more detail on the impact of Europe and an account of departmental responsibilities regarding the environment. The use of colour and charts helps present the information to the general public.

Notice of the publication of my report was given a week beforehand in a written question on 29 January 1991 at col. 466. A press notice was released on the day of publication and copies of the report were placed in the Libraries of the Houses. Copies were also sent to the hon. Members for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) and for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), and to members of the Employment, Treasury and Civil Service Committees as interested parties.

I intend to continue presenting details of my Department's plans in as helpful a way as possible.

Parliamentary Constituencies

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list, in ranking order, the 30 parliamentary constituencies with the most economically active people.

Mr. Jackson: The only regular source of data on the economically active population is the labour force survey. This is a sample survey of about 60,000 households in Great Britain. Because of the size of the sample, estimates can be made only down to regional level.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide a table comparing the plans agreed in the 1989 and 1990 public expenditure surveys on the same price base and using the gross domestic product deflator assumptions given, respectively, in 1990 and 1991 public expenditure White Papers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The information requested is given in the following table. The plans for 1991-92 onwards in the 1991 departmental report are not directly comparable to the plans for 1991-92 onwards in the 1990 public expenditure White Paper chiefly because they exclude the amounts transferred to the Scottish programme, mainly for Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise, which will be responsible for delivering the main training and enterprise programmes in Scotland with effect from 1991-92.

Running Costs

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will place in the Library a copy of his Department's three-year plans for running costs.

Mr. Jackson: My departmental report includes information on running costs over the three forward years and on the efficiency and effectiveness with which these resources are used. More detailed information is published for the employment service in the "Annual Performance Agreement and Operational Plan" and for the Health and Safety Executive in the "Health and Safety Commission's Plan of Work". Other management documents are for internal use within the Employment Department group.

Employment Training

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the effect on those in employment training in Avon of the closures of schemes, under the reduction in the employment training budget, for Avon for 1991-92 over 1990-91.

Mr. Jackson: All employment training trainees affected by scheme closures will be reviewed individually and an alternative ET place or other appropriate outcome will be offered to them.

Hazardous Substances

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the companies prosecuted between 1 October 1989 and 30 September 1990 under the Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations; and if he will give details of the alleged offences which led to the prosecutions.

Mr. Forth: Provisional details of the companies prosecuted under the Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations between 1 October 1989 and 30 September 1990 are given in the following list:

Informations Laid under the Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations by HSE's Factory and Agricultural Inspectorates, 1 October 1989 to 30 September 1990 (provisional).

Regulation 7:—preventing or adequately controlling exposure
Regulation 9:—Maintaining control measures
Regulation 12:—Providing sufficient information instruction and training.

The data do not include details of cases under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 taken solely where employers have failed to comply with enforcement notices concerned with the COSHH regulations.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Blair: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the seasonal factors involved in the adjustment of the unemployment and jobcentre vacancy figures for January announced on 14 February, in each case citing the factor concerned and the number of those affected by it so as to account for its part in the difference between the adjusted and unadjusted total.

Mr. Howard: The seasonal factors applied to the United Kingdom unemployment and jobcentre vacancy figures for January 1991 are as follows:

	Factor	Change in factor on previous month
Unemployment	−68,600	+63,300
Vacancies	+28,400	−12,500

Note: These factors are provisional and subject to revision, mainly in the following month.

The seasonal influences on the unemployment and vacancy figures follow a broadly similar pattern year to year, with January having the most unfavourable influences of any month. The precise reasons for this are not known. It is likely that both the unemployment and vacancy figures in January are affected by the fact that (a) many firms close over Christmas and new year and so temporarily cease recruiting; (b) the majority of seasonal employment recruitment for the Christmas and the new year period will have come to an end by January; (c) the weather inhibits employment and recruitment in, for example, the construction and tourism-related industries. For these reasons, unemployment in January is usually well above the average for the year (and therefore has a negative factor applied to the headline total to get the seasonally adjusted figure), just as in June unemployment is usually below average. With vacancies the reverse is the case.

Further details of the process of seasonal adjustment used on the monthly unemployment figures can be found on page 604 of the December 1990 issue of Employment Gazette. A similar process is used for vacancy figures.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Feedstuffs

14. Mr. Wray: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the expenditure implications of the EC directive on the official control of feedstuffs.

Mr. Maclean: An extra £30 million a year has been added to the revenue support grant from 1991-92 to meet the costs falling to local authorities in Great Britain as a result of new food legislation.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

15. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the Government will set up a national network of incinerators to destroy the carcases of BSE-infected cattle.

Mr. Maclean: Over 80 per cent. of the carcases are already dealt with in Britain's existing network of incinerators and more will come on stream later this year.

I hope the hon. Member does not want to override local planning laws with a socialist alternative to NIMBY (not in my back yard)—LSIMBIMBY (Labour says it must be in my back yard).

Organophosphorous Sheep Dips

16. Mr. Patchett: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the use of organophosphorous sheep dips.

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) earlier today.

Clone Breeding

17. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about clone breeding of various species.

Mr. Maclean: We are aware of the basic research which is being carried out at home and abroad and are closely monitoring developments on the cloning of animals.

The Department will ensure that the same high standards of welfare will apply to all farm animals, regardless of their origin.

Horses and Ponies

18. Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has been able to negotiate improved treatment for the export of horses and ponies to the EC after 1992.

Mr. Gummer: Negotiations are still at an early stage on the proposals for a Council regulation on the protection of animals during transport. We will press strongly for retention of measures which will prevent the export of horses and ponies for slaughter.

British Food

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures are being taken to promote sales of British food.

Mr. Curry: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer which I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory).

Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on Britain's exports of food products.

Mr. Curry: In the 12 months to November 1990, United Kingdom exports of food and drink amounted to £6 billion. This figure represents about 6 per cent. of the total value of our visible exports, and is an 8 per cent. improvement over the previous 12-month period.

Animal Transport

Mr. Conway: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made towards an EC directive on the transport of food animals.

Mr. Gummer: There have been two meetings of officials from member states to discuss the Commission's proposal for a new regulation on protection of animals during transport. As the discussions proceed we will be pressing for high welfare standards which will be properly enforced throughout the Community.

Turtles

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what expertise resides in his Department on hawksbill turtles and green turtles.

Mr. Maclean: Turtles are protected under United Kingdom, EC and international provisions, the primary responsibility and expertise for which rests with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Agricultural Reform

23. Mr. Robert Hicks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he next intends meeting the EC Commissioner for Agriculture to discuss his farm proposals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: At the Agriculture Council on 4 and 5 March.

Animal Welfare

24. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which organisations he consults on animal welfare.

Mr. Maclean: The Department consults a wide range of organisations on animal welfare matters.

Lamb and Sheepmeat

25. Mr. Speller: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he estimates that there will be full free trade in lamb and sheepmeat between the United Kingdom, France and the remaining EC countries.

Mr. Curry: Free trade within the EC and the establishment of a support system capable of allowing United Kingdom producers to compete on equal terms were key aims of the Government in the review of the sheepmeat regime in 1989. These remain the Government's aims during the transitional period before the reformed sheep regime becomes fully operational by the end of the 1992 marketing year at the latest.

Unfit Carcases

26. Mr. Ron Brown: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many carcases were condemned as unfit for human consumption during 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: Inspection of meat intended for human consumption is the responsibility of local authorities. My Department does not at present collect information from them on the number of condemnations of carcases.

Slaughter Industry

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the state of the United Kingdom slaughtering industry.

Mr. Gummer: The slaughtering sector faces major changes with the advent of the single market. I am pleased to note that the leading companies are gearing up to the challenges and opportunities it offers.

Hill Livestock Compensatory Allowances

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on payment of hill livestock compensatory allowances.

Mr. Curry: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller) on 11 February.

Farm Bankruptcies

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about farm bankruptcies.

Mr. Curry: There were 142 bankruptcies in agriculture and horticulture in 1989. In the first half of 1990 there were 136, but agriculture's share of the total has remained broadly in line with the rest of the economy over the last decade.

Mink Farms

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on how many occasions for each of the last five years his officials or state veterinary service officials have attended mink farms for the purpose of inspecting slaughter; and which slaughter methods were, on each occasion, observed.

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 13 December 1990 at column 474. The additional information now requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Salmonella

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what conclusion he has drawn from the statistics produced by the public health authority on the reduction in salmonella enteritidis infection in layer flocks and the increase in salmonella enteritidis isolations in humans.

Mr. Maclean: The reported incidence of salmonella enteritidis, the main target of the Government's control measures, fell by 38 per cent. in laying birds producing eggs for human consumption between 1989 and 1990. While it is too soon to draw firm conclusions, indications are that the comprehensive package of measures introduced by this Department may be having a significant effect on the number of egg laying flocks infected with salmonella enteritidis.

The figures on the number of salmonella enteritidis isolations in humans indicate that there is a continuing public health problem. A number of factors might be involved in the increase in the number of cases between 1989 and 1990. It would therefore be inappropriate to compare directly the human and animal data. This was stressed when the latest PHLS/SVS Update on salmonella infection was published last month.

Food Safety

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will indicate when he expects to publish the findings of the research in connection with the Food Hygiene (Amendment) Regulations 1990 at Torry.

Mr. Maclean: I expect to publish the results when the research has been completed.

Food Marketing

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many counties in England now have their own food marketing and promotion organisations.

Mr. Curry: Comprehensive information is not available, but we know that there are county-based speciality food groups in 18 English counties.

Nitrates

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the implementation of the nitrate-sensitive areas scheme.

Mr. Curry: The pilot-nitrate sensitive areas scheme opened in June 1990 and applications last year covered over 50 per cent. of the eligible agricultural land. Additional applications are expected before the scheme finally closes on 31 May this year. Equipment to take water samples in the soil zone has been installed and deep core sampling is also being undertaken.

Marginal Land

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the Government's policy towards the use of marginal land.

Mr. Curry: The Government support farming on marginal land through designation as less-favoured areas under EC directive 75/268 which gives access to hill livestock compensatory allowance payments and enhanced rates of capital grant.

Riparian Zones

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the Government's policy towards the management of riparian zones and the surrounding farming community.

Mr. Curry: There is evidence that riparian zones can be managed in ways which help to reduce nutrient leaching in surface water catchments and encourage species diversity. The possibilities for encouraging such management will be considered when existing schemes are reviewed and new ones introduced.

Smoked Salmon

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will set out in the Official Report the exact nature of the research brief given to the research station at Torry regarding the growth of pathogenic organisms in smoked salmon; and if he will make a statement indicating when he expects the research project to be concluded.

Mr. Maclean: The work involves measuring the time and temperature profiles of foods in the mail system, the physical, chemical and microbiological status of mail order foods, their capacity to support the growth of food pathogens and how best the mail order trade can adapt to the new regulations. The preliminary results are expected shortly.

CAP

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about current negotiations within the EEC to reform the common agricultural policy.

Mr. Gummer: The Commission is expected to present price proposals, including proposals for changes to the common agricultural policy, to the Agriculture Council on 4 and 5 March.

Farming Incomes

Mr. Cran: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the latest estimate of farming incomes.

Mr. Curry: Total income from farming is forecast to be £2,113 million in 1990.

Deer

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many deer of each species were culled in 1990 in each conservancy; whether they were taken by Forestry Commission employees or others; what arrangements were made for the disposal of carcases or trophies; and what was the income to each conservancy as as result of such sales and fees.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have been asked to reply.

The statistics requested are given in the following tables. These cover the year to 31 March 1990, the latest period for which figures are at present available. The income from trophy fees is not recorded separately from the income from permit charges and lettings and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Deer carcases are sold by the Forestry Commission to licensed game dealers. Individual stalking contracts stipulate whether trophies belong to the Forestry Commission or may be retained by the permit stalker.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Income Support

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security for each region and for Great Britain as a whole how many income support and unemployment benefit claimants have (i) successfully and (ii) unsuccessfully claimed income support under the hardship rules in each month since August 1990, showing those whose claim was in doubt due to (a) actively seeking work and (b) availability for work.

Mr. Jack: Most unemployed people are required to be available for and actively seeking work as a condition of receiving benefit. A payment to avoid hardship will be automatically considered by the adjudication officer where someone fails to fulfil this condition, resulting in the loss of benefit.

The statistics kept are given in the table. The remainder of the information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Staffing Levels

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what consideration is being given to improving staffing levels in the local office network.

Miss Widdecombe: The Department allocates staffing resources to local offices using a system designed to match resources to requirements. The staffing levels are based on the latest estimate of workload forecasts and are kept under review.

Local Offices (Industrial Action)

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will outline his Department's policy on checking benefit payments during the recent industrial action in a number of local benefit offices.

Miss Widdecombe: During the recent industrial action in a number of local benefit offices, the Department's policy was to continue to operate benefit checks normally as far as possible. Of the offices involved in the industrial action all continued to carry out security benefit payment checks in the usual way. The local benefit offices at Camberwell, Bloomsbury, Port Talbot, Wallasey, Stockton, Redcar, Hull (East) and Ilford did abandon checks on quality of work, but maintained all security checks on benefit payments.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether any checks of benefit payments were abandoned in local offices where officers normally responsible for checking procedures were on strike during the recent industrial action.

Miss Widdecombe: Security checks on benefit payments were not abandoned in any of the local benefit offices affected by the recent industrial action, and were carried out in the normal way. Some checks on quality of work were abandoned in the local benefit offices at Camberwell, Bloomsbury, Port Talbot, Wallasey, Stockton, Redcar, Hull (East) and Ilford.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will quantify the amount of money lost through overpayments of benefit as a result of the recent industrial action in a number of social security offices.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is not available.

Disability Working Allowance

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) Official Report, 1 February, column 672, how many people claiming disability working allowance it is estimated will earn below the national insurance lower earnings limit.

Mr. Scott: Estimates for the disability working allowance (DWA) have necessarily been based to a significant extent on assumptions about behavioural changes among disabled people who are not currently in work. As a result, any projections of the earnings of recipients can be only tentative. We estimate, however, that up to 5,000 DWA recipients at any one time may have earnings below the national insurance lower earnings limit.

Pension Upratings

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the value of the pension upratings to be introduced in April 1991; and what would be the value of the pension upratings needed in April 1991 in order to bring pensions up to the same level as if pensions had been increased from their 1979 level each year in line with the rise in average earnings or the retail prices index whichever was the higher.

Miss Widdecombe: In April the basic retirement pension will rise by £5·10 for a single person and by £8·15 for a married couple. To bring the same pension up to the level that would have been paid had it been uprated by the higher of earnings or prices would require an extra £12·80 and £20·50 respectively, on top of the actual increases. The extra cost of such a measure would be in excess of £5·7 billion per annum and would cost an additional £7·90 in national insurance contributions for an employee on average earnings and his employer.

Care Homes

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assistance is available from his Department to those whose income support level is inadequate to meet the costs charged by the residential or nursing homes for the care which is required.

Miss Widdecombe: The income support limits for various categories of residential and nursing home care represent the maximum amounts available. Any additional assistance—for example, that provided by relatives or charitable organisations—is, however, disregarded in the calculation of income support entitlement. Local authorities have powers to place people in private residential care homes and meet their fees in full, recouping from the resident an assessed amount towards the charge.

Pensioners (Income)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the percentages of, and the percentage increase in real terms between 1979 and the latest year for which figures are available in pensioner income from (a) benefits, (b) occupational pensions, (c) savings and (d) earnings.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is in the table.

Types of Pensioners' Income	Percentage of Gross Incomes		Real Terms increase Per cent
	1979	1987	1979-87
Total Social Security Benefits	61	53	17

Savings Income	11	19	130
Earnings	12	7	−20
Total Income	100	100	31

Sources: Family Expenditure Survey 1987.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list by quintile the percentage change in pensioner net income from 1979 to date using standard prices.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is in the table.

Changes in real income for each pensioner net income quintile

Quintile	Increase (per cent.) 1979-87
Bottom	19·0
Second	23·5
Third	24·0
Fourth	26·5
Top	43·8

Source: Family expenditure survey.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of pensioner units receive income from state benefits to the value of (a) 100 per cent. of income, (b) 75 per cent. of income or more and (c) 50 per cent. of income or more.

Miss Widdecombe: In 1987 the percentage of pensioner units receiving income from state benefits to the value of (a) 100 per cent. of income was about 16 per cent.; (b) 75 per cent. of income or more—about 54 per cent. and (c) 50 per cent. of income or more—about 75 per cent.

Invalidity Benefit

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the research (a) currently under way and (b) planned into the reasons for increasing numbers of invalidity benefit recipients, giving the title of the research, its authors, its cost and its completion date in each case.

Mr. Scott: No such research is being undertaken by or on behalf of the Department. A large survey of invalidity benefit recipients is planned to start later this year and the detail of this study has yet to be agreed. It is anticipated, however, that much of the work will be undertaken by in-house researchers and the study is likely to take about two years to complete.

Cold Weather Payments

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what special assistance is offered to those elderly people who need an immediate cold weather payment in order to pay for fuels which require immediate cash payments.

Mr. Scott: Where there is entitlement to cold weather payment, the Department's offices can and do make immediate payments to the elderly who require assistance to pay for fuels. Payments may be made at the office in cases where it is essential to do so.

Staff are encouraged to adopt a sympathetic approach in their dealings with the elderly, and often provide assistance in helping the eligible customer to complete the application form.

In cases where a request is received for an amount above the £6 award, a specially trained social fund officer may decide that an application for an interest-free crisis loan, on top of the cold weather payment, should be invited. Such an award is discretionary and would be considered if the officer identified a serious risk to the health or safety of the customer.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the average weekly temperature in each weather station area used for cold weather payments for each week since 3 February; and how much was claimed in cold weather payments in each of these weeks.

Mr. Scott: Details of average weekly temperatures in weather station areas used for cold weather payments since 3 February are held in the Library. Details of the total amounts claimed are not yet available.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will specify the precise days to which the Prime Minister's announcement of 7 February, Official Report, column 408, waiving the seven consecutive day temperature requirement for cold weather payments, refers and the days to which the Prime Minister's statement made on 12 February, Official Report, column 728 applies.

Mr. Scott: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's announcements of 7 and 12 February, concerning the seven-day qualifying period for cold weather payments, refer to the periods 1-7 February and 8-14 February respectively.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what discussions his Department has had with the electricity companies with a view to enabling those who could receive cold weather payments to use such payments at the time of need by electricity payment cards; (2) if he will give consideration to the possibility of putting cold weather payment vouchers in pension or benefit books to enable such payments to be turned on by the Government when necessary.

Mr. Scott: We have no plans to make changes to the methods of payment of cold weather payments this winter, but as I announced in the House on 11 February, we will be reviewing the scheme in time for next winter, including the operational arrangements.

Retirement Pensions

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the value of the basic state retirement pension for (a) a single pensioner and (b) a married pensioner couple at 1979 and at each uprating since 1979, including that proposed for April 1991; what it would have been if it had been uprated in line with average earnings at each of these upratings; and what was the total cumulative loss as a result of not uprating in line with earnings at each uprating (i) at current prices and (ii) at 1991 prices.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested in part (i) of the question is in the table. We are unable to give the figures at 1991 prices as the RPI figure for April is not yet available.

Notes:

1. Hypothetical rate is uprated from November 1979 using prices or earnings whichever is the greater in each year.
2. Figures quoted are £s per week.

Disabled People (Employment Quotas)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what quotas apply to his Department for the employment of disabled people arising from the Disabled Persons (Employment) Act 1944 and other legislation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: In common with other Crown employers, quotas do not apply to this Department. However, the Department is aiming to meet the 3 per cent. quota.

Benefits Take-up

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list in ascending order the percentage take-up of each benefit administered by his Department.

Mr. Jack: The latest available information on take-up is contained in the technical notes on take-up of benefits, copies of which are available in the Library.

Agency Business Plans

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the dates for each social security-related agency to publish its business plan.

Miss Widdecombe: We intend to publish business plans for 1991-92 for each of the Department's agencies by the end of April.

Benefit Schemes

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of the cost of (a) housing benefit schemes and (b) community charge benefit schemes is met by (i) cash-limited grant from central Government and (ii) other sources by category; and what are the trends in these proportions.

Miss Widdecombe: Most of the benefit costs of the two schemes are currently met through direct subsidy (which is not cash limited) at a rate of 97 per cent. The balance is taken into account in local government finance settlements. In addition there are a number of lower rates of direct subsidy, ranging from nil to 50 per cent. in certain "incentive" areas where authorities have most scope to control costs. Sums reflecting unavoidable expenditure in these areas are also taken into account in local government finance settlements.

The main change since the 1988 social security reforms has been the introduction of the housing revenue account arrangements in England and Wales in April 1990; under these, most rent rebate expenditure is taken into account at 100 per cent. when calculating subsidy, with expenditure in the "incentive" areas subsidised through a cash-limit specified sum. The basic rate of subsidy for expenditure outside these arrangements will change from 97 to 95 per cent. next April; again, this change has been taken into account in local government finance settlements.

The Department also subsidises 50 per cent. of local authorities' estimated administrative needs through a cash-limited specific grant; the remaining 50 per cent. is taken into account in local government finance settlements. The proportion met by direct subsidy was 60 per cent. between April 1988 and March 1990; there are no present plans for further changes, although all subsidy matters are kept under review.

Hostels

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the 22 hostels run by his Department via the Resettlement Agency for single homeless people and the projected date in the case of each hostel for its transfer to local authorities and voluntary bodies.

Miss Widdecombe: The Resettlement Agency is responsible for the following 22 resettlement units:

Alvaston, Derby;
Bishopbriggs, Glasgow;
Bridgehouse, London;
Brighton, East Sussex;
Camden, London;
Cedars Lodge, London;
Fazakerley, Liverpool;
Lancelot Andrews House, London;
Leeds, West Yorkshire;
Leicester, Leicestershire;
Newbury, Berkshire;
Plawsworth, Co. Durham;
Pound Lodge, London;
Sittingbourne, Kent;
Southampton, Hampshire;
Spur House, London;
Stormy Down, Mid-Glamorgan;
Walkden, Manchester;
West End House, London;
West Midlands, Worcester;
Winterbourne, Bristol;
Woodhouse, Sheffield.

The Resettlement Agency's main aim is to establish sufficient replacement provision in the local authority and voluntary sectors to enable its resettlement units to be closed.

The Brighton resettlement unit is to close by the end of March 1991 and the running of the Fazakerley unit will be transferred to Knowsley metropolitan borough council from April 1991.

The replacement of a further four of the agency's units is to be announced shortly, but no firm dates have yet been established for closure of the remaining units.

Care Costs

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average cost of providing (a) residential and (b) nursing home care; and what is the average payment made to those on income support in each category.

Miss Widdecombe: The Department does not collect data on the average cost of providing residential or nursing home care. Last year we commissioned Price Waterhouse to undertake a survey into costs; some figures are available in its report, a copy of which is available in the Library.

For information about average payments made to those on income support I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 5 February at column 133-34.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average percentage of total costs of (a) residential and (b) nursing home care met by his Department for those who are on income support.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps is his Department taking to increase the take-up of mobility allowance by the deaf-blind; and if he will make a statement on progress to date.

Mr. Scott: We have been monitoring the take-up of mobility allowance by people who are both deaf and blind and we have been disappointed that more claims have not been made. That is why on 18 February we started a nationwide publicity campaign primarily targeted on carers and profesaionals working with disabled people. It involves a direct mailshot to carers and professionals, the distribution of leaflets in specialist journals, and radio broadcasts.

Benefit Applications

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average time taken to process applications for each of the main benefits for which his offices covering the Nottingham, North constituency are responsible; and whether the operational strategy makes such information available to any hon. Member who asks a similar question.

Miss Widdecombe: The average length of time taken to process each of the main benefit claims for the offices covering the Nottingham, North constituency over the period 1 April 1990 to 31 December 1990 is in the table. This information can be made available to any hon. Member who asks a similar question. Hon. Members may also obtain the information from the appropriate district manager.

SERPS

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, further to his answer of 6 February, Official Report, column 194, within which heading the administrative costs of the state earnings-related pension scheme are subsumed; and what are the total costs under that heading for all fees, commissions and administrations covered by that heading.

Miss Widdecombe: The administrative costs of SERPS are not separately identified, but are included in the overall figure for retirement pension. In 1989-90 the total estimated administrative cost of retirement pension was £331 million.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what sums have been paid for each of the years since 1986 from general taxation into the national insurance fund to make good deficits arising from opting out of the state earnings-related pension scheme.

Mr. Jack: Payments have never been made into the national insurance fund from general taxation specifically to make good contribution rebates arising from opting out of SERPS.

Management Consultancies

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, further to his answer of 12 February, Official Report, column 441, if he will list those projects for which there is a publicly available report and those for which a report is not available.

Miss Widdecombe: Consultancy reports are usually internal working documents and are not publicly available. The exception is the Price Waterhouse report on residential care and nursing home costs, which was considered to be of wider interest. A copy of this report is available in the Library.

Benefit Costs

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what research his Department has done on changing the balance between income tax and national insurance so that total benefit costs are met from national insurance contributions.

Mr. Jack: No such research has been undertaken.

Community Charge Benefit

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to have information on the take-up level of community charge benefit.

Miss Widdecombe: Information on the take-up of income-related benefits such as community charge benefit, can be obtained only from retrospective data. Information about take-up for the first full year of the community charge benefit scheme can be produced only after the results of the 1991 family expenditure survey become available.

Attendance Allowance

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what guidance is issued by his Department to ensure that those in receipt of attendance allowance are made aware of other benefits which they may claim; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The Department's leaflets are available to people receiving attendance allowance from normal outlets including social security offices, citizens advice bureaux, post offices, voluntary organisations and by writing or telephoning the Department of Social Security's leaflets unit at Stanmore. In addition the attendance allowance claim pack (DS2) gives information about invalid care allowance and home responsibilities protection. It also directs potential attendance allowance beneficiaries to sources of help and advice, including the social security freeline telephone service.

The leaflet which is sent with all decisions on attendance allowance (DS668) alerts recipients to a range of other social security benefits to which they might be entitled, including invalid care allowance, income support, housing benefit and severe disablement allowance, and where to seek advice about social security benefits. It also gives details of the independent living fund. Children approaching 16 years of age who are receiving attendance allowance are sent specific advice about severe disablement allowance and income support, for which they may qualify.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of attendance allowance reviews by doctors, of original decisions by delegated medical practitioners not to award, result in an award of attendance allowance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The information is not available in the form requested.

Information on all successful reviews is given at table E1·02 of "Social Security Statistics 1990", a copy of which is available in the Library. The figures for 1990 are given in the table.

Quality of Service Targets

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will include in his next departmental report the key quality of service targets for his Department and current performance results on each target.

Miss Widdecombe: We will continue to publish key targets for forward periods and results for past periods in the most appropriate documents. The results for years to 1989-90 and targets for 1990-91 were published in the departmental report (Cm 1514) on 1 February 1991. Targets for 1991-92 for the DSS executive agencies will be published in the individual agencies' business plans in April.

National Insurance

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of national insurance contributions is collected by the (a) Inland Revenue and (b) other bodies.

Mr. Jack: In 1989-90 the Inland Revenue collected 93 per cent. of all national insurance contributions. The remaining 7 per cent. were collected by the Department of Social Security.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total cost of staff and administration in collecting national insurance for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Jack: The information is in the table. The figures show Department of Health and Social Security (now DSS) and Inland Revenue costs for the administration and collection of national insurance contributions.

The increase is accounted for mainly by the effects of inflation on salary and other operational costs. In addition, accommodation costs were transferred from the PSA to the administrative vote during the period covered by the table.

Income tax year	Cost £ million
1980-81	98
1981-82	103
1982-83	116
1983-84	130
1984-85	138
1985-86	145
1986-87	152
1987-88	163
1988-89	174
1989-90	183

Benefit Changes

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security who set the criteria for the changes in benefits listed on page 6 and 7 of his departmental report—Cm. 1514; and what consultations took place on these criteria with the legislature.

Miss Widdecombe: Paragraphs 4 to 8 of the departmental report (Cm. 1514) set out the Government's approach to social security policy and its development. That approach, and all the proposals and actions of the Department, are subject to continuous parliamentary scrutiny.

"Next Steps" Agencies

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what changes he envisages in (a) parliamentary accountability in general and (b) his method of handling parliamentary written and oral questions arising from the move to agencies.

Miss Widdecombe: As my right hon. Friend the former Prime Minister said in reply to the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) on 6 June 1990 at column 615, Ministers remain fully accountable to Parliament for the work of their Departments, including executive agencies.

As one of the objectives of establishing executive agencies is to respond better to the concerns of hon. and right hon. Members, answers to written questions relating to operational matters for which authority has been delegated to a chief executive will normally be answered with an explanation that the chief executive, as the person best placed to give a prompt and effective response, will write to the hon. Member and a copy of the reply will be placed in the Library. Answers to oral questions relating to operational matters will normally be based on information supplied by the chief executive.

Special Schools

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will clarify paragraph 17 of his draft circular of 21 December 1990, on the application of local management of schools procedures to special schools in Wales, by specifying the precise advantages he believes special schools in Wales can obtain from delegated management.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I have been asked to reply. We propose to extend the openness and fairness of formula funding to all special schools and to give the opportunity to manage its own budget to every special school that wants to do so and can show that it is able to do so.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Schools (Minor Works)

Mr. Peter Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many bids for minor works were made by aided schools in the Hereford and Worcester county council area for the year 1991-92; and how many have been approved.

Mr. Fallon: In its capital expenditure plans for 1991-92, Hereford and Worcester county council bid for 11 minor works projects at aided schools. None were approved. For work at county and controlled schools and colleges, the council received a total annual capital guideline of £6·8 million.

Schools (Capital Expenditure)

Mr. Peter Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he plans to increase the level of grants agreed for capital expenditure at aided schools.

Mr. Fallon: Capital grants to aided schools have almost doubled in real terms since 1978-79. The following table shows the level of grant available for capital expenditure, excluding repairs, in cash terms for the last five years.

	£ million
1987-88	31·6
1988-89	43·5
1989-90	57·5
1990-91	71·0
1991-92	84·2

My right hon. and learned Friend hopes to continue increasing the level of funds available for capital expenditure at aided schools subject to the constraints of overall policy on public expenditure.

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when his Department first considered whether schools might have to register under the Data Protection Act; when he expects to issue guidance to school governors about the Data Protection Act; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon: The implications of the Data Protection Act for schools have been kept under review since the Act first came into force. The possible need for schools to register on their own account was first considered in 1989 in the light of increasing use of computer systems in schools involving personal data. Following discussion with the Data Protection Act Registrar and the local authority associations draft guidance was issued for consultation in October 1990 and guidance will be issued to schools when the consideration of comments received has been completed.

Major Works

Mr. Peter Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what were the bids made by educational authorities for major works for 1991-92; and what proportion of these bids has been agreed.

Mr. Fallon: Local authorities submitted 521 bids for new major projects in voluntary aided and special agreement schools to start in 1991-92, which would require grant aid of £54 million. Of these, 67 were placed on the starts list and 31 on the design list, involving a grant of £12·5 million in 1991-92, or 23 per cent. of the grant bid for. A further 93 bids were made for projects which require statutory proposals. Additional funds will be allocated as necessary for any such project for which associated statutory proposals are approved in the course of the year.

Secondary School Education

Mr. Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the cost of educating a secondary school pupil in Hillingdon and in each contiguous local education authority.

Mr. Fallon: In 1988-89, the latest year for which information is available, expenditure per secondary pupil derived from information supplied by authorities was as follows:

Authority	£
Hillingdon	1,870
Buckinghamshire	1,715
Ealing	2,145
Harrow	1,740
Hertfordshire	1,740
Hounslow	1,895
Surrey	1,635

University of Wales

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what were the total numbers of (a) males and (b) females in 1989-90 within the university of Wales studying (i) languages (ii) social sciences, (iii) multi-disciplinary studies, (iv) medicine and dentistry, (v) biological sciences, (vi) humanities, (vii) physical sciences, (viii) studies allied to medicine, (ix) mathematical sciences, (x) business and financial studies, (xi) engineering and technology, (xii) veterinary sciences, agricultural and related, (xiii) creative arts, (xiv) education and (xv) architecture, librarianship and information science.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Information for 1989-90 will be published by the Universities' Student Record in 'University Statistics Volume I—Students and Staff' on 24 February 1991, a copy of which will be placed in the House of Commons Library.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Female Circumcision

Mrs. Roe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions for illegal female circumcision have taken place in the United Kingdom since 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Records available centrally show no prosecutions in the United Kingdom between 1985 and 1989 under the Prohibition of Female Circumcision Act 1985.

Jet Skis

Mr. Higgins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what enabling powers are available to him as the confirming authority for local authority byelaws relating to jet skis, as outlined in his answer of 25 October 1990, Official Report, column 262.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Secretary of State for the Home Department is the confirming authority for byelaws made under the following provisions which permit the regulation of jet skis:

Section 76 of the Public Health Act 1961 for the regulation of seaside pleasure boats.

Section 90 of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949, for the regulation of the use of waterways in National Parks, areas of outstanding natural beauty and areas where an access agreement has been made.

Sections 13 and 41 of the Countryside Act 1968, for the regulation of the use of lakes in National Parks and waterways in country parks.

Provisions under certain Local Acts.

Section 235 of the Local Government Act 1972, which permits regulation and suppression of nuisances by district and borough councils where no other powers are available.

Public Order Act

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether he intends to publish full results of his Department's review of section 39 of the Public Order Act 1986 in due course;

(2) if he will make a statement on any interim conclusions reached from his Department's review of section 39 of the Public Order Act 1986.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We propose to announce shortly the substantive conclusions of our evaluation of section 39 of the Public Order Act 1986.

Travellers

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from farmers concerning the swiftness and effectiveness of their legal sanctions against travellers trespassing on their land.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We received two representations from farmers' organisations in response to the publicly announced evaluation of section 39 of the Public Order Act 1986, which deals with aggravated trespass on land. Simple trespass is a matter for my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor.

Firearms

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many chief constables are demanding that every applicant for the grant or renewal of a shotgun certificate provides proof of a good reason for requiring such a shotgun; whether this is required by law and whether he will issue further guidance to chief police officers to clarify the matter and confine such a practice to firearms.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The administration of the Firearms Acts 1968 to 1988 is a matter for individual chief officers of police who are empowered under section 28 (1A) of the Firearms Act 1968 as amended by section 3 of the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1988 to refuse the issue or renewal of a shotgun certificate if they are satisfied that an applicant does not have a good reason for purchasing, acquiring or possessing a shotgun.

Information about the practical operation of firearm controls within each force area in England and Wales is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Practical guidance on the proper and efficient administration of firearms controls has been issued to the police service in the document "Firearms Law: Guidance to the Police", a copy of which was placed in the Library on publication in 1989. At our request the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) has written to chief officers drawing their attention to the guidance given on this matter to help ensure consistency of practice between police forces.

Data Protection

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he has taken to encourage the European Commission to adopt adequate standards of data protection; and whether he has any plans to propose the establishment of a Commissioner for data protection for Europe.

Mrs. Rumbold: We support any move by the Commission to ensure that all Community states ratify the European convention on data protection and introduce national implementing legislation. We have no plans to propose the establishment of a European data protection Commissioner.

Greater London Council

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his estimate of staff numbers in his Department involved in full or part-time work arising from responsibilities transferred from the Greater London council.

Mr. Kenneth Baker [holding answer 19 February 1991]: None.

Annual Report Costs

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much the Home Office annual report 1991 cost to produce and distribute.

Mr. Kenneth Baker [pursuant to his reply of 14 February 1991, column 549]: Costs of £32,500 for design and artwork were borne by the Home Office.

ENERGY

Combined Heat and Power

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects the combined heat and power schemes database being compiled by the Office of Electricity Regulation to be completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Work is continuing on gathering information for the combined heat and power schemes database, and it is expected that it will begin to come on line during the second half of this year. That part of the database which is not commercially in confidence will be available to members of the public and to interested parties.

Energy Efficiency Grant

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he has any plans to expand the energy efficiency grant aid scheme for low-income households.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The home energy efficiency scheme was introduced on 1 January 1991 and early indications are that it has been well received. My Department will monitor its progress carefully, but it would be premature to take decisions on possible expansion of the scheme.

Expenditure

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what percentage of total United Kingdom energy expenditure was accounted for by (a) transport, (b) buildings and (c) other industries in (i) 1989 and (ii) 1990.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: It is estimated that, in 1989, 44 per cent. of total United Kingdom energy expenditure, inclusive of taxes, was accounted for by transport; 42 per cent. was spent on heating buildings and 13 per cent. was accounted for by industry for purposes other than the heating of buildings and for transport. Data for 1990 are not yet available.

Data derived from table 9 of the "Digest of United Kingdom Energy Statistics 1990" and building research establishment publications.

Housing

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has any plans to ensure that United Kingdom housing stock achieves a higher rating on the national home energy rating; what targets he has set for developing energy efficiency in the housing stock up to the year 2000; and whether he has made any estimate of the effect of energy efficiency in housing stock on (a) the potential savings on energy expenditure and (b) emissions of carbon dioxide.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Government promote energy efficiency in housing through information programmes, such as the EEO best practice programme and its current publicity campaign targeted on those moving or improving their homes, including promotion of home energy labelling; through thermal requirements in building regulations; and through financial support targeted on those on low incomes, including the new home energy efficiency scheme, house renovation grants, the local government housing demonstration programme and estates action. Whilst targets are set for individual programmes as appropriate, no targets have been set for the housing stock as a whole, where the rate of improvement in energy efficiency depends upon the decisions and choices of individual householders in the light of their own particular circumstances.

Assessments of the prospects for achieving reductions in energy expenditure and carbon dioxide emissions in the domestic sector are contained in the paper submitted by the United Kingdom to the energy and industry sub-group of the response strategies working group of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change in November 1989, and subsequently published in January 1990 as energy paper No. 58 under the title "An Evaluation of Energy Related Greenhouse Gas Emissions and Measures to Ameliorate Them".

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether his Department has any plans to use the national homes energy rating as a means of setting performance targets both for new build and for the improvement of existing homes.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My Department considers that home energy labelling is an important means whereby individual householders and those responsible for building and managing housing stock can become better informed about the scope for improving the energy efficiency performance of their dwellings. I therefore welcome the initiatives taken by the National Energy Foundation and MVM-Starpoint to launch home energy labelling schemes based on the building research establishment's domestic energy model (BREDEM).

My Department and the Department of the Environment are working with both organisations to help promote the concept of home energy labelling more widely. As explained in the Government's White Paper "This Common Inheritance", our intention is that energy labelling should be sufficiently developed to be incorporated into the building regulations when they are next amended. We are also examining what part home energy labelling can play to achieve energy efficiency improvements in the existing housing stock.

Electricity Prices

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what consultations he proposes to hold with the Director General of the Office of Electricity Regulation concerning the application of the clawback provision in 1991-92 arising from under-provision for inflation in 1990-91 to the price increases permitted to the electricity distribution companies to run from 1 April.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to meet the Director General of OFFER to discuss the formula for prospective increases in the price of electricity for domestic consumers.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My right hon. Friend meets the Director General of Electricity Supply from time to time to discuss a range of electricity matters. It will be for the director general, when he has fully considered the proposals by regional electricity companies for their 1991-92 tariff proposals, to satisfy himself that any changes are consistent with the price controls in their licences.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what proposals he has to strengthen the protection of tariff electricity consumers against price rises greater than the rate of retail prices index inflation in respect of the financial year starting on 1 April;

(2) if he will revise the basis on which the month is chosen for the calculation of retail prices index inflation to trigger the clawback provision for domestic electricity prices in the year subsequent to the year for which RPI inflation has been under-estimated.

Mr Heathcoat-Amory: Modifications to any of the conditions in the public electricity supply licences issued to the regional electricity companies are a matter for the Director General of Electricity Supply in accordance with the procedures set out in the Electricity Act 1989 and in the licences.

ENVIRONMENT

Green Belts

Mr. Brando-Bravo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a further statement on his policy regarding the revision of existing green-belt areas.

Sir George Young: Planning policy guidance note No. 2 sets out the Government's policy on green belts. Once the extent of a green belt has been established it should be altered only in exceptional circumstances.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a further statement on his policy towards green-belt development proposals which are supported by local planning authorities.

Sir George Young: Paragraph 13 of planning policy guidance note No. 2 lists the limited types of development which may be appropriate in the green belt. Very special circumstances are needed to justify other types of development. Local planning authorities should inform the Secretary of State if they are minded to approve proposals that materially depart from the provisions of an approved development plan. The Secretary of State may decide to call in proposals for his own determination if planning issues of more than local importance are involved.

Surplus Land

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the success of his policies in encouraging public sector bodies to sell their surplus land.

Mr. Yeo: There is some evidence that, in general—against the background of the encouragement, incentives and penalties provided—public sector bodies have in recent years been taking steps to improve their property management. However, there is still too much unused and underused land and, in the light of the responses to last year's consultation paper, we are considering what further action should be taken to improve the position.

Community Charge

Mr. Channon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he proposes to issue a further circular to charging authorities clarifying the statutory extent of their discretion in seeking the payment of community charge by military personnel serving in the Gulf; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer my right hon. Friend to my statement to the House on Tuesday 19 February, in which I announced that it was the Government's intention that no service personnel or associated civilians posted to the Gulf should have to pay the community charge for the duration of their posting. When the judgment in the Anderton case is received, we shall be considering ways of ensuring that this objective can be achieved and I shall present details to the House as soon as I can.

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the cost per chargepayer of collecting the community charge in respect of each collecting council in Kent.

Mr. Key: The information requested is as follows:

Community charge collection costs per head of relevant population

	Budget estimates 1990-91 £
Ashford	9·64
Canterbury	10·48
Dartford	10·77
Dover	10·61
Gillingham	7·66
Gravesham	9·44
Maidstone	9·20
Rochester on Medway	7·10
Sevenoaks	6·44
Shepway	14·92
Swale	9·64
Thanet	10·62
Tonbridge and Malling	9·67
Tunbridge Wells	6·95

Fire Regulations

Mr. Ken Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans there are to ensure that the building regulations in respect of fire, when modified, for England and Wales will be consistent with those related to Scotland and Northern Ireland.

Mr. Yeo: When decisions are taken on the proposals for amendments to part B of the Building Regulations 1985 relating to safety in fire, and to the related practical guidance, the desirability of greater technical consistency between the Building Regulations for England and Wales, and those for Scotland and Northern Ireland, will be an important consideration. At the same time, full weight will also be given to the undertaking in the White Paper "Lifting the Burden" that the Government will examine carefully the possibilities of reducing the level of regulation in this area, where this would not lead to increased risk to personal safety.

Property Services Agency

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the Property Services Agency to be placed on a commercial accounting basis.

Mr. Yeo: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave to his question on 14 February 1991 at column 538.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps have been taken to ensure that Property Services Agency divisions other than TCS have all complied with all EC/GATT regulations relating to the actions of the Property Services Agency.

Mr. Yeo: As part of preparations for operation as the agent of other Government Departments requiring work services, all PSA services divisions have been reminded of the EC/GATT rules.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements are being made for the valuation of the Property Services Agency and its assets prior to privatisation.

Mr. Yeo: Financial advisers, appointed in connection with the privatisation of the Property Services Agency, will value the business and its assets prior to privatisation.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guarantees or conditions he is applying to the contract for sale of the divisions of the Property Services Agency to ensure that terms of conditions of service that currently apply to civil servants in that department are retained.

Mr. Yeo: All employees' terms and conditions of service are protected by law against unilateral changes. The contract for sale is likely to refer to redundancy and pension terms, because those arrangements are subject to technical changes. Negotiations are taking place with the relevant trade unions about those changes.

Drinking Water Inspectorate

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the number of officials in his Department employed in the drinking water inspectorate; and if he will arrange for the results of the inspectorate's monitoring to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Baldry: The full complement of the drinking water inspectorate is 26 posts of which 20 are filled, including one by a secondee from the Water Research Centre. Recruitment of the remaining staff for the Inspectorate is currently in progress.

The chief inspector's report for the calendar year 1990 is due to be published in the summer. Copies will be placed in the Library of both Houses.

Sleeping Rough

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will provide a borough-by-borough breakdown of his Department's estimate of about 2,000 to 3,000 people sleeping rough in central London, referred to by the Minister for Housing and Planning in an oral answer on 30 January 1991 at column 926;

(2) on what date the estimate of people sleeping rough in central London referred to in his oral answer of 30 January 1991 Official Report, column 926, was arrived at; and who was involved in making the estimate;

(3) what differences there are between the areas covered by the estimate for people sleeping rough given by the Minister for Housing and Planning in an oral answer on 30 January 1991, Official Report, column 926, and those covered by the oral answer by the Under-Secretary of State on 8 February 1991, Official Report, column 543.

Sir George Young: The estimate given in the oral answer on 30 January related to the whole of London and was based on discussions that my Department had during 1990 with voluntary organisations working in the field, in the light of the findings of the Salvation Army survey in April 1989 of rough sleepers in 17 London boroughs. This estimate was not broken down on a borough by borough basis. The figure quoted by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State on 8 February reflects an estimate made by voluntary organisations in seven locations in central London at the end of January 1991.

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends to ensure funding is available to continue the facilities made available recently to the homeless during the recent cold weather; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young [holding answer, 21 February 1991]: Yes. We have offered funding to the voluntary bodies and local authorities who provided emergency shelters for rough sleepers in London during the very cold weather to enable them to remain open for longer; 470 places are available at present and we are pursuing the possibility of further short-term emergency shelters. These are additional to the 2,000 direct access hostel places permanently provided in London.

Leeds Development Corporation

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has made any assessment of the impact on employment of the work of the Leeds development corporation.

Mr. Key: Between June 1988 and March 1990, 5,241 permanent jobs were created in Leeds Development Corporation's area with a further 885 expected in the year to 31 March 1991. This is a significant contribution towards employment opportunities in Leeds.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total funding for each financial year of the Leeds development corporation.

Mr. Key: The amount of grant in aid provided to Leeds development corporation was £2·743 million in 1988-89 and £8·75 million in 1989-90; £14 million is available in 1990-91 and £12 million in 1991-92.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the record of the Leeds development corporation.

Mr. Key: Since designation in June 1988, Leeds development corporation has made excellent progress in stimulating the regeneration of its area. By the end of this financial year more than 1·5 million square feet of industrial and commercial floor space will have been completed or be in the course of construction, creating over 1,700 construction and 6,100 permanent jobs. Further planning permissions have been granted for developments totalling 2·5 million square feet.

The corporation has published planning frameworks for eight of its fourteen sub-areas. The remaining six will be available by June. Major road improvement works have been completed to open up the proposed new 50 acre Hunslet business park which will provide accommodation for new businesses and allow existing firms to expand. Developers have been selected for three major joint development competitions with Leeds city council, British Waterways and British Gas for key inner city sites. The proposed developments include housing, community, leisure, industrial and commercial uses. The corporation places a high priority on minimising disruption to existing businesses and assisting with relocation. Two major relocation sites totalling 32 hectares have been acquired are being serviced.

Assistance to businesses is being provided under various grant schemes. Six city grants, five sites and property grants and twenty environmental improvement grants have been offered. The corporation's community sponsorship grant scheme is also proving popular with nineteen grants having been taken up.

In the Calls conservation area, sensitive new developments and pedestrian thoroughfares are linking the city centre with the riverside, where new developments are taking place alongside existing buildings for which new uses are being found. The corporation is working closely with Leeds city council, British Waterways and the Leeds-Bradford city action team to enhance the potential of the River Aire and the Leeds-Liverpool canal. At these and other gateway sites, 28 environmental improvement schemes involving nearly 100,000 sq m of planting/landscaping, stonecleaning of walls and bridges, repairs and re-paving works have been implemented.

Leeds development corporation is to be congratulated on its achievements to date and the efforts it is making to ensure progress is maintained.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the projects assisted with financial support by the Leeds development corporation.

Mr. Key: Between designation in 1988 and January 1991 Leeds development corporation has provided financial support for projects as set out in the following table:

	£'000s
Environmental and landscaping works	2,125
Land assembly including acquisitions for relocation of displaced business	11,744
Site servicing	1,588
City grant schemes	839
Industrial sites/property improvement grants	123
Community sponsorship grants	19
Highways	730

The Gulf

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his assessment of the environmental impact of military operations conducted in the Gulf region by (a) Iraqi forces and (b) those forces seeking to implement United Nations resolutions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine: The Government did not want this conflict, but Saddam Hussein's intransigence in the face of all peaceful pressures left no other course. Iraqi action has already led to damage to the environment as indicated by the deliberate release of oil into the Gulf. The Government together with the countries of the OECD has condemned this action as a violation of international law and a crime against the environment. As part of the Government's assistance to the Gulf states responding to the spill we have commissioned reports by the National Environment Council into the biological effects of the oil slicks. We have also commissioned and published a study by the Meteorological Office to examine the effects on the environment should Kuwaiti oil installations be fired. Copies of these reports are in the Library. Environmental factors are taken into account by the coalition forces as far as possible in the planning and conduct of military operations as part of the policy of ensuring that collateral damage from those operations is minimised.

Construction Materials

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the figures for exports, imports and the resulting trade balance for construction materials in each of the years 1988, 1989 and 1990.

Sir George Young: The figures requested are as follows:

			£ million
	1988	1989	[1] 1990
Imports	4,171	4,695	3,570
Exports	1,590	1,845	1,591
Trade balance	2,581	2,850	1,979

[1] The first three quarters' figures only. Figures for the full year have yet to be published.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the figures in each of the years 1988, 1989 and 1990 for exports, imports and resulting trade balance for the entire construction sector, excluding construction materials but including the overseas remittances of contractors and consultants.

Sir George Young: No figures are available for 1990. Those for 1988 and 1989 are given in the table.

	1988	1989
Work done by contractors overseas	1,994	1,426
Consulting engineers[1]	400	440
Chartered surveyors[1]	100	110
Architects	Not separately identified.

Waste Disposal

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to publish advice on the new arrangements for waste disposal operations under the Environmental Protection Act 1990, including the introduction of competition and the establishment of local authority waste disposal companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: My Department and the Welsh Office today issued a draft circular to local authorities for consultation. It gives guidance on the new arrangements for waste disposal operations under the Environmental Protection Act 1990, including the introduction of competitive tendering, and advice on the creation of local authority waste disposal companies (LAWDCs).

From May this year, local authorities will have to arrange for waste disposal contracts to be awarded only after competitive tendering. In choosing which tenders to accept they will, of course, have to consider value for money, but will also be able to seek environmental improvements in the form of reduced pollution and increased recycling. They must not discriminate unduly between different types of waste disposal contractor.

Moreover, under the Act local authorities will no longer be able to carry out waste disposal operations themselves. They can contract the work out to the private sector, set up joint venture companies or establish a LAWDC. If they do not make satisfactory arrangements for waste disposal themselves, the Secretary of State will direct them to form a LAWDC.

The draft circular includes guidance on setting up a LAWDC and advice on drawing up a scheme to transfer the authority's waste disposal undertaking to the new company. Each transfer scheme must be approved by the Secretary of State.

Setting up the new arrangements for waste disposal will be a major cooperative exercise between central and local government. Individual timetables will be set for each authority reflecting its particular circumstances and the Secretary of State's wish to implement this policy as soon as possible.

These changes with other provisions of the Act, will separate local authority waste disposal options from regulation, providing the basis for higher standards and fair competition. They will, encourage the provision of improved services for the collection, keeping, treatment and disposal of waste. Competition for local authority waste disposal contracts will increase efficiency and identify the full cost of waste disposal, allowing rational choices to be made on achieving the environmental improvements which we all desire.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East of 5 February, Official Report, column 101, whether similar allowance for losses has been made in respect of the collection of the poll tax; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key [holding answer 15 February 1991]: No. It would not be appropriate to make such an allowance in respect of the collection of the community charge.

Disabled Facilities Grant

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details for each local authority of take-up of the disabled facilities grant.

Sir George Young [holding answer 21 February 1991]: The new system of grants to private owners and tenants under the Local Government and Housing Act 1989, including the disabled facilities grant, commenced on 1 July 1990. The information so far available relates to the first quarter of operation of the new system and, not surprisingly, the numbers of grants approved and paid were low. A table listing the numbers of grants reported by English local authorities has been placed in the Library. Figures for the fourth quarter will shortly become available and will also be placed in the Library.

PRIME MINISTER

Housing Renovation Grants

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Prime Minister if he will repeal the Housing Renovation Etc. Grants (Reduction of Grant) Regulations 1990.

The Prime Minister: No.

Extra-statutory Expenditure

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the expenditure items and cost of each item which his Government have undertaken on an extra-statutory basis since he became Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister: Spending by the Government is undertaken in accordance with arrangements which have been accepted by Parliament. The normal practice is to ensure that for continuing functions there is a specific statutory authority for the expenditure.

Ministerial Travel

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the total number of international flights paid for by Her Majesty's Government for its Ministers and officials in each class of ticket since 28 November 1990.

The Prime Minister: This information is not held centrally and can be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

Armed Forces Allowances

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what effect the changes since 1978 in the rates of children's allowances, children's pensions and child benefit, payable by the Departments of Defence and Social Security, to the widows of members of the armed forces have had on their combined value.

The Prime Minister: The information is not available in the form requested. For the Department of Social Security war widows' children's allowances and child benefits I refer the hon. Member to the replies given to him on 28 January 1991 at columns 440-42 and on 14 February 1991 at columns 580-82.

As regards children's pensions payable by the Ministry of Defence under the provisions of the armed forces pensions schemes these are initially awarded by reference to circumstances, including rates of pay, applicable at the time of their fathers' service ended. Awards are therefore individually assessed. They are subsequently increased in line with the retail prices index.

The combined value of war pensions and allowances, child benefit and Ministry of Defence pensions for the widow and two children of a corporal killed in service today would be about £276 per week. Lump sum payments amounting to more than £20,000 would also be payable.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

British Standards

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received regarding the increase in the cost of subscribing to a full set of British standards in printed form; and if he will make a statement on future proposed charges for this service.

Mr. Leigh: We have received representations on this matter, directly or through right hon. and hon. Members, from one county council and one chamber of commerce and industry.

The charge made for this service is a matter for the British Standards Institution.

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received over the recent decision by the British Standards Institute library not to loan out copies of foreign standards; and if he will make a statement on the availability of such information for business in preparation for the single European market.

Mr. Leigh: We have received representations on this matter, directly or through right hon. and hon. Members, from one county council.

Whether to lend, as well as to sell, copies of such standards is a matter for the British Standards Institution.

Postage Stamps

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish in the Official Report the information available to him about the number of outlets for the sale of postage stamps, which are not post offices (a) in England and (b) in the counties of Somerset, Devon, Dorset and Wiltshire, and any information he has about the change in the number of such outlets in recent years.

Mr. Leigh: The provision of postage stamps is an operational matter for the Post Office Board. However, I understand that the numbers of non-post-office outlets selling postage stamps in the areas mentioned are as follows:

	Number
England	40,500
Somerset	330
Devon	1,250
Dorset	360
Wiltshire	380

It must be noted that these figures are approximate as the Post Office's records are held in post town order rather than by county and some post towns fall into more than one county according to postcode. It should also be noted that the Post Office's records include all those retailers who have ever sold postage stamps. I understand that the Post Office has no way of identifying those retailers actively selling postage stamps.

I understand that there is no information available about the change in the number of such outlets in recent years.

"The Man who Made the Supergun"

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will obtain for his departmental library a copy of the transcript and videocassette of the BBC2 "Timewatch" programme on "The Man who Made the Supergun", broadcast on 13 February.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 20 February 1991]: I do not propose to obtain a copy of the transcript and videocassette of the BBC2 "Timewatch" programme for the departmental library.

WALES

Pollution

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the appeals under section 10 of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 currently under consideration, showing the dates when they were first lodged; and how many such appeals have been determined in the last six months.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The appeals under consideration are as follows:

Waste disposal licence appeals

Appellant	Waste disposal authority	Date
Wistech plc	Blaenau Gwent borough council	31 January 1989
Brisco Waste Disposal Ltd.	Swansea city council	30 October 1989
Cribarth Waste Disposal	Brecknock borough council	12 March 1990
Max Recovery (Holdings) Ltd.	Swansea city council	30 April 1990
Euromet Ltd.	Rhymney Valley district council	16 May 1990
Shanks and McEwan (Midlands) Ltd.	Wrexham Maelor borough council	21 August 1990

One appeal has been determined in the past six months.

Prince of Wales Hospital, Rhydlafar

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the chairman of South Glamorgan health authority relating to the contract given to constructors TERN to upgrade ward 8 and part of ward 9 at the Prince of Wales orthopaedic hospital, Rhydlafar to the standards required for the accommodation of geriatric patients.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: None.

Hospital Closures

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to debar the South Glamorgan health authority from undertaking any capital investments which anticipate his decisions on the hospital closure proposals of that health authority not yet publicly announced.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer that I gave him on 15 February 1991 at col. 635.

Health Service Budgeting

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what arrangements he has made with the chairmen of the South Glamorgan, Mid Glamorgan and Gwent health authorities concerning a smoothing mechanism to operate after 1 April in respect of the new budgeting system and the new charging system for cross-border flows of patients to hospitals and clinics.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The 1991-92 revenue allocations to district health authorities in Wales take account of the cost of maintaining cross-boundary flows of patients within the new contractual framework. It is therefore expected that the initial contracts to run from 1 April 1991 will provide for the maintenance of these flows. However, in subsequent years, as the contracting process rolls forward, authorities will have the opportunity of reviewing the existing pattern of services in the light of services available elsewhere and the progressive transition of revenue funding towards weighted capitation formula shares. Authorities were recently consulted about the structure and implementation of a weighted capitation formula and my right hon. Friend plans to make an announcement shortly about its introduction.

Fishing

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much of the total grant to Milford Haven fishing concerns has been specifically allocated to indigenous local non-sector vessels in each year since 1979.

Mr. David Hunt: Since 1979 the Department has offered regional selection assistance towards three projects in respect of non-sector fishing vessels based at Milford Haven—£60,000 in 1984, and £75,000 in 1986.

88. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the progress made on fishing trawler decommissioning in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: The Government have no plans to introduce a decommissioning scheme.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Leicester Local Office (Refurbishment)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether the refurbishment works at Yeoman street, Leicester have been completed; what is his latest estimate of the outturn cost of the refurbishment works; what was the estimate for the cost before the refurbishment work started; and how many staff were employed at Yeoman street, Leicester in (a) January 1990 and (b) January 1991.

Miss Widdecombe: Refurbishment is due for completion by the end of next month at a current estimated works cost of £720,000; the estimated cost in October 1990 before work started was £625,000. On 2 January 1990 196 staff were in post and on 2 January 1991 there were 159. The reduction in staffing levels is accounted for by a drop in workloads and the introduction of computerisation. Twenty staff were moved to the newly established contributions unit.

Pensioners (European Travel Card)

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 13 December 1990, Official Report, columns 500-1, to the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes), whether the Government has yet responded to the European Commission on its proposals for a European travel card for British pensioners.

Mr. Jack: The EC recommendation asks for a response by 1 March. We shall be responding shortly to the Commission about its recommendation dealing with the provision of an EC over-60s card.

Community Charge

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many people in (a) Nottingham and (b) the United Kingdom have claimed community charge benefit based on claims for reimbursement by his Department;

(2) what is the proportion of those receiving poll tax rebates in the United Kingdom expressed as a percentage of the total number of poll tax payers.

Miss Widdecombe: Our latest estimates indicate that the number of people in (a) Nottingham and (b) Great Britain receiving community charge benefit is 57,000 and 8·9 million respectively. The latter figure is 21 per cent. of those liable for the charge.

The figures are likely to understate the current position, as some authorities had a number of unprocessed claims when the data on which the estimates are based was submitted.

War Widows

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the impact uprating the war widows' children's allowance by the increase in the retail prices index and deducting any increase in child benefit will have on the combined value of these benefits.

Mr. Jack: The result of uprating war widows' children's allowances by the increase in the retail price index and deducting the proposed increase in child benefit would be a combined weekly benefit value of £22·10 per child.

Cold Weather Payments

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answers of 15 February, Official Report, columns 583-84, in what newspapers and on what dates the social security local offices in the county of south Glamorgan advertised the availability of qualifying conditions and the application forms for special cold weather payments.

Mr. Scott: Offices in the county of South Glamorgan placed an advertisement in both Cardiff and Vale of Glamorgan editions of the Cardiff Post on 14 February 1991.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether the period for the cold weather payments announced by the Prime Minister has finished.

Mr. Scott: The period covered by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's announcements ended on 14 February.

Benefit Take-up

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to publish the estimates on take-up for income-related benefits from the 1989 family expenditure survey.

Mr. Jack: Estimates of take-up of benefits cannot be produced until some time after the relevant data from the family expenditure survey has first become available. We hope to publish the 1987 take up estimates within the next few months, and those for 1989 will follow in due course.

Disability Premium

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applicants in Nottingham for severe disability premium are awaiting the decision of the appeal tribunal.

Miss Widdecombe: The responsibility for appeal tribunals lies with the president of social security and medical appeal tribunals, his honour Judge Derek Holden, who has advised me that his records show that there are no appeals relating to severe disability premium outstanding in Nottingham itself.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Low-energy Light Bulbs

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Attorney-General what steps he is taking to encourage the use of low-energy light bulbs in his Department's offices and other buildings.

The Attorney-General: In the legal secretariat to the Law Officers, advice is being sought as to the cost-effectiveness of replacing the existing bulbs with low-energy bulbs. Some fluorescent tubes have been removed as the installations provide more light than is required in some locations.

In the Treasury Solicitor's Department the majority of its lighting is of the fluorescent type which is more energy efficient than lighting by ordinary lamp bulbs.

All Crown Prosecution Service offices have been encouraged to consider energy saving schemes including lighting. New or replacement lighting installations use low energy light sources where this is practicable.

The Serious Fraud Office has recently replaced halogen bulbs in the lift lobbies with low wattage long-life bulbs. Existing fluorescent tubes are of a variety which is considered to be energy and cost effective. The Serious Fraud Office is considering further energy savings by the introduction of new generation low-energy bulbs.

Legal Aid

Mr. Allen: To ask the Attorney-General what plans he has to make an annual publication of the funding, payments on account, and the hourly rates paid to solicitors by the Legal Aid Board.

The Attorney-General: Details of payments made by the Legal Aid Board including details of payments made on account to solicitors appear in the annual report of the Legal Aid Board. The most recent report (HC 489) for the year 1989-90 appeared in June 1990.

Details of the remuneration rates payable to solicitors appeared most recently in the legal aid handbook 1990 which is also prepared by the Legal Aid Board.

Social Security Appeals

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Attorney-General what are the reasons for the delay for the case on social security commissioner's file CSB/370/1989 to reach the stage of being referred by the commissioner to another appeal tribunal for determination; and what steps he has taken to ensure that adequate steps have been taken to prevent similar delays in other cases.

The Attorney-General: The late surge of appeals prior to the April 1988 social security benefit legislation gave rise to a significant increase in workload at the office of the social security commissioners (OSSC) as cases worked their way up the appeal system. Additionally, the OSSC experienced difficulties with the recruitment and retention of staff in 1989 and early 1990. The case on the social security commissioner's file CSB/370/89 was regrettably delayed in the ensuing backlog of appeals awaiting determination by the commissioners.

The commissioners are empowered to expedite cases in exceptional circumstances but received no representations on the appellants behalf or concerning her personal circumstances.

The Lord Chancellor's Department has been concerned about continuing long waiting times for commissioners' determinations and, following a manpower audit, local management at the OSSC, took in May 1990 a series of measures which have resulted in a reduction in delays. I would refer the hon. Member to the answer given on 18 June 1990 at column 389.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Manufacturing Output

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was manufacturing output per head in each United Kingdom region in each year since 1976.

Mr. Mellor: The table gives the available information at current prices. Constant price estimates can not be calculated because there are no regional price deflators. Differences between regions may be due to differences in their industrial mix.

Duty-free Goods

Mr. Channon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is Her Majesty's Government policy towards the continuation of duty-free goods in the EEC after the end of 1992.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The European Commission has made clear its view that, as a consequence of the completion of the single market, duty-free shopping for intra-Community travellers should cease.

The Government understand the Commission's view, but equally are aware of the significance of the duty-free trade in the United Kingdom. The Government will examine all the arguments carefully before a decision is made.

Mortage Tax Relief

Mr. Waldegrave: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the cost to Her Majesty's Treasury of higher-rate mortgage tax relief in 1985, 1988 and 1990.

Mr. Maude: Estimates for financial years are as follows:

Direct revenue cost of mortgage interest relief at a rate in excess of the basic rate of income tax

Year	£ million
1985-86	260
[1]1988-89	310
[1]1990-91	470

Energy Costs

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total amount spent by United Kingdom consumers, inclusive of taxes, on energy in (a) 1989 and (b) 1990; and what proportion of total expenditure that was in each instance.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I have been asked to reply.

In 1989 expenditure on energy in the United Kingdom (inclusive of taxes) was £42,150 million. This represents 8·0 per cent. of total domestic expenditure (at current market prices), or alternatively 8·3 per cent. of gross domestic product (average measure at current market prices). Figures for 1990 are not yet available.

Magherafelt Bypass

Rev. William McCrea: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the commencement date of the Magherafelt bypass; when he expects the bypass to be completed; and at what cost.

Mr. Needham: There are no plans to build a bypass of Magherafelt within the foreseeable future.

Hospital Beds

Rev. William McCrea: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many beds have been closed in Northern Ireland hospitals in each of the past five years.

Mr. Hanley: This information is not available in the form requested. The information in the table shows the average number of available beds in Northern Ireland hospitals for 1985 to 1989-90.

1985	16,959
1986	15,962
1987	15,411
1988-89	14,686
1989-90	14,154

Over this period, the number of patients treated increased by 15 per cent. to 315,962. Considerable progress has also been made in providing long-stay patients with more appropriate forms of care in the community in line with the Government's policy of ensuring that people are cared for in a way which promotes their quality of life and provides them with the type of care best suited to their individual needs.

Claimants

Rev. William McCrea: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for the monthly statistical periods since April 1990, if he will show the number of claimants in Mid-Ulster who had (a) been issued with warning letters for not actively seeking work, (b) had their claims referred to an adjudication officer for not actively seeking work, (c) had their claims (i) allowed and (ii) disallowed, (d) had their claims referred to an adjudication officer for refusing suitable employment and (e) been disqualified for refusing suitable employment.

Mr. Hanley: The information is not available in the form requested. The following information relates to claimants in the areas served by Cookstown, Omagh and Strabane social security offices. The office in Magherafelt was badly damaged as a result of a recent terrorist attack and records for the area are not immediately available.

Between April 1990 and January 1991 almost 2,000 unemployed claimants were interviewed specifically about their efforts to find work. As a result, three claims were referred to the adjudication officer of which one was allowed and two were disallowed. No claims were referred for refusing suitable employment.

RUC Stations (Security)

Mr. A. Cecil Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will consider compensation for tenants and owner-occupiers of houses affected by security measures taken in relation to RUC stations.

Dr. Mawhinney: There is already provision in Article 18 of the Land Compensation (Northern Ireland) Order 1982 for the payment of compensation where property is injuriously affected by such measures. There is also provision in Article 4 of the Land Acquisition and Compensation (Northern Ireland) Order 1973 for the payment of compensation in respect of depreciation in an interest in property as a result of environmental and physical factors caused by security measures. Claims for such compensation should be made against the Police Authority for Northern Ireland.

In addition, there is provision under section 28 of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 for the payment of compensation by the Secretary of State where under the Act any real or personal property is taken, occupied, destroyed or damaged, or any other act is done interfering with private rights of property.

Traffic Volume, Newry

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many traffic volume surveys have been carried out by the Department of Environment at Canal street, New street, and the Armagh road in Newry in the past five years; and what were the results of each survey.

Mr. Needham: Five traffic volume surveys were carried out at Canal street, Newry and one each at New street and the Armagh road. The results of the surveys were:

Location	Date	Total vehicles
Canal street	2 June 1988	889
Canal street	2 November 1988	934
Canal street	8 February 1990	1,045
Canal street	10 April 1990	1,055
Canal street	30 October 1990	991
New street	30 October 1990	682
Armagh road	4 June 1987	940

Rural Development

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give details of the developments arising from the report of the interdepartmental committee on rural development.

Mr. Brooke: The Inter-Departmental Committee on Rural Development reported in December 1990, and I was pleased to be able to announce on 15 February that Ministers had endorsed the broad thrust of the Committee's recommendations.

Accordingly, I have allocated ministerial and departmental responsibility for rural development to the agriculture portfolio and have asked that Department to take forward urgently the establishment of an advisory body and resource centre outside Government and under the management of a broad spectrum of rural interests. I am also establishing under the Department of Agriculture a small team of co-ordinators to integrate the responses from statutory agencies to locally developed regeneration plans.

A further statement giving more detail of the mechanisms and structures to be put in place to assist the process of rural development in the most deprived rural areas of Northern Ireland will be issued shortly.

Noise Insulation

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assistance is available for the purposes of insulating homes against excessive noise in the vicinity of (a) motorways, (b) heavily trafficked roads, (c) civil airports, (d) low-flying zones and (e) military bases and installations; and in each case at what level of noise the assistance is made available.

Mr. Needham: No such assistance is currently available in the case of motorways, or heavily trafficked roads. In the case of civil airports the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland may direct the operation of a civil airport to take measures to limit or mitigate the effect of noise from aircraft. Where it appears to the Department that these measures do not give adequate protection to nearby housing, the Department may, by order, make a scheme requiring the airport operator to make grants towards the cost of sound proofing the affected dwellings. Questions in relation to low-flying zones and military bases lie within the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many traffic noise surveys have been carried out by his Department in each of the last five years; and if he will give details of the results of such surveys.

Mr. Needham: Exercises to calculate the level of traffic noise have been undertaken at a number of locations in the past five years but the results of these studies are not readily available and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give details of the assistance available to householders who need to insulate their homes against noise pollution; and what conditions must be met to qualify for assistance.

Mr. Needham: No such assistance is available.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the threshold noise levels above which his Department assesses there may be injurious effects on the health and welfare of individuals (a) at work and (b) at home.

Mr. Needham: The Noise at Work Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1990 provide for the protection of workers from exposure to noise at work.

Where any employee is likely to be exposed to a daily personal noise exposure of between 85 and 90 dB (A), the regulations require that the employee is provided with suitable and efficient personal ear protectors, but if the daily exposure is 90 dB (A) or above the employer is required to reduce, so far as is reasonably practicable, the exposure to noise other than by the provision of personal ear protectors.

No threshold noise levels are prescribed for determining injurious effects on the health and welfare of individuals at home.

EMPLOYMENT

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the role of training and enterprise councils in combating long-term unemployment.

Mr. Jackson: The fundamental role of every training and enterprise council (TEC) is to contribute to the regeneration of the community it serves. This clearly includes help for the long-term unemployed.

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list those training agencies which have been downgraded or removed from the new list of licensed providers and approved trainers by the Devon and Cornwall TEC; and if he will list the successful groups and the criteria used in their assessment.

Mr. Jackson: Contractual arrangements with training providers are commercial in confidence and are the responsibility of the Devon and Cornwall TEC.

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what meetings to discuss training policy were held between Devon TEC and the individual TABs in Devon before the announcement of the revised list of licensed providers and approved trainers.

Mr. Jackson: Negotiations with training providers are a matter for the Devon and Cornwall TEC.

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what decisions have been made regarding licensed providers and approved trainers for Devon; and which TEC and TAB members were involved in the consultative process.

Mr. Jackson: Consultations with training providers and contractual arrangements are a matter for the Devon and Cornwall TEC.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursant to his parliamentary answers of 18 February, Official Report, column 57, how many drafts of the South Glamorgan TEC corporate plan his Department received; and on what dates.

Mr. Jackson: My Department has received four draft plans. The first was received on 24 September 1990, the second on 2 November 1990, the third on 7 December 1990 and the fourth on 7 January 1991.

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the chairmen of each training and enterprise council and TEC advisory board in Devon and Cornwall.

Mr. Jackson: The chairman of Devon and Cornwall TEC is Mr. Eric Dancer. Information on the chairmen of TEC sub-groups is not held centrally.

Expenditure (Regional Distribution)

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what procedures his Department has for keeping itself informed of the regional distribution of its expenditure; and whether it is his policy to correct any significant and unintended regional imbalances which appear.

Mr. Jackson: My Department uses a number of systems for keeping itself informed. Regional expenditure is monitored regularly and officials will either reallocate funds as appropriate within their responsibilities or will advise me of any redistribution which may be needed. I will decide on any adjustments to be made.

Retail Businesses

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list in the Official Report the measures taken by Her Majesty's Government since June 1987 which are of assistance to small retail businesses.

Mr. Forth: There is a wide range of Government-supported assistance to small firms generally, including small retail businesses. This assistance includes free and widely available advice and business counselling, easily accessed training suitable for the widely varying circumstances of small firms, subsidised consultancy, help with finance and premises.

Specific measures taken of particular relevance to small retail businesses since June 1987 include:

reduction of small companies' corporation tax rate to 25 per cent. and increases in the relevant thresholds major reductions in personal tax rates which have benefited unincorporated businesses extension of capital gains tax retirement relief substantial increases in personal pension contribution limits and simplication of pension rules

a package of measures to lighten VAT administration: cash accounting and annual accounting systems, and simpler schemes for small and medium sized retailers revision of VAT registration thresholds to enable small businesses to stay out of the VAT net longer improvement and simplication of the loan guarantee scheme with effect from 1 April 1991, limiting of business rate increases for small business owners who live above the shop to 10 per cent. in real terms during the transitional period establishment of the new training and enterprise councils, responsible among other things for activities designed to strengthen local economic growth

Noise

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the threshold noise levels above which there may be injurious effects on the health and welfare of individuals (a) at work and (b) at home.

Mr. Forth: The information requested is as follows:

(a) Noise at work

The Noise at Work Regulations 1989 set a daily personal noise exposure of 85 dB(A) as the first action level. This is a level of regular personal exposure which, over a period of years, may result in damage to hearing. There is a small but discernible risk of hearing damage from exposure levels below this.

Other health effects from noise exposures have been reported in scientific literature. The Health and Safety Executive has sponsored a review into the state of knowledge of these effects of noise and hopes to publish a report of the findings later this year.

For other effects on the welfare of people, the threshold will depend on the nature of the noise and the individual circumstances.

(b) Noise at home

Responsibility for noise in the home rests with my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for the Environment who has advised me that under the Environmental Protection Act 1990 local authorities in England and Wales are under a duty to take such steps as are reasonably practicable to investigate complaints of statutory nuisance. If noise emitted from premises of any category is considered to be prejudicial to health or a nuisance, local authorities are empowered to issue a notice requiring the abatement of the nuisance. Non-compliance without reasonable excuse is an offence. There is no fixed level of noise which constitutes a statutory nuisance; individual circumstances differ and each case needs to be judged on its merits by local authorities. Factors to be taken into account include loudness, frequency and duration of the noise.

Redundant Mineworkers

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many individuals covered by the redundant mineworkers pension scheme have left the Wakefield and Dewsbury travel-to-work area unemployment register since the commencement of this scheme.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service Executive Agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Tameside

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures he intends to take to improve employment prospects in Tameside; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: My Department, the employment service, and the training and enterprise councils operate a range of employment, enterprise and training programmes designed to improve the employment prospects of the unemployed. These measures are available in Tameside as elsewhere.

The employment service is expanding the help available through job clubs; and also has in place a five-point job help package, which provides comprehensive counselling and advice for the unemployed.

In the period April 1990 to January 1991, in the Manchester East employment service area, over 23,600 unemployed people had the benefit of a Restart interview and almost 900 were helped to find employment through attendance at job clubs.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what action he intends to take to improve training opportunities in Tameside.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. and learned Friend has recently contracted with Manchester TEC to provide training and enterprise opportunities in the Tameside area. Manchester TEC is working closely with the local authority in Tameside both through the TEC consultative group and by working with the local authority on its own economic development strategy.

HEALTH

Population Statistics

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the adult population of Great Britain.

Mr. Dorrell: The estimated resident population of Great Britain aged 18 years and over as at 30 June 1989, the latest date for which figures are available, was 42·97 million.

Drug Dispensing

Sir Neil Macfarlane: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list all the professional organisations and associations which have declared support for original pack dispensing; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We consulted more than 40 organisations representing the interests of the medical and pharmaceutical professions on the report and recommendations of the joint sub-committee. Widely conflicting views on the benefits of original pack dispensing were received. Whilst most supported the principle, all had reservations about the details of implementation.

Sir Neil Macfarlane: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he intends to implement the recommendation of the joint standing committee on original drug pack dispensing that pharmacists should invariably dispense drugs in whole numbers of original packs; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: A formal consultation exercise is needed for changes to orders under the Medicines Act 1968, section 129(6). Consultations following the report of the Sub-Committee appointed by the Standing Medical, Nursing and Midwifery and Pharmaceutical Advisory Committees to consider original pack dispensing, suggest that agreement on such changes would be difficult to achieve. We intend to institute a new round of consultation with the medical and pharmaceutical professions and the pharmaceutical industry shortly.

Sir Neil Macfarlane: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he has taken to assure himself that patients' interests are safeguarded when pharmaceuticals are dispensed from bulk packs; and what information he has on the extent to which the absence of manufacturers' details has caused risk of contamination or error.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The British National Formulary shows the cautionary and advisory labels that pharmacists are recommended to apply to containers. These include all the information required by the prescriber and necessary for the patient. Dispensing from bulk packs into smaller packs is supervised by pharmacists to ensure that the patient receives the exact quantity the doctor has prescribed.

Female Circumcision

Mrs. Roe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what evidence he has on the number of illegal female circumcisions that have taken place in the United Kingdom since 1985; what action he has taken to prevent this practice; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Since the passage of the Prohibition of Female Circumcision Act 1985, which the hon. Member introduced, any female circumcision which took place in the United Kingdom would be illegal. I understand that there have been no prosecutions under the Act. The Act, which was supported by the Government, was intended to prevent the practice. In addition, the Department gives financial assistance to organisations which work to educate and inform the relevant ethnic communities in this country.

Social Work

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work has sufficient staffing resources to process diploma in social work course submissions in accordance with its own published timetables.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We are satisfied that the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work (CCETSW) has adequate resources to fulfil its statutory remit under Section 10 of the Health and Social Services and Social Security Adjudication Act 1983. CCETSW's annual budget from the Department has increased from £16 million in 1989-90 to almost £23·5 million in 1991-92.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will take steps to introduce an appeal mechanism against decisions by the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work on submissions for courses for diplomas in social work.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Within the procedures for the course approvals there already exists an explicit appeal mechanism to enable programme providers to appeal against any refusal by the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work to approve a DipSW programme.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if common criteria are being applied in the evaluation of all submissions for diploma in social work courses.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Approval of programmes of study for the diploma in social work is the responsibility of the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work (CCETSW) and all decisions are based on training rules, approved by the Privy Council, and detailed guidelines which were published as CCETSW paper 30, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Medical Practitioners

60. Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many full-time medical practitioners are in post in his Department: and what was the corresponding figure for 1980.

Mr. Dorrell: The number of full-time medical practitioners in post in the Department as at 1 February 1991 was 111. At 1 February 1980 there were 125.

Hip Operations

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which district health authority has the shortest waiting list for hip operations.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information requested is not available centrally. Waiting list information is collected according to the specialty of intended treatment, not by specific diagnosis or methods of intended treatment.

Cash Limits

Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether any changes will be made to the cash limits and running cost limits of his Department in 1990-91.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to the answer 1 February 1991, col. 683]: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary revised Supplementary Estimates, the following changes will be made:

The cash limit for class XIII vote 1 (hospital and community health services, family health services (part) and other services, England) will be increased by £14,504,000 from £14,193,539,000 to £14,208,043,000. This increase represents expenditure incurred by health authorities in preparation for the contingency of treating military casualties from operations in the Gulf (£9·504 million) and a transfer of resources from class XIII, vote 3 to offset partially lower than expected land sales receipts by health authorities (£5 million).

The cash limit for class XIII, vote 3 (Department of Health administration, miscellaneous health services and personal social services, England) will be reduced by £5,000,000 from £734,508,000 to £729,508,000. This provides for the transfer of resources to class XIII, vote 1, noted earlier. The Department's running cost limit remains unchanged at £197,693,000.

The increase is within the forecast outturn for the planning total published in the statistical supplement to the 1990 autumn statement.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Channon: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the main investment proposals by British Rail that he has approved for 1991-92 and subsequent years.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 1 February, Official Report, column 699, if he will give the total rail length and percentage electrified for each country in Europe, and for Japan, and the USSR.

Mr. Freeman: The UICC's International Railway Statistics 1988 gives the following figures:

Road Fund Licence Concession

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what would be the current cost of extending the road fund licence concession to those who are made immobile after their 66 birthday.

Mr. Chope: I regret the information is not available. There is no record of the number of people who have become immobile after reaching the age of 66.

Green Issues

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport who in his Department has been appointed to oversee and develop green issues; how many civil servants have been allocated new or additional responsibilities to deal with the management and development of green issues; and what additional allocation of resources has been made to support programmes related to green issues in his Department.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Secretary of State oversees the development of policies on environmental matters in transport. In 1989 the Department set up a transport policy unit; one key objective for the unit was to co-ordinate policy advice on environmental issues, including the follow-up to the Environment White Paper. The unit reports to a steering group chaired by the permanent secretary and has a staff of 10. Environmental issues have long concerned the Department and resources have been allocated to tackling environmental problems by such means as vehicle regulation and the better design of roads. The total manpower and resources used to support environmental aspects of transport policies and programmes cannot be separately identified.

Air Freight

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what discussion he is having with officials of British Airways to encourage them to send freight to the continent by air rather by road.

Mr. McLoughlin: None.

Noise Insulation

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assistance is available for the purposes of insulating homes against excessive noise in the vicinity of (a) motorways, (b) heavily trafficked roads, (c) civil airports; and in each case at what level of noise the assistance is made available.

Mr. Chope: Secondary glazing or grant is made available in England and Wales under the Noise Insulation Regulations (1975-88) in respect of eligible dwellings affected by new or altered roads but not for unaltered roads. For new roads the noise criterion is that the estimated noise level, within 15 years after road opening, will be at least 68 decibels on the A-weighted L_{10} (18 hour) scale. Similar provisions apply on a discretionary basis for altered roads.

There is a statutory requirement for the principal London airports to provide sound insulation to surrounding homes within a specified boundary—equivalent to the provision for roads. Elsewhere insulation is discretionary but all the major airports (which are largely owned by local authorities) run similar schemes.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many traffic noise surveys have been carried out by his Department in each of the last five years; and if he will give details of the results of such surveys.

Mr. Chope: Noise surveys carried out by my Department in the last five years, commencing 1 April 1986, in association with road proposals, are estimated as follows:

	Number
1986-87	47
1987-88	49
1988-89	41
1989-90	40
1990-91	47

The surveys are generally carried out in order to plan the optimum scheme design, at reasonable cost, to avoid unnecessary environmental impact and, specifically, to ascertain those properties that will be eligible for noise insulation or grant. Those properties eligible in accordance with the Noise Insulation Regulations 1975/88 are notified individually, publicly displayed, and appeals against ineligibility are invited.

Cannon Street Rail Crash

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will include the performance of the London ambulance service in his Department's inquiry into the Cannon street rail crash.

Mr. Freeman: The deputy chief inspecting officer of railways, who is conducting the inquiry, expects to hear evidence from each of the emergency services.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Soviet Union

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the Soviet Government in respect of Yan Satanovsky of Moscow who has been unsuccessfully applying to leave the Soviet Union.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We can certainly raise this case with the Soviet authorities, but in order to make our representations most effective we shall need further details.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the Soviet Government by Alexander Safyan, Solomon Smolyar and Bratislava Shtibina of Leningrad who have been unsuccessfully applying to leave the Soviet Union.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We can certainly raise these cases with the Soviet authorities, but in order to make our representations most effective we shall need further details.

Founding Treaties

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek to amend the founding treaties of the European Community so that they refer to residents as opposed to nationals.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No proposal on these lines has been tabled in the political union inter-governmental conference. We do not intend to table one ourselves.

Israel

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the numbers killed by military action in the areas administered by the Israeli Government, including Israel, setting out whether the victims are Arab or Israeli and by whose military forces they have been killed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We estimate that 11 Palestinians have been killed by the Israeli defence forces in the Occupied Territories this year and none in Israel. According to the Israeli Government, two Israelis have died as a direct result of Iraqi missile attacks, and a further 11 as an indirect result.

Occupied Territories

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his assessment of the number of Palestinians that have been prevented from returning to the occupied territories since the commencement of the Gulf war; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: According to the Jordanian figures, some 2,000 of the Palestinians trying to return to the West Bank since 16 January have been prevented from doing so. We have raised the issue with the Israelis and expressed the hope that the normal pattern of crossings will soon be restored.

Kuwait

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consideration is being given to the imposition of conditions on the Kuwaiti Government concerning human rights, democracy and the Palestinians in return for continuing protection subsequent to the cessation of hostilities.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: It is not for us to prescribe how Kuwait should be governed. We welcome the Kuwaiti Crown Prince's public reiteration on 13 and 20 February of his Government's commitment to popular participation and its adherence to the 1962 constitution, including new elections for the national assembly after Kuwait's liberation.

SCOTLAND

Housing

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the amount of public expenditure on public sector housing, excluding Scottish Homes, its predecessor and housing associations, in Scotland in each year since 1979, and the contribution made by central Government.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The table sets out public expenditure (including expenditure funded by receipts) and the central Government contribution in respect of local authority and new towns housing since 1979-80:

£ million

	Public expenditure (including expenditure funded by receipts)[1]	Central Government contribution[2]

1982-83	421·2	305·0
1983-84	433·6	266·9
1984-85	379·3	225·1

[3]1990-91	603·6	285·4

[1] Gross capital allocations, housing support grant, and new towns deficit grant.

[2] Expenditure directly provided or controlled by central Government: net capital allocations, housing support grant and new towns deficit grant.
[3] Estimated outturn.

Development Agencies

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what contribution the Government made to (a) Renfrew Development Company and (b) Paisley and Renfrew Enterprise Trust in each of the financial years since they were established; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Government support for Renfrew Development Company and Paisley and Renfrew Enterprise Trust is channelled through the Scottish Development Agency. The financial support for the years in question was as follows:

Renfrew Development Co.
(November 1987-January 1991 inclusive)

1987-88	13,390	13	—

Exports

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each year since 1985, (a) the agricultural and (b) the manufacturing goods exported from Scotland to each of the countries in the (i) Gulf region and (ii) the Maghreb and their value in 1990 moneys.

Mr. Allan Stewart: There is no information available on the specific goods exported from Scotland to the Gulf region and Maghreb.

There is no information available on Scottish agricultural exports. Information on Scottish manufacturing exports comes from the annual surveys conducted by the Scottish Council (Development and Industry). Information for the years 1985 to 1989 on the value of Scottish manufacturing exports (at both current and 1990 prices) for each of the states in the Gulf region are given in the tables below.

The Scottish Council survey for the years 1985-86 does not include estimates of Scottish manufacturing exports to the Maghreb region. However, exports to Libya were £11 million in 1985 and 1989 and less that £10 million in 1986-88 (current prices). Exports to the other Maghreb countries between 1985-89 were too small to be recorded separately.

Health Boards (Capital Charges)

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the capital charges for each health board in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The capital charging system does not commence until 1 April 1991. Health boards have, however, submitted forecasts of their likely capital charges for 1991-92, as shown in the table below. Actual capital charges for the year will be included in boards' annual accounts. Each board is receiving full reimbursement for its capital charges in 1991-92, so that the introduction of capital charging in that year will be entirely neutral in funding terms.

Nurses

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give, as from 1 January, for each health board in Scotland (a) the number of nurses employed as (i) nursing assistants, (ii) enrolled nurses, (iii) staff nurses and (iv) charge nurses and (b) the grades in absolute and percentage terms at which the nurses are employed in each category.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The latest information available centrally for the number of nurses employed at 30 September 1990 for each health board in Scotland, by qualification and grade, is as follows:

Health Boards

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give for the last three years the attendance record at health board meetings for all the members reappointed as from 1 April.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not held centrally.

Self-governing Schools

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what was the cost of the Scottish Office publication "How to Become a Self-Governing School—Guidance for School Boards"; and from which budget this cost was met;

(2) if any school boards in Scotland requested the Scottish Office to send them copies of the Scottish Office publication "How to Become a Self-Governing School—Guidance for School Boards";

(3) how many copies were printed of the Scottish Office publication "How to Become a Self-Governing School—Guidance for School Boards"; and to whom those copies were distributed;

(4) whether the Scottish Office publication "How to Become a Self-Governing School—Guidance for School Boards" was sent to all Scottish school boards unsolicited.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The booklet, "How to Become a Self-Governing School," gives guidance to school boards on statutory procedures. Copies were therefore issued to all school boards. Copies, for information, were also sent to chief executives of regional and islands councils and to directors of education. In all, 12,000 copies of the guidance were printed at a cost of £12,510, which was part of planned expenditure for 1990-91 on self-governing schools.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Fur Farmers

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his policy on offering free veterinary and nutritional advice to fur farmers; and on how many occasions in each of the last five years this advice has been sought.

Mr. Maclean: Welfare advice is provided free by the state veterinary service, but I would expect a farmer to obtain advice from his private veterinary surgeon on detailed matters such as the treatment of individual sick animals. Advice on nutrition is available on a chargeable basis from ADAS.

Information on the number of times advice has been provided in the last five years could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mink Farms

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many licences were issued for mink farms for each county of England and Wales for each of the last five years.

Mr. Maclean: This information is available only for the last three years. No licences have been issued for mink farms during this period in Wales. Details are as follows:

Animal Welfare

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress he can report on negotiation within the European Council towards a single standard of animal health and welfare, particularly in respect of the production of eggs, pigmeat and veal.

Mr. Maclean: Following pressure from my right hon. Friend the Minister, the Agriculture Council agreed this month to resume discussions as soon as possible on proposals for minimum welfare standards for pigs and calves. Further proposals are expected on the welfare of hens following the Commission's review of the existing battery hens directive. We are continuing to press for Community measures to control salmonella in poultry flocks.

Animal Transport

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many inspectors are responsible for enforcing transport regulations in the United Kingdom and overseas for live animals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer [holding reply 21 February 1991]: Details of numbers of inspectors employed on this work, which in this country is largely the responsibility of local authorities, could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

DEFENCE

Submarine Incident

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give full details of the incident involving a fishing vessel and a submarine which took place on 13 February; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: At approximately 0930 on 13 February, a fishing vessel in the Firth of Clyde reported being passed by a submarine at periscope depth at an estimated distance of 100 yards. Following usual practice, this report has been fully investigated and it has been established that the closest approach made by the submarine in question was 1,500 yards. Notification of dived submarine operations in the area had been broadcast, in accordance with recently established practice.

Admiralty Research Establishment

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he now expects to approve the pinger designs currently being tested by the Admiralty Research Establishment.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is hoped to undertake further trials of prototype pinger devices in late March or early April. Design specifications for possible commercially produced devices will be issued on completion of these trials.

Crown Immunity

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now give further consideration to the setting up of an ex gratia compensation scheme to assist armed forces personnel who suffered loss or injury but who were prevented from taking legal action against the Crown by virtue of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1949 when it was in force.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No.

Nuclear Test Veterans

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many cases of leukaemia, other than chronic lympocytic leukaemia, and of multiple myeloma have been diagnosed amongst veterans of British nuclear tests since the publication of the National Radiological Protection Board report in 1988.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information requested is not held by the Ministry of Defence and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to review the claims for compensation by veterans of British nuclear tests.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Government's policy is based on the National Radiological Protection Board's (NRPB) report, published in January 1988, which did not establish a causal link between participation in the test programme and cancer.

A follow-up study by the NRPB, to include data accumulated since 1 Janaury 1984—the cut-off date of the previous study, has been commissioned by the Government and is due to be published next year.

We have no plans to review the nuclear test veterans' compensation claims.

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the Ministry of Defence first received representations from the British Nuclear Test Veterans Association; what it has done to assist the British Nuclear Test Veterans Association since that time; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Ministry of Defence first received representations from the British Nuclear Test Veterans Association in 1983. Subsequent dealings with the association have involved correspondence and a meeting in which Ministers and officials heard the Association's case and explained the Government's view of it.

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last met representatives from the British Nuclear Test Veterans Association; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The British Nuclear Test Veterans Association met my noble Friend the then Minister of State for Defence Procurement on 4 July 1989.

Operation Desert Storm

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that the supply of sunglasses to troops serving in Operation Desert Storm is adequate.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that I gave him on 21 February. The requirement for further supplies is kept under constant review.

Decommissioned Ships

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what were the operational peacetime tasks of HMS Cormorant and HMS Hart; and how those tasks will be carried out after the decommissioning of those ships.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: HM ships Cormorant and Hart are search and rescue craft based in Gibraltar. When they are paid off it is planned that they will be replaced by two of the Archer class craft, HMS Ranger and HMS Trumpeter.

Noise Insulation

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assistance is available for the purposes of insulating homes against excessive noise in the vicinity of (a) low-flying zones and (b) military bases and installations; and in each case at what level of noise the assistance is made available.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No grant assistance is available for the sound insulation of properties subject to noise from low-flying fixed or rotary wing aircraft. Noise insulation grant schemes around military airfields and helicopter landing sites provide for the installation of acoustic secondary double glazing at homes subject to the qualifying noise level of 70dB(A) averaged over a 12-hour period.

In addition, where a significant amount of night flying takes place (more than 20 movements per night regularly) the boundary of the scheme is extended to include dwellings subject to recurring maximum noise levels of 82dB(A) or greater.

"Options for Change"

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will place in the Library copies of all press releases issued by his Department relating to the "Options for Change" study.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Press releases issued by this Department are available in the Library, where they are routinely provided through the Central Office of Information.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what alterations have occurred to either operational or procurement policy that have resulted from work carried out as part of the "Options for Change" study.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State indicated on 21 January 1991 at column 103, we are continuing to study the proposals announced last July, including the implications for our future equipment needs.

Scottish Regiments

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of Army personnel in the Gulf are from Scottish regiments; what proportion Scottish regiments form of the regular army; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Approximately 9 per cent. of the regular army soldiers currently in the Gulf are from Scottish regiments. There are of course other personnel of Scottish origin serving in the Gulf in units with country wide recruitment areas. Some 5 per cent. of the units making up the British Army are Scottish, though again, there are personnel of Scottish origin serving in other units. The selection of units to serve in the Gulf was based on purely military criteria and without regard to region of origin. I am pleased to see that Scottish regiments are well represented in the Gulf where I am confident that they will serve with distinction.

"The Universe"

Mr. Ron Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received from the Roman Catholic church concerning the circulation of the newspaper "The Universe" in the Gulf area by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Ministry of Defence has not received any representations from the Roman Catholic church on this subject. We have offered to make appropriate arrangements for the distribution of the newspaper.

Armed Forces Pension Scheme

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will seek to amend the armed forces pension scheme to compensate widows of members of the armed forces for the loss in the value of war widows' children's allowances since 1978.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No.

The Gulf

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the monetary value of the assistance provided by the Saudi Government for Operation Granby; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The value of the host nation support provided by Saudi Arabia for United Kingdom forces is continually increasing. On 6 February we estimated the value to be between £120 million and £150 million, and that it will be around £200 million by the end of March.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will list the targets in Kuwait over which the United States air force exploded fuel-air-explosive weapons;

(2) whether the British Government and other coalition partners were consulted by the United States on their intention to drop fuel-air-explosive bombs on Kuwait.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is not our practice to comment in detail on the types of weapon employed against particular targets. Allied policy is to attack only military targets and facilities which support Iraq's illegal occupation of Kuwait.

ENVIRONMENT

Crown Suppliers

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many contracts have been extended by the Crown Suppliers in breach of EC/GATT regulations.

Mr. Yeo: Some contracts appear prima facie to fall into this category, but the question of whether breaches have actually occurred can be conclusively established only by the European Court of Justice.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what restrictions exist, or he has placed, on the freedom of TCS board members to work for any of the companies which have been the beneficiaries of contract extensions in breach of EC/GATT regulations.

Mr. Yeo: The general rules applying to the acceptance of outside appointments by civil servants after retirement provide adequate safeguards against any suspicion of impropriety. In particular the assent of the Department is required before any non-industrial staff member may accept an offer of employment by a company with which they have been directly or indirectly involved.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment at which board meetings in 1990 the Crown Suppliers sanctioned a number of contract extensions in breach of EC/GATT regulations.

Mr. Yeo: Although in the course of considering future business, the question of extending contracts was discussed, at no point did the TCS main board sanction extensions in breach of EC/GATT regulations.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what legal advice was obtained by his Department during 1989 concerning possible breaches of EC/GATT purchasing regulations by TCS.

Mr. Yeo: In July 1989 the Department of the Environment provided legal advice that negotiated procedures were permitted by the EC/GATT regulations on certain grounds which did not include difficulties arising from privatisation. The legal adviser also pointed out the requirement to draw up a written report of any negotiated procedure.

In September 1989 the legal adviser responded to a draft report relying on reasons of urgency of supply, or incompatibility or disproportionate technical difficulties resulting from a change in supplier. His advice was that none of the considerations given for further contract extensions could be justified under the EC directive.

No legal advice was sought by the Department from any other source.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether the payments made to the personnel director of the Crown Suppliers included moneys additional to the baseline statutory requirements on termination of his employment with the Crown Suppliers;

(2) whether payments made to the business director of building management, Property Services Agency, included moneys additional to the baseline statutory requirements on termination of his contract with the Property Services Agency.

Mr. Yeo: Crown servants are excluded from certain parts of employment legislation providing for baseline statutory payments on termination of employment.

EC/GATT Regulations

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total value of contract extensions granted to PENTOS and Ernest Gill in breach of EC/GATT regulations.

Mr. Yeo: Values of contracts with individual suppliers are a matter of commercial confidentiality.

Housing

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish details of the performance of cash incentive schemes operated by local authorities under section 129 of the Housing Act 1988.

Mr. Yeo: A report on the operation of cash incentive schemes in 1989-90, based on returns received from the local authorities, has today been placed in the Library. Local authorities will be reporting to the Department on the performance of 1990-91 schemes at the end of the financial year.

Severn Trent Water

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the chairman of Severn Trent Water to discuss his company's financial strategy.

Mr. Baldry: As Severn Trent Water is a private sector company, it is the responsibility of its directors to deal with financial matters, within the framework of the obligations imposed on the company by its instrument of appointment as a water and sewerage undertaker. The Director General of Water Services ensures that the company complies with those obligations.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the Property Services Agency (a) has been and (b) is eligible to be contracted to carry out work for the United States air force in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Yeo: The Property Services Agency has carried out work for the United States air force in the United Kingdom for a number of years and continues to do so.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions have taken place on the post of the Property Services Agency chief executive following upon the decision to proceed with privatisation of the assets of the Property Services Agency.

Mr. Heseltine: It is envisaged that the post of chief executive, PSA Services will remain so long as PSA Services has the functions of a Government Department.

Environmental Protection Act

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) when he intends to implement sections 49 and 50 of the Environmental Protection Act; (2) when he intends to implement sections 63 and 75 of the Environmental Protection Act.

Mr. Trippier: I shall announce a timetable for the implementation of part II of the Environmental Protection Act shortly.

Departmental Discipline

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps have been taken to ensure that disciplinary actions brought by his Department have been applied consistently at all levels of officials within his Department.

Mr. Heseltine: Both the Department of Environment and PSA Services maintain central registers of all disciplinary offences and the action taken. This is consulted by personnel officers before recommending penalties in each case to ensure uniformity of treatment.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements will be made to ensure continuity of employment for those persons who are disabled in his Department.

Mr. Heseltine: The Department already operates an equal opportunities policy designed to ensure that disablement in itself is no bar to recruitment or advancement in the Department.

Assured Tenancies

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the average rent of assured tenancies let by housing associations during 1989 and 1990 within each economic planning region.

Mr. Yeo: The available information comes from a survey by the National Federation of Housing Associations which provides average rents for assured tenancies let in each of the NFHA regions. Results for the fourth quarter 1989 to the third quarter 1990 have been published in the "NFHA CORE Quarterly Bulletin", and the relevant extracts have been placed in the Library.

Unleaded Petrol

Mr. Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further initiatives the Government are taking to promote the sale of lead-free petrol.

Mr. Baldry: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) on 4 February at column 40. Since then, we have commissioned a survey of motorists in order to find out what barriers there may be to the further uptake of unleaded petrol. Any further initiatives will be guided by the results of the survey.

Local Government Finance

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment by how much he expects the 1991-92 community charge in Waveney to be increased from last year to take account of defaulters in 1990-91; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: Authorities should have as their aim the collection of 100 per cent. of the charges due to them, and we have provided them with extensive enforcement powers. It is for individual charging authorities, when setting their charges, to decide to what extent to make provision for arrears which they consider are likely to be ultimately uncollectable.

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many community charge payers in Waveney he expects will benefit from all the relief schemes in 1991-92; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: This information is not yet available. However, if Waveney borough council sets its community charge next year at or above £350, a couple who have not moved since 31 March 1990 living in a property of half average rateable value could look forward to a reduction of £395 between them.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the effect that the community charge reduction scheme will have upon Congleton borough council and its charge payers.

Mr. Key: No information is yet available on the numbers of people in each charging authority area who will benefit from a reduction. However, if Congleton borough council sets its community charge next year at or above £388, a couple who have not moved since 31 March 1990 living in a property of half average rateable value could look forward to a reduction of £398 between them.

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to ensure that community charge payers in Waveney in 1991-92 are not penalised by non-payers in 1990-91; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: From 1 April 1990 local authorities were given widened and strengthened enforcement powers which we would expect them to use to minimise the amount of unpaid charges.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what level of grant is to be paid by central Government to the Congleton borough council in the coming financial year; and what were the amounts paid in each of the previous five years for which figures are available taking into account any relevant changes in local authority responsibilities.

Mr. Key: The following amounts of grant were paid to Congleton borough council or are due to be paid:

Year	Amount £
Rate Support Grant
1986-87	1,087,274·00
1987-88	883,317·00
1988-89	710,635·00
1989-90	619,947·00

Year	Amount £
Revenue Support Grant
1990-91	9,277,645·00
1991-92	8,348,987·00

The figures for 1990-91 onwards are not comparable with previous years since the grant is now paid into the collection fund on which Cheshire county council is entitled to precept.

Revenue support grant like rate support grant is not paid in support of particular services and it is not possible to adjust the above figures for any changes in local authority responsibilities.

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on what percentage of domestic properties for which rates were due domestic rates were not paid in the Chelmsford local authority area in the latest available financial year prior to 31 March 1990.

Mr. Robert Key: No information is collected centrally on the percentage of domestic properties for which rates were not paid.

Mr. Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish information on (a) poll tax receipts and non-payment and (b) non-domestic rate receipts and non-payment for all those local authorities which have made their third quarterly returns to his Department.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 20 February 1991]: I am arranging for copies of the information to be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the community charge reduction scheme will only apply during 1991-92; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key [holding answer 22 February 1991]: Regulations laid before Parliament on 14 February 1990 provide that the community charge reduction scheme in England will initially apply to 1991-92 and 1992-93.

St. James's Park

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the contract was placed for the rehabilitation of the lake in St. James's park; when the work was scheduled to finish; and on what date it is now expected to be fully completed.

Sir George Young: The contract for the rehabilitation of the lake was placed on 29 October 1990. The work was scheduled to finish on 29 March 1991, and is expected to be completed on about 12 April.

Bathing Beaches

Mr. Higgins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will approve a byelaw under the Public Health Act 1936 to designate beaches in Worthing as bathing beaches.

Mr. Trippier: Worthing is already a designated bathing water under the European Community Bathing Water Directive and has met European standards for the past two years.

Fish

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the numbers of species of fish in the United Kingdom's coastal waters, and if he will list those species which are largely dependent upon estuaries for breeding and migration purposes.

Mr. Curry: I have been asked to reply.

There are about 125 species of fin fish in United Kingdom coastal waters of which about half are of interest to fishermen. Leaving aside the non-commercial fish species, the species which take advantage of estuarine conditions at some stage in their lifecycle are bass, flounder, herring, sprat, eel, smelt, salmonids, mullet species and sandeel species.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

East Timor

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he is making to the Indonesian Government on the torture and ill-treatment of prisoners in East Timor.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: As my hon. Friend the then Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs informed the hon. Lady in reply to her question of 29 March 1990, column 289, the Indonesian authorities are well aware of our views on the need to respect human rights.

Iran

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Iran about executions in the past year; and what representations he has made on the assassination of Dr. Kazem Rajavi.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We remain concerned at the high level of executions in Iran. We have made clear to the Iranian Government that we expect them to respond promptly to all the allegations made in the reports of the United Nations special representative on human rights in Iran, including those relating to executions.

We have not raised with the Iranian Government the case of Dr. Rajavi, which is still under investigation in Switzerland.

Kenya

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he is making to the Kenyan Government on behalf of the British citizens of Asian origin who face difficulties with visa and entry regulations for that country.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Immigration procedures for entry into Kenya are a matter for the Kenyan Government. We make regular representations to the Kenyan Government on this issue in London and through our High Commission in Nairobi.

Arab and Islamic States

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what meetings or telephone conversations he or ministers in his Department have had with Ministers or officials from foreign ministries in Arab and Islamic states since 15 January; and what matters have been addressed in each case.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and officials of this Department have been in touch with Ministers and senior officials of almost all Arab and Islamic countries since 15 January. A very wide range of bilateral, regional and internal matters has been discussed, including the Gulf crisis. The great majority of Arab and Islamic Governments firmly support the United Nations resolutions on the Gulf and the requirement for Saddam Hussein to withdraw all his forces immediately and unconditionally from Kuwait.

Yugoslavia

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what advice he is giving tour operators and individuals over the safety of holidaymaking in Yugoslavia in the current year.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Our current advice is that we see no reason to discourage travel to Yugoslavia. We point out, however, that there have been localised disturbances in Kosovo and in parts of Croatia, Bosnia and Herzegovina. British nationals are also advised to avoid the area of Knin where there have been blockades on roads and railways. Visitors staying longer than one month are advised to register with the British consulates in Belgrade, Zagreb, Split or Dubrovnik.

We are continually reviewing travel advice for all countries.

Security Policy

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library a copy of the speech he made to the European Foreign Affairs Council on European security policy.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs set out our views on European security policy in his Churchill memorial lecture on 19 February, and in his speech in Berlin on 10 December. Copies are available in the Library.

Israel

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many times the United States of America and the United Kingdom have vetoed proposed resolutions regarding sanctions against Israel in the United Nations Security Council.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: None.

The Gulf

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he or his officials have had any meetings this year with members of (a) Kuwait and (b) Iraqi opposition political parties.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: British diplomats in Saudi Arabia have kept in close touch with all strands of Kuwaiti society as represented, for example, at the Kuwait national conference held in Jedda on 13-15 October. Officials in London have held a number of meetings with the members of a variety of Iraqi groups.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the effect of the deployment of Patriot missiles in the Occupied Territories on the cohesion of the coalition against Iraq.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The coalition against Iraq remains firm. The deployment of Patriot missile launchers in defence of Israel is a matter for the Israeli Government.

The Gulf (Birds)

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance he has given to efforts to save birdlife in the Gulf area; and if he will make a statement on progress with these efforts.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) on 15 February at col. 609. The main aim of the visit of the RSPCA team to the Gulf was to train local volunteers in the techniques of cleaning oil-contaminated seabirds. Nevertheless, the RSPCA team treated more than 500 birds in Saudi Arabia during their time there.

Hong Kong

Mr. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his estimate of the number of managerial and professional persons resident in Hong Kong in each of the past five years; and if he will make a statement on his current assessment of the likelihood of a drain of managerial and professional persons from Hong Kong.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 20 February 1991]: The Hong Kong Government estimate that the number of managerial and professional people (including administrative and technical personnel) resident in Hong Kong in each of the past five years was:

	Number
1986	262,000
1987	279,000
1988	302,000
1989	318,000
1990	328,000

The Hong Kong Government estimate that the number of emigrants who fall into these categories in each of the past five years was as follows:

	Number
1986	2,600
1987	7,400
1988	11,200
1989	9,800
1990	14,500

The Hong Kong Government believe that, despite loss through emigration, the number of highly educated and professionally skilled persons in Hong Kong should not fall in future years if the present trend of local young people graduating overseas continues. Furthermore, Hong Kong's own tertiary institutions are rapidly expanding their output of new graduates. The figures are:

	Number
1986	2,800
1987	3,000
1988	3,600
1989	4,300
1990	5,000

It is estimated that by 1996 Hong Kong will be producing over 17,000 new first degree graduates per year.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Geography

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list and give the reasons for his alterations to the recommendations of the geography working group and the National Curriculum Council's consultation report on geography.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend published a draft statutory order for geography on 14 January together with draft attainment targets and programmes of study. At that time he published a statement giving his reasons for making changes to the documents, as he was required to do by the Education Reform Act. Copies of the drafts and the statement of reasons were placed in the Library. I shall send a copy of the texts to my hon. Friend.

Chief Inspector of Schools

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will consider candidates for appointment to the post of chief inspector of schools from outside Her Majesty's inspectorate.

Mr. Eggar: The new senior chief inspector will be appointed after an open competition organised by the Civil Service Commission. External and internal candidates have already applied, and the post will shortly be readvertised to increase the field from which the appointment can be made.

Teacher Training Institutions

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to reform teacher training institutions to take account of the Education Reform Act 1988.

Mr. Fallon: The Secretary of State already requires teacher training institutions to take account of the Act. The revised course approval criteria, which have been in effect since 1 January 1990, reflect the changing needs of schools, including the demands of the national curriculum. The Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education advises the Secretary of State on whether courses satisfy the criteria. It is keeping the criteria under review and will be offering my right hon. and learned Friend their advice on possible changes to them later this year.

Schools Inspectorate

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has for the reorganisation of Her Majesty's inspectorate of the Education Reform Act 1988.

Mr. Eggar: The senior chief inspector regularly undertakes reviews of all aspects of the organisation of Her Majesty's inspectorate of schools, within the arrangements applying to the DES as a whole. Such reviews take account of major changes and developments in the education system, for example, the Education Reform Act 1988 and along with the rest of the Department's arrangements are subject to the Secretary of State's oversight and agreements.

Higher Education

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much it cost to run the higher education section of Her Majesty's inspectorate in the last financial year; what the projected outturn is for the current year; and what the planned expenditure is for 1992.

Mr. Alan Howarth: All Her Majesty's inspectorate undertake a range of duties. In 1989-90, the manpower devoted to higher education inspection and reporting was the equivalent of 40 Her Majesty's inspectorate. The inspectorate's total budget in 1989-90 was £25 million and on a pro-rata basis, the cost of higher education inspection was £2·1 million.

The expected outturn for the current financial year is £2·3 million and for 1991-92 is £2·5 million.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the number of reports on higher educational institutions and courses completed by Her Majesty's inspectorate categorised by length of time between inspection and publication; and if he will state the average time taken between inspection and publication for Her Majesty's inspectorate reports on higher education.

Mr. Alan Howarth: In 1990 Her Majesty's inspectorate published reports on 105 higher education institutions and 13 higher education surveys. The length of time taken between inspection and the publication of these reports is as shown:

Months	Reports
3	15
4	14
5	31
6	20
7	17

The average time taken between inspection and publication is five months.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what consultations he has recently undertaken with regard to the future structure and funding of higher education and the future system of student support;

(2) what proposals he is considering to award state scholarships to cover the costs of tuition fees for undergraduates; and what consideration has been given to making students personally liable for the costs of tuition fees.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. and learned Friend and I are listening with interest to the continuing debate about the future structure and funding of higher education. We do not rule out some changes over time, but these would require primary legislation for which the Government have no plans. Nor do we plan any change in the arrangements whereby standard fees are met from public funds for the great majority of students who are eligible for an award.

Correspondence

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what targets his Department works to in answering letters (a) from hon. Members and (b) from the general public.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Department aims to reply to correspondence (a) within three weeks, and (b) within four weeks of the date of receipt; and to provide an interim reply when a delay is anticipated, for instance in the large number of cases which require an inquiry of an outside body.

Canterbury Estate, Bradford

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) to whom his Minister of State referred material he received from tenants during his visit to the Canterbury estate;

(2) what recommendations his Minister of State made following his visit to the Canterbury estate in Bradford on 15 February; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: As Minister with special responsibility for Leeds and Bradford the purpose of my recent visit to the Canterbury estate was to acquaint myself better with that part of the task force area. I have referred the material with which I was presented by some residents to the task force, which will be following up the issues raised.

Teachers' Pay

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will state, for each table in the written evidence given by his Department in the autumn of 1989 to the Interim Advisory Committee on School Teachers' Pay and Conditions (i) when those figures or statistics have been or will be otherwise published, (ii) the name or type of the relevant publication, (iii) the earliest date when the figures or statistics shown in the table were available for use, and (iv) whether the figures or statistics shown in the table were specially prepared in connection with the preparation of evidence to the committee;

(2) if he will list the publications containing figures and statistics relevant to the consideration of changes in the remuneration and other conditions of employment of school teachers which he expects his Department to publish before the autumn of 1991, in each case stating the expected month of publication;

(3) if he will state, for each table in the written evidence given by his Department in the autumn of 1990 to the Interim Advisory Committee on School Teachers' Pay and Conditions (i) when those figures or statistics have been or will be otherwise published, (ii) the name or type of the relevant publication, (iii) the earliest date when the figures or statistics shown in the table were available for use, and (iv) whether the figures or statistics shown in the table were specially prepared in connection with the preparation of evidence to the committee.

Mr. Eggar: I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Vocational Education

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will institute a study into the (a) funding problems, (b) viability problems and (c) survival rates in workshop-based vocational educational courses in colleges of higher education; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: No.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the number of schools for each education authority which have applied for grant-maintained status and the number which have expressed to his Department or to the Grant Maintained Schools Trust an interest in so doing.

Mr. Eggar: The table gives the number of schools within each education authority which (a) have been approved for GM status; (b) have published GM proposals on which decisions are pending; (c) are preparing GM proposals following a ballot in favour of seeking GM status; and (d) are holding or are committed to holding a ballot.

Many other schools are considering whether to seek GM status. In the last four months we have sent out on request about 80,000 copies of our explanatory leaflet for parents "Grant-Maintained Schools: Questions Parents Ask".

School Governors and Managers

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what grants have been made to the National Association of Governors and Managers and for what purposes in the last two years.

Mr. Fallon: The Department contributed £8,000 per annum in 1988-89 and 1989-90 towards the cost of improving the association's administration; up to £40,000 is available in the current year in support of longer term restructuring to enable it to become an effective national organisation.

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report the number of governors of local authority maintained schools there are in England; and if he will give the membership of the National Association of Governors and Managers.

Mr. Fallon: There are an estimated 300,000 governors in local education authority maintained schools. Approximately 3,000 individuals and 480 governing bodies are members of the National Association of Governors and Managers.

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what meetings have been held in recent months between Ministers and officials of his Department and representatives of the National Association of Governors and Managers; and who represented the National Association of Governors and Managers.

Mr. Fallon: There have been no ministerial meetings with the National Association of Governors and Managers in recent months. Officials have met members of the association's national executive on a number of occasions.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will indicate for Kent county council its ranking for the last 10 years in spending per pupil on school education as against other local education authorities.

Mr. Fallon: The available information is shown in the table.

Year	Number of LEAs for which information is available[1]	Kent LEA rank[2] Primary	Secondary
1979-80	96	84	61
1980-81	96	94	81

1987-88	97	[3]87	86
1988-89	93	[3]93	91

Notes to table:

[1]The rankings relate to authorities in England for which data is available, and are based on authorities' expenditure and pupil number returns to the relevant Government Departments. 1988-89 is the latest year for which data is available.

[2]The rankings relate to net institutional spending in primary schools and secondary schools, including the cost of salaries and wages, premises, and certain supplies and services. The cost of school meals, central administration and the financing of capital expenditure is not included. The highest spending authority is ranked as 1.

[3]From 1987-88, separate information is not available for nursery and primary schools, and the rankings relate to spending in all such schools.

Kent County Council

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has received details of the draft Kent county council budget for 1991-92; and if he will indicate the standard spending assessment.

Mr. Fallon: The education component of Kent county council's standard spending assessment for 1991-92 is £533·3 million. My right hon. and learned Friend has received no details of the council's draft education budget.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set up an investigation into the quality of the education provided in Kent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to do so.

Education Authority Spending

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table showing for each education authority in England and Wales the latest information available on spending per pupil on school education, ordered by that spending.

Mr. Fallon: The available information for England is shown in the tables. Information for Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

[1] Net institutional spending includes the cost of salaries and wages, premises and certain other supplies and services. The cost of school meals, central administration, and the financing of capital expenditure is not included.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Interest Rates

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in sterling, how much Germany's contribution to (a) the United Kingdom, and (b) the allied coalition for the Gulf war has been reduced as a result of the increase in interest rates by the Bundesbank.

Mr. Mellor: It is not possible to distinguish the effect of the increase in interest rates by the Bundesbank from other factors affecting the sterling-deutschmark and dollar-deutschmark exchange rates and thus the sterling and dollar values of Germany's financial contributions.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the cost to business of each 1 per cent. increase in interest rates.

Mr. Maples: The calculation of such costs is inevitably fairly approximate. But a one percentage point rise in interest rates may directly increase industrial and commercial companies' gross costs by £½–¾ billion a year. A 1 per cent. rise in wages may increase costs by about £1¾ billion a year.

TESSAs

Mr. French: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much the total level of personal savings has risen since the introduction of TESSAs.

Mr. Maude: TESSAs are proving to be very successful and are undoubtedly helping to encourage a climate of thrift. Any estimate of their effect on the overall level of personal savings would be speculative.

Swap Deals (Hong Kong)

Mr. Beith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the impact on the British banking system of the decision of the Hong Kong Government that swap deals entered into by the Mass Transit Railway may not be valid and will now be validated by retrospective legislation.

Mr. Maples: This is a matter for the Hong Kong Government. It will have no impact on the British banking system.

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what studies Her Majesty's Treasury has made of the effect on the overall revenue from capital gains taxation of reducing the rate; and whether he will consider the results of studies undertaken in the United States of America.

Mr. Maude: Estimates of the effect of changes in capital gains tax rates allow for likely implications for the volume of disposals. If rates were reduced, the volume would be expected to increase, but not to the point where there would be an overall rise in tax receipts. Some studies in the United States have suggested that reductions there in the rate of capital gains tax might, for a period, increase tax receipts, but the results are the subject of considerable debate and other studies have suggested that any increase in revenue would be short-term and would quickly be followed by a fall in tax receipts. In any event, studies in the United States are not of direct relevance to the United Kingdom, because of differences between the two countries' tax regimes. In particular, most of those paying tax on capital gains in the United States would be below the annual exemption (for which there is no United States equivalent) in the United Kingdom, and, for the remainder, indexation relief means that the tax liability on gains would commonly be substantially less in the United Kingdom than in the United States. Limitations on data would make it difficult to replicate the United States studies in the United Kingdom.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much VAT was paid per annum by a family consisting of a married man on (a) half of, (b) three quarters of, (c) twice and (d) three times average male earnings, his wife and two children in 1978-79; and what is the most recent estimate.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Reliable estimates cannot be made outside the range of three quarters to one and a half times average male earnings. For estimates within this range, I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on 17 January 1991 at column 560.

Excise Duty

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the impact of indexation of excise duties by product on (a) inflation and (b) revenues in 1991-92 and a full year.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The impact of indexation of excise duties by product on the retail prices index and revenues in 1991-92 and a full year are as follows:

Duty Item	Retail price index per cent.	Revenue yield 1991-92 £ million	Revenue yield full year £ million
Tobacco	0·20	445	515
Petrol	0·16	715	795

[1] Negligible.

Saving Ratio

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect on the saving ratio of reduced borrowing and additional savings in recent periods.

Mr. Maples: The personal sector saving ratio has risen from 4½ per cent. in the third quarter of 1988 to nearly 9 per cent. in the third quarter of 1990. Over this period, the year-on-year growth rate of real consumers' expenditure has fallen from nearly 7 per cent. to just over 2 per cent., while the growth of personal sector borrowing has fallen from over 22 per cent. to 13 per cent.

Recycling

Mr. Janman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consideration he has given to tax incentives to encourage industry to engage in recycling.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 22 February 1991]: I cannot anticipate my right hon. Friend's Budget statement.

Members of the European Parliament

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will introduce legislation to ensure that Members of the European Parliament representing the United Kingdom are subject to tax on office and travel allowances in a manner identical to hon. Members of this House.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 21 February 1991]: The European Court of Justice ruled in 1981 that expenses allowances paid by the European Parliament to its Members are not liable to United Kingdom tax.

ENERGY

Electricity Supply, East Midlands

11. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish a report on the electricity supply crisis in the east midlands which resulted from the severe weather conditions of 8 December 1990.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: East Midlands Electricity is preparing a report which is expected to be available during April. A copy of the report will be placed in the Library of the House in due course.

Gas Industry (Competition)

13. Sir David Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next plans to meet the chairman of British Gas to discuss competition in the gas industry.

Mr. Wakeham: I meet the chairman of British Gas from time to time to discuss a range of issues.

23. Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next plans to meet the Director General of OFGAS to discuss competition in the gas industry.

Mr. Wakeham: I meet the Director General of Gas Supply from time to time to discuss a range of issues.

Non-fossil Fuel Obligation

14. Mr. Andrew Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to announce details of the second non-fossil fuel obligation order.

Mr. Root: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on his plans for the second tranche of the non-fossil fuel obligation order.

Mr. Moynihan: My right hon. Friend proposes to make the second non-fossil fuel obligation order for renewable sources of electricity generating capacity in the autumn of this year.

Electricity Privatisation

15. Mr. Hanchurst: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has on the number of employees of the 12 regional electricity companies who became shareholders in the industry on its privatisation.

18. Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has on the number of employees of the 12 regional electricity companies who became shareholders in the industry on its privatisation.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: About 84,000 employees and 21,000 pensioners of the 12 regional electricity companies, the National Grid Company and the Electricity Association applied for and received shares. Between them they were allocated almost 160 million shares, representing about 7·4 per cent. of the total equity of the 12 regional electricity companies.

Energy Efficiency

16. Mr. Waring: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what consultations he has had with community insulation groups regarding the progress of the home energy efficiency scheme.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The home energy efficiency scheme came into operation on 1 January and the initial indications are that it is being well received. Through Neighbourhood Energy Action, the community insulation groups were closely involved in the development of HEES.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what plans his Department has to promote energy efficiency labelling.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Since the White Paper on the Environment "This Common Inheritance" (Cmnd. 1200) my Energy Efficiency Office has consulted extensively on the practicality of appliance labelling schemes and encouraged the European Commission in its own consultative work on drawing up a proposal for a directive. We hope to introduce a voluntary scheme in advance of an EC scheme.

There are two labelling schemes for housing currently available, both launched in 1990. The schemes are based on the Building Research Establishment's domestic energy model. The EEO is exploring with the organisations involved how the concept of home energy labelling can be more widely promoted.

Wave-generated Electricity

17. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to commission a reassessment of the efficiency of wave-generated electricity.

Mr. Moynihan: A new study of the technical and economic prospects of the generation of electricity from wave energy began in the autumn of 1989 and will be completed this year.

Oil Production

19. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of the level of global oil production in 1990.

Mr. Wakeham: The IEA estimates global oil production to have averaged 66·6 million barrels per day in 1990.

20. Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of the level of United Kingdom oil production in 1990.

Mr. Wakeham: United Kingdom oil production in 1990 is provisionally estimated at 91·6 million tonnes.

Offshore Oil and Gas

21. Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what progress has been made in reducing the number of fallow blocks on the United Kingdom continental shelf.

Mr. Moynihan: Very good progress has been made. At the beginning of 1989, there were 125 blocks in the fallow category and at the end of last year the overall total was 41. I have been informed by those operators still holding fallow blocks that they expect to make further substantial progress this year.

Coal Imports

22. Mr. Lofthouse: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to meet the chairman of British Coal concerning the level of coal imports after April 1993.

Mr. Wakeham: I meet the chairman of British Coal regularly to discuss all aspects of the coal industry.

British Coal Enterprise Ltd.

24. Mr. Knowles: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what has been the direct funding of British Coal Enterprise's job and career change scheme.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: No direct Government funding is given to British Coal Enterprise. However, restructuring grants are made available to the British Coal Corporation, under section 3 of the Coal Industry Act 1987, to reimburse British Coal Enterprise for losses incurred by the Company in promoting new employment in coal mining areas. This includes the job and career change scheme.

Energy Imports

25. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if the United Kingdom was a net importer of energy in 1990.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The United Kingdom was a small net importer of energy in 1990, with net imports amounting to 16·2 million tonnes of coal equivalent. However, in financial terms, the higher value of our exports meant that the United Kingdom was a net exporter of energy to the value of £446 million.

Green Issues

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy who in his Department has been appointed to oversee and develop green issues; how many civil servants have been allocated new or additional responsibilities to deal with the management and development of green issues; and what additional allocation of resources has been made to support programmes related to green issues in his Department.

Mr. Wakeham: At ministerial level, I am responsible for considering the environmental implications of my Department's policies and spending programmes, and for following up the relevant parts of the White Paper "This Common Inheritance". As part of this responsibility, I chair the newly-established ministerial committee on energy efficiency which aims to stimulate improvements in all sectors of the economy.

My Department has set up a steering group and an environment task force to co-ordinate and develop policy on energy and the environment. All relevant divisions are represented on the steering group, which is chaired by a deputy secretary. The task force, which is established within the Energy Technology Division, includes nine staff; it also calls on relevant expertise from other parts of the Department.

Many aspects of the Department's work are related, either directly or indirectly, to environmental issues. Environmental considerations therefore play an important role in the work of a very much larger number of my Department's officials, but it is not practicable to identify what proportion of the Department's resources overall are allocated to these issues.

My Department's programmes address environmental questions as appropriate. For example, expenditure on renewable energy R and D is due to increase by about 20 per cent. in 1991-92 over the level for 1990-91. In addition, the budget of the Energy Efficiency Office is being increased to £42 million in 1991-92.

Industrial Plant (Dust)

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of solid ceramic-based candle filters in dealing with dust within and from industrial plant flues.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: British Coal has undertaken extensive work to develop candle filters for cleaning dust from pressurised combustors such as utilised at the Grimethorpe fluidised bed installation. Information on its work is within the public domain. British Coal has not funded comparable activity of non-utility scale industrial plant where it is felt candle filters would probably not be economic compared with current established technology.

Plutonium

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what volumes of plutonium arising from foreign nuclear fuel reprocessed at (a) Sellafield and (b) Dounreay remain (i) under safeguards in storage at each respective site and (ii) have been returned to the country or countries of origin.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I am advised that up to March 1990 some 3·5 tonnes of plutonium from the reprocessing of overseas spent fuel had been returned to its country of origin or sent to a country specified by the owner of the plutonium; all of this was from reprocessing of spent fuel at Sellafield. At the end of March 1990, British Nuclear Fuels plc held some 0·5 tonnes of extracted plutonium at Sellafield on behalf of overseas customers. None was held in store at Dounreay. All civil nuclear materials remain subject to Euratom safeguards and to the terms of the United Kingdom/Euratom/IAEA safeguards agreement.

Coal Mining Subsidence

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many editions of "Coal Board Arbitration Scheme on Coal Mining Subsidence" were in operation before 1 January; and how many cases were dealt with under each edition of the scheme.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: This is a matter for the British Coal Corporation.

Electricity Costs

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will take action to assist heavy energy-using industries which face significantly increasing costs of electricity.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The 1991 prices will depend on the outcome of commercial negotiations currently underway. The Government have created a competitive market for electricity supply in which large users are fully able to participate. I do not believe that it would be right for Government to intervene in the market to assist heavy energy-using industries.

Imports

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the cost of energy imports into the United Kingdom for the year 1990.

Mr. Wakeham: The value of energy imports to the United Kingdom, excluding the cost of freight and insurance, for the year 1990 was £7,383 million. This is £446 million less than the comparable value for energy exports of £7,829 million.

Offshore Gas and Oil Industries

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the level of direct employment in the offshore oil and gas industry in 1990; and what is his estimate of the number of jobs indirectly supported by the industry.

Mr. Moynihan: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall).

United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what external financing limit has been set for the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority for 1991-92; and what the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority's capital expenditure programme is to be in 1991-92.

Mr. Wakeham: The United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority's external financing limit for 1991-92 will be £23·6 million. I have also approved the authority's capital expenditure programme for the year at £27 million.

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he has set objectives for the new chairman of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority.

Mr. Wakeham: I have settled objectives with the UKAEA chairman, Mr. John Maltby, on the following terms:

INTRODUCTION

Peter Walker wrote to your predecessor, John Collier, on 25 February 1987, setting out the objectives which the Government wished him to pursue as Chairman of the AEA. I am writing to up-date those objectives, taking account of developments both of policy and in the regulatory field, and in the light of the progress made by the AEA to fulfil the main aims of the Government in establishing the Trading Fund in 1986. The objectives represent the general direction in which the Government wishes you to take the AEA. Specific targets, which are referred to in this letter, will be set from time to time by the Government, after consultation with you. Nothing in these objectives over-rides your responsibilities as an Accounting Officer.

STATUTORY FRAMEWORK

The AEA's activities are undertaken within the framework of the Atomic Energy Authority Act 1954, the Science and Technology Act 1965, the Atomic Energy Authority Act 1986, and other relevant legislation.

SAFETY

From October 1990, the AEA has been subject to the safety requirements imposed on licensed operators by the Health and Safety Executive under the Nuclear Installations Act 1965 (Repeal and Modifications) Regulations 1990. You should ensure that the AEA continues to have arrangements which secure at all times the highest standards in safety that are reasonably practicable, in its day-to-day activities, in its decommissioning activities and in the management of radioactive waste.

DECOMMISSIONING AND RADIOACTIVE WASTE MANAGEMENT

Decommissioning and radioactive waste management activities are growing in importance within the AEA's total sphere of operations. You should accordingly ensure that, with the funds made available for this purpose, the AEA carries out in the most cost effective way its decommissioning and radioactive waste management responsibilities, consistent with safety and other requirements of the regulatory authorities.

AEA TECHNOLOGY

Aims

Supported by Government, John Collier began, and you are carrying forward, a major restructuring of the AEA, which is aimed at increasing competitiveness, cutting costs, providing better value for money of its customers and increasing profitability. Since 1989, the AEA has been trading as AEA Technology.

Strategy

The AEA is operating in an increasingly competitive market, both for the work which it undertakes for the Government and for other customers. Within the above framework, your prime objective is to ensure that the AEA competes effectively in these markets, develops its business to meet the needs of its customers and, in doing so, earns an acceptable return on its assets. To this end, you should ensure that the AEA has a structure and cost levels that secure these objectives. The Government, whilst continuing to support the AEA in restructuring its operations, looks to the AEA to achieve returns that enable it to fund the costs of restructuring and make a return for the Exchequer.

Defined customer-contractor relations should apply to all work carried out by the AEA. As far as funding by the Department of Energy is concerned, this work will be specified in Programme Letters agreed with the Department and carried out in accordance with the terms and conditions contained in the Letters. Subject to its statutory constraints the AEA should undertake work for customers, whether nuclear or non-nuclear, on the basis of an acceptable return after taking into account any waste management and decommissioning costs to which the work gives rise, and appropriate contributions to overheads (including the corporate research and application development programme). The AEA should have regard to the nature of the work involved in seeking such contributions.

Within the framework of legislation and Government policy, you should ensure that the AEA explores all options for exploiting its technology, including collaborating with other organisations where this is commercially justified or where I indicate that there is a national interest in doing so. You should ensure the AEA informs the Department, at an early stage, of its plans for such collaboration.

You should ensure that the AEA prepares annually a Corporate Plan covering the Public Expenditure Survey period consistent with the business strategy outlined in this letter and taking account of the likely development of each of the main business areas. This should be provided to the Department and contain Business Plans for each main business area. In particular, the Plan should identify those areas where increased resources (money, manpower, research and applications development) are justified by prospects of future profitable business and those where effort should be reduced. The Plan should include a Capital Investment Memorandum setting out the AEA's capital expenditure proposals. The Plan should include contingency planning showing how the AEA would respond to different market out-turns to those assumed in the Plan. I expect to review each year's Plan with you.

Performance Targets

You should propose suitable performance targets consistent with and complementary to the financial target (see below) for approval by the Department.

Financial

I expect you to ensure that the AEA stays within its External Financing Limit (EFL) as agreed from year to year.

I expect you to ensure that the financial target, as set by me from time to time after discussion with the AEA, is achieved. I also expect to require you to surrender distributions of agreed sums from time to time to the Consolidated Fund.

Conclusion

This letter sets out the main strategic objectives for the term of your current appointment. I expect to discuss each annual Corporate Plan with you, to review the AEA's achievements against the specific targets which have been set, and if necessary to set new targets in the light of this discussion and review. The objectives in this letter will be reviewed not later than the Summer of 1993.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Iran (Exports)

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures he is taking to encourage British exports to Iran.

Mr. Lilley: My Department, in conjunction with the Committee for Middle East Trade provides advice and information to British exporters to Iran. In order to improve our share of an expanding market, we are, with the assistance of the British Embassy in Tehran, attempting to identify new export opportunities. We are also improving our knowledge of market conditions for the benefit of companies wishing to break into the market. The fairs and promotions branch of my Department has offered financial support to companies wishing to participate in the Iran medical fair to be held in June and it is about to make an offer in respect of the Tehran international fair in October.

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what were the totals, by value, of United Kingdom exports to Iran for each quarter of 1988, 1989 and 1990.

Mr. Lilley: The value of United Kingdom exports to Iran for 1988, 1989 and 1990 was as follows:

£ million

	1988	1989	1990
January to March	69·1	68·4	71·6
April to June	62·2	53·3	84·6
July to September	63·3	56·9	107·1
October to December	52·5	78·6	121·4

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received on Export Credits Guarantee Department cover for trade with Iran; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: I am aware of the interest being shown by British exporters in business with Iran. Cover is available from the ECGD for exports on credit terms of up to 360 days where payments are secured by irrevocable letters of credit.

The resumption of cover for exports on medium term credit will need to take account of a number of factors including commercial considerations and conditions in the region generally. Some progress would also need to be made on the settlement of the debts outstanding to the United Kingdom on trade which took place prior to the Islamic revolution.

Exports to Iraq

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many licences for diesel generators to be exported to Iraq have been issued in the last five years.

Mr. Lilley: The information needed to answer this question is not readily available and the resources required to obtain it would place an unreasonable burden on the Department and the public purse.

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will list the current members of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission and give the Company Fraud

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry of he will list those, apart from company directors, who have a statutory duty to report company fraud to any regulators.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 11 February 1991]: There is in general no statutory duty on directors or others to report company fraud to regulators. Certain people, however, are under specific statutory reporting duties which may in some circumstances require them to report fraud. In the areas for which the Department of Trade and Industry is responsible, such duties include:

(i) The duty on a liquidator to report evidence of criminality by any past or present officer of the company, and on a liquidator, official receiver, administrator or administrative receiver to report conduct by a director of a company, which has at any time become insolvent, which makes him unfit to be concerned in the management of a company.

(ii) The obligation on investment businesses to keep their regulators informed of anything concerning the firm which might reasonably be expected to be disclosed to them.

(iii) the duty on listed companies to notify to the International Stock Exchange any information necessary to avoid the creation of a false market in the company's listed securities.

Export Licences

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Newport, West, 7 February Official Report, column 216, he will set out (a) the total number of export licences issued by his Department in each year between 1979 to 1988 inclusive and (b) the numbers of export licence applications refused in 1989 and 1990 respectively, giving the main reasons why such applications were refused.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 20 February 1991]: In 1987 and 1988 my Department granted 94,613 and 86,605 export licences respectively. Statistics for previous years are not readily available and could be produced only at disproportionate cost.

The number of export licence applications refused in 1989 and 1990 was 281 and 283 respectively. In addition, 3,620 and 3,495 licence applications were cancelled by DTI or withdrawn by the companies concerned in 1989 and 1990 respectively. The main reasons for refusing to grant an export licence are the unacceptable risk to national and collective security and that the export is inconsistent with the Government's policy, in particular on non-proliferation, terrorism and human rights.

Hedgehogs

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to monitor the level of exports of hedgehogs to the United States and Canada and elsewhere; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: I have been asked to reply. Under the provisions of the Endangered Species (Import and Export) Act 1976, anyone wishing to export hedgehogs requires an export permit from my Department. In the last three years three such permits have been issued, authorising the export of eight live hedgehogs to zoos in the United States.

HEALTH

Laboratory Services

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) whether it is his policy specifically to encourage health authorities to contract out pathology services;

(2) what plans his Department has to increase resources to health authorities to ensure they can improve the efficiency and quantity of laboratory services.

Mr. Dorrell: We have given no specific instructions to health authorities about the contracting out of pathology services or about their level of funding, since it is for each health authority to consider the organisation and level of laboratory provision it requires within its available resources. However, to help improve the efficiency and quality of these services we have given assistance to the Royal College of Pathologists to develop an accreditation scheme for pathology laboratories, and we have commented on the Audit Commission's proposals for the improvement of those services. We are also contributing to the cost of introducing a system of medical audit which will include the pathology discipline, and are funding additional schemes in the national external quality assessment schemes (NEQAS).

Surgical Tights

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are his plans for the provision of surgical tights under the NHS.

Mr. Dorrell: Elastic or surgical tights are available on the prescription of a hospital consultant when they are supplied through the hospital service. There are no plans to change these arrangements.

Social Surveys

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he has any plans to launch a survey into the current state of family planning provision, consumer needs and attitudes.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We receive information from a number of sources about NHS family planning provision and the needs of those who use this service. I shall shortly be meeting representatives of the main family planning voluntary and professional organisations to discuss family planning issues.

Carers

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he will publish a clear definition of the responsibilities of carers and ensure that such responsibilities are kept under constant review.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department has not sought precisely to define a carer nor their responsibilities. The care in the community policies are intended to make practical support for carers a priority and consider their views in community care planning and assessment.

Iraq

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if his Department has made any emergency preparations to assist the Iraqi medical authorities after the end of hostilities in combating the epidemic of water pollution diseases in Iraqi cities arising from the destruction of water supply and sewage systems.

Mr. Dorrell: No. We understand that a joint WHO/UNICEF mission visited Baghdad earlier this month to deliver emergency medical supplies and to assess the essential health needs of the civilian population. Additionally, the International Red Cross Committee has identified serious shortages of drinking water and after notifying the UN Sanctions Committee, dispatched water purification supplies to Baghdad. It is too soon to say what further international support the Iraqi medical authorities might require once hostilities have ended and what contribution, if any, the United Kingdom might make to such an initiative.

North Devon Health Authority

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proposals there are for the purchaser of the North Devon health authority; whether there are any proposals to merge this authority with Torbay or Exeter; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: North Devon health authority is embracing the recent Government reforms. We have received no formal proposals to merge North Devon health authority with either Torbay or Exeter health authority. The preparation of any such proposals would initially be a matter for South Western regional health authority, annd the hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. C. Stuart the chairman of that authority for details.

Incontinence Pads

Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he will make a statement on the guidance which he gives to regional health authorities regarding the supply of incontinence pads to elderly people in privately run residential homes.

Mr. Dorrell: Departmental guidance to health authorities on the supply of incontinence pads is contained in HRC(74)16. On 18 February 1991 the NHS management executive wrote to health authorities (EL(91)28), advising that existing incontinence provision should be directed to securing the best practice commended in HN(88)26. Where a change in the supply of incontinence aids is proposed, health authorities should first ensure that an alternative is in place. Copies of these letters are available in the Library. Officials will shortly be beginning a Departmental review of incontinence services.

Speech Therapy

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he has agreed guidelines for speech therapy standards with the College of Speech Therapists.

Mr. Dorrell: I understand that the College of Speech Therapists has not yet finalised its guidelines on professional standards. The Department is being consulted about these guidelines.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many of the public health needs assessments prepared for district health authorities mention the need for speech therapy services.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not held centrally.

Irradiated Food

Mr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice or guidance he intends to give to local authorities about the use of irradiated foods in establishments run by social services departments such as old people's homes and children's homes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: No specific guidance on the use of irradiated food in establishments run by social services departments is being issued by the Department. In common with all other catering establishments, local authorities and social services departments who choose to use irradiated products will be required to inform consumers under the requirements of the Food Labelling (Amendment) (Irradiated Food) Regulations 1990.

NHS Funding

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the allocations he proposes to make to national health service regions in England for 1991-92; and what these allocations would be if the weighted capitation funding were strictly adhered to.

Mr. Dorrell: 1991-92 represented the second year of progress towards allocations based on weighted capitation. Table 1 shows the 1991-92 main revenue allocations for each region and the percentage increases over 1990-91. No region received less than a 10·24 per cent. increase.

Table 2 shows what each region would have received without a minimum 10·24 per cent. increase.

The figures exclude allocations for items such as the service increment for teaching and research, joint finance, and allocations for other specific purposes.

Dental Services

Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people have registered with dentists under the new dental contract.

Mr. Waldegrave: The number of people in England and Wales registered with dentists under continuing care and capitation arrangements has grown steadily since the new contract started on 1 October 1990 and is now almost 12 million.

Cumulative totals are as follows:

End of month	Cumulative total
October 1990	2,091,855
November 1990	5,780,346
December 1990	8,154,903

At 19 February 1991, which is the latest date for which figures are available, the number of people registered with dentists was 11,995,665.

NHS Finance

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the average expenditure per day per patient, in cash and constant prices, for food provisions for hospital in-patients in each year since 1980.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 28 January 1991]: The information requested for the financial years 1980-81 to 1988-89 (the latest available) is shown in the table.

Health Authorities

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total funding for each health authority for each of the last 11 years; and what was the number of patients treated by each authority over the same period.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 29 January 1991]: The following tables show the total revenue expenditure and the number of in-patients treated by each health region and the special health authorities for the London postgraduate teaching hospitals for the years 1979-80 to 1989-90.

1. Annual accounts of regional and district health authorities in England together with those of the special health authorities for the London postgraduate teaching hospitals. (Predecessor authorities for the years prior to 1982-83).
2. Statistical returns submitted to the Department (SM12).

Notes:

1. Revenue expenditure on HCHS covers that on all services provided by the health authorities concerned including hospital, community health, patient transport (ie ambulance), blood transfusion and other services. Capital expenditure and expenditure on family practitioner services (now family health services) is excluded. However, the expenditure figures for all regions in the years prior to 1985-86 include small elements for the administrative expenses of family practitioner committees which were not separately identified.
2. Following the reports of the steering group on NHS information (the Körner committee) a new definition "finished consultant episode" was introduced to cover both the former in-patient and day case treatment categories. For 1988-89 information was collected under both the new and previous bases and is shown in the table accordingly.

Liverpool Health Authority (Chairman)

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the salary of the chairman of Liverpool health authority and the contractual working hours.

East Cumbria Health Authority

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the salary of the chairman of East Cumbria health authority and the contractual working hours.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 11 February 1991]: With effect from 1 January 1991, chairmen of district health authorities receive remuneration in the range set out in the table. No specific working hours are required by contract, but most DHA chairmen devote an average of three to 3·5 days a week to their duties.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Social Workers

Rev. William McCrea: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action the DHSS is taking to assist in the recruitment and training of specialist social workers for the blind.

Mr. Hanley: The Department of Health and Social Services presently provides funding for the award of 68 new social work bursaries per annum to enable students to obtain certificates of qualifications in social work. This generic qualifying training provides preparation for all aspects of social work. Specialist qualifying training for social workers for the visually impaired is not available. The recent announcement of a new training strategy for personal social services staff provides an additional £1 million for social services training improvements, a proportion of which will be used to increase the supply of qualified social workers through an additional 25 social work bursaries per annum.

Continuing education and training for qualified social workers in specialist areas, including workers with the visually impaired, is provided by Health and Social Services Board and other employers through in-service and post-qualification training programmes. Additional funding to expand and develop relevant programmes of further training has been included in the training strategy funds and will be made available to appropriate employers in the forthcoming financial year.

The Department also provides two bursaries per annum for students undergoing training as rehabilitation workers for the blind.

Farmers

Rev. William McCrea: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he will next attend a meeting with the Ulster Farmers Union to discuss the problems now facing Northern Ireland farmers.

Mr. Hanley: The Secretary of State last met the Ulster Farmers Union on 17 October 1990; I met the union on 7 January. We both met representatives of the union at the Greenmount conference with Commissioner MacSharry on 15 February; I intend to continue to meet the UFU regularly in future.

Life Prisoners

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons sentenced to life imprisonment have been released on licence in each month of 1990; and how many years each such person had actually served in prison since conviction.

Dr. Mawhinney: Sixty-six prisoners serving life sentences were released on licence during 1990. Eight other prisoners, detained at the Secretary of State's pleasure, were released on licence in the same period.

The number of years served by these prisoners (including time spent on remand and awaiting trial) at the time of their release on licence is as follows:

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Whales

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has made any representations to his Japanese counterpart concerning the continued Japanese killing of whales in the south Pacific ocean and Antarctic seas.

Mr. Curry: In June 1990 the United Kingdom co-sponsored a resolution agreed by the International Whaling Commission calling upon Japan to reconsider her intention of conducting scientific research whaling in the Antarctic ocean. Japan is now proceeding with a programme to gather new biological data on the minke whale stocks which has been slightly modified in the light of comments by the IWC's scientific committee and is well aware of our views on scientific whaling.

Farm Sizes

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give the average farm size in hectares by county in the United Kingdom.

Milk Marketing Scheme

Mr. Turner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish the report of the Consumers Committee for England and Wales on the milk marketing scheme 1933.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 14 January 1991, c. 391]: The report of the Consumers Committee for England and Wales of the milk marketing scheme 1933 is being published today. Copies of the report will be placed in the Library of the House.

EMPLOYMENT

Public Expenditure

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the differences between the 1990-91 plans published in the 1990 public expenditure White Paper and the 1990-91 estimated outturn.

Mr. Jackson: My Department's report, copies of which are available in the Library, contains in paragraph 20 the information requested.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what new commitments have been undertaken since publication of the 1990 public expenditure White Paper which will involve spending in years after 1993-94.

Mr. Jackson: The new schemes undertaken are as follows:

The job interview guarantee is a new initiative which guarantees all participants an interview for a specific vacancy: it aims to change employers' perceptions of long-term unemployed people and assist long-term claimants to cope more effectively in the jobs market. It is now being extended beyond the inner city areas where it was successfully piloted.

Programme development funds pilots provide local flexibility of funding to tailor action to special inner city needs.

Training credits are being piloted by 10 training and enterprise councils. The credits allow young people to "buy" approved training from an employer or specialist provider. The pilots will be evaluated and decisions made on whether to further extend the schemes.

The teacher placement service, responsibility for which transfers from the DTI in April 1991, is expected to involve spending after 1993-94. It is the intention of the Government to transfer ministerial responsibility for offshore oil safety to my Department during 1991.

Capital Projects

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what major new capital projects have been started since last year's public expenditure White Paper; and what costs will arise from them in 1990-91 and future years.

Mr. Jackson: Information on capital projects is collated yearly for the supply estimate. Listed in the table are the major capital projects over £500,000 which have been started since the publication of the 1990-91 supply estimate.

Departmental Annual Report

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many measures of performance are contained in the current year's annual report; and how many there were in last year's; whether any measures of performance have been enhanced or dropped as a result of a review of performance indicators; and whether the previous year's targets have been met.

Mr. Jackson: My Department now measures performance through labour market outcomes and end products rather levels of activity as in last year's public expenditure White Paper. Measures of performance in the two documents are therefore not comparable.

For the Employment Service (ES), last year's public expenditure White Paper set out levels of activity in advance of its becoming a "next steps" agency. Performance targets to which ES has been working are set out in the 1990-91 annual performance agreement which was published in April 1990. The chief executive of the ES will report to my right hon. and learned Friend on ES achievements and use of resources at the end of the financial year. The report will be published in the summer. Discussions on the targets for the 1991-92 annual performance agreement are well advanced and I intend to place a copy in the Library by the beginning of April.

Programmes administered through training and enterprise councils (TECs) will be increasingly measured by the achievement of outputs rather than simply activity. This is in line with the move to output related funding for TECs. The TEC network will be fully established by September 1991.

Performance measures for the Health and Safety Executive and ACAS are largely unchanged from last year and overall are being met.

The estimated performance for 1990-91 is shown in the tables in my departmental report, copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Employment Legislation Tribunals

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether employers have access to the names of employees who have taken companies to tribunals under the Race Relations Act 1976, Sex Discrimination Act 1975 and other employment legislation.

Mr. Forth: As with cases heard by most other courts, applications to industrial tribunals, and the tribunals' decisions, are required by law to be entered on to a register which is held at the central office of the industrial tribunals and is open to inspection by the public.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number and proportion of the Leeds work force in (a) the service sector and (b) the manufacturing sector in each year from 1979 to 1990.

Mr. Jackson: Employment estimates for local areas are compiled only when censuses of employment are taken. They cover employees in employment only and exclude the self-employed and also members of Her Majesty's forces.

The available information from censuses of employment taken in 1981, 1984 and 1987 is given in the table.

Employees in employment in manufacturing and in service industries in the Leeds travel-to-work area

Divisions of the standard industrial classification 1980	September 1981		September 1984		September 1987
	Number (000s)	Per cent.[1]	Number (000s)	Per cent.[1]	Number (000s)	Per cent.[1]

6-9 Service industries	187·5	63·0	195·6	67·4	197·0	68·0

[1] Percentage of all employees in the travel-to-work area.

Mining Accidents

Mr. Alison: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the annual average number of fatalities and major injuries in British Coal's mines in 1969-70, 1979-80 and 1989-90.

Mr. Forth: The information requested is as follows:

Year	British Coal Corporation's mines
	Average number of fatalities	Average number of major injuries
1969-70	96	677
1979-80	44	493
1989-90[1]	15	580

[1] Figures for 1989 and 1990 are provisional. Statutory changes in the recording of serious and major injury reporting took place in 1981 and 1986, both widening the scope of reportable injuries. As a result of these changes, accidents recorded after 1986 are not comparable with earlier years.

Vocational Training

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he has any plans to encourage the extension of training facilities for unemployed people who wish to obtain heavy goods vehicle licences as a means of improving their job prospects;

(2) if he will draw up proposals to provide for free driving lessons for unemployed people who wish to learn to drive as a means of improving their job prospects.

Mr. Jackson: It is for training and enterprise councils to determine the vocational training provision they will support for unemployed people in the light of the local labour market.

Restart Courses

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will draw up proposals to include education studies falling within the 21-hour rule as an option for Restart courses.

Mr. Jackson: No; since the two serve different purposes. The 21-hour rule enables unemployed income support claimants to follow part-time education courses for up to 21 hours a week while continuing to receive benefit. Restart courses are short-term courses designed to help longer-term unemployed people to build confidence and motivation and plan their way back to work. Many claimants who take up educational opportunities under the 21-hour rule can also benefit from a Restart course. People who are studying under the 21-hour rule can normally attend Restart courses without disruption to their studies, for example, during vacations.

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentages of those on compulsory Restart courses obtain employment at their conclusion.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service Executive Agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Long-term Unemployed

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of job vacancies is taken up by the long-term unemployed.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service executive agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief Executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures he has undertaken to encourage employers to provide jobs for the long-term unemployed.

Mr. Jackson: We have in place an extensive range of employment and training measures to help long-term unemployed people compete more effectively in the labour market. The job interview guarantee specifically aims to encourage employers to consider long-term unemployed people for their vacancies and has had proven success in helping people back into jobs in the difficult labour markets of the inner cities. The Secretary of State for Employment has announced that, from April 1991, we shall be providing up to 100,000 additional opportunities in programmes such as the job interview guarantee and job club which provide help in securing job interviews and jobsearch.

South Glamorgan TEC

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what level of financial commitment he has made to fund the new South Glamorgan TEC headquarters; and on what terms.

Mr. Jackson: My Department has not yet agreed the precise level of financial contribution it will make to the funding of the new South Glamorgan TEC headquarters.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment on what date he first made a financial commitment to assist the new South Glamorgan TEC headquarters project.

Mr. Jackson: My Department gave initial agreement to make a financial contribution to the cost of the new South Glamorgan TEC headquarters in September 1990.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the average cost of answering a parliamentary question for written answer to the Department of Employment.

Mr. Jackson: The average cost of answering a written parliamentary question is not routinely recorded in the Employment Department. Estimates are, however, made where there is a likelihood of exceeding the disproportionate cost threshold (currently £250). However, following an interdepartmental exercise in 1972 in which the Employment Department participated an assessment was made of the average cost throughout all Departments of answering a written question. This assessment was based on staff time, using average rates of pay and associated costs for the grades concerned, together with a share of the cost of parliamentary sections and any substantial non-staff costs such as computer usage. This assessed figure is regularly updated and currently stands at £64.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

European Standing Committees

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will take steps to give the members of the European Standing Committees notification of the dates which have been listed for consideration by the appropriate Councils of Ministers of documents which have been referred to the Standing Committees.

Mr. MacGregor: The expected timetable for Council consideration of an EC document is set out in general terms in the Government's explanatory memorandum on the document. In addition, monthly forecasts of the agendas for individual Council meetings are placed in the Vote Office (though these are subject to last-minute changes). However, the Government have stated their commitment to holding scrutiny debates early in the consideration of a proposal and certainly before its adoption by the Council wherever possible.

House of Commons Accommodation

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Lord President of the Council what inquiries he has made into the leasing of offices at 7 Millbank, London SW1, for use as staff or hon. Members' accommodation.

Mr. MacGregor: I understand that No. 7 Millbank is one of a number of properties at present under consideration by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to provide accommodation for the House.

WALES

Cardiff Bay Development Corporation

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his most up-to-date estimate of the number of jobs that have been created by the Cardiff Bay development corporation since its inception.

Mr. David Hunt: The activities of Cardiff Bay development corporation are aimed primarily at facilitating development by the private sector. The following table shows the result of the earliest and most recent surveys of businesses in the corporation's designated area since its inception.

Date of Survey	Number of Businesses in CBDC area	Number of Employees in Businesses Responding	Number of Businesses not Responding
January 1988	861	15,247	64
September 1990	901	17,032	87

Trunk Roads

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing each of the trunk road improvement schemes in Wales scheduled to start between the current time and April 1994 and which will cost in excess of £1 million; and if he will indicate the order of priority of these schemes in relation to the finance available.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The 1991 departmental report (Cm. 1516) published on 15 February indicated the following planned starts in 1991-92:

M4 Brynglas Tunnels and Malpas Relief Road
M4 Briton Ferry-Earlswood
A483 Welshpool Relief Road

Construction of the M4 Baglan-Briton ferry scheme is planned to start six months after the Briton Ferry-Earlswood scheme to achieve simultaneous completion.

Other schemes in the short term programme, to start before April 1994, are shown in the 1991 supplement to "Roads in Wales: Progress and Plans for the 1990s", which was published on 25 February. The precise timing and order of starts will depend on completion of engineering, design and statutory procedures, and the availability of finance.

Bathing Beaches

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report for each designated beach in Wales for the 1990 bathing season (a) the date and time of each sample taken for total coliforms and E. Coli and (b) the actual levels of total coliforms and E. Coli present in each sample.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The data requested is on the public registers maintained by the Welsh region of the National Rivers Authority, and available for inspection during normal working hours at its offices. A summary of the information is contained within the report prepared under article 13 of the EC bathing water directive, a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report for each non-designated beach in Wales for the 1990 bathing season (a) the date and time of each sample taken for total coliforms and E. Coli and (b) the actual levels of total coliforms and E. Coli present in each sample.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The data in respect of non-designated bathing waters monitored by the National Rivers Authority is kept on public registers maintained by the authority and available for inspection during normal working hours at its offices.

Aluminium

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps are being taken to reduce the ingestion of aluminium into the human body.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Aluminium is an abundant mineral to which all individuals receive widespread exposure from several sources. A review by the independent Committee on Toxicity in 1985 concluded that existing levels of aluminium in food were not a cause for concern. Intakes of aluminium through food continue to be monitored.

The Water Supply (Water Quality) Regulations 1989 lay down a standard of 200 microgrammes per litre for aluminium in water. This standard is not related to toxicity but was set for reasons of water quality. There are no plans to reduce this level.

Fluorine

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has on the link between certain industrial processes and the deposit of fluorine in the populations of those residing near such processes.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: I am informed that Her Majesty' inspectorate of pollution is aware of the release of fluorides to air from works for which it has responsibilities. Emission limits for fluorides are specified at a level which, following dispersion, should not present any problems to local inhabitants. I understand there is no evidence to suggest that releases of fluorides from industrial installations in Wales represent any health risk to local communities.

Opencast Mining

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a list of opencast coal planning applications by British Coal that have been refused by the mineral planning authorities, and appeals that have been lodged by his Department; and if he will indicate for each case (a) the date of the refusal, (b) the date of the appeal, (c) the date that the inspector submitted his report to the Secretary of State, (d) the date when he announced his decision and (e) whether the appeal was granted or refused.

Mr. David Hunt: Information on applications refused by mineral planning authorities is not held centrally. Information on appeals to the Secretary of State which have not been subsequently withdrawn is as follows:

Waste Disposal

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he intends to require local authorities in Wales to update their 1985 local waste disposal plans and to deposit those plans with his Department.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: No. Under the provisions of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 each authority will be required to prepare a waste disposal plan and to send a copy to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a list of planning applications for a landfill waste disposal site that he has called in for his own determination during the past 10 years.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: None has been called in during the past 10 years.

Fish Farming

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on his Department's current involvement with matters relating to fish farming in coastal waters.

Mr. David Hunt: The responsibilities of United Kingdom Fisheries Departments, including the Welsh Office, for fish farming are set out in the memorandum "Fish Farming in the UK" submitted to the House of Commons Agriculture Committee in October 1989.

Training

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will provide the figures for Wales corresponding to those given in tables 6.6 and 6.8 on employment and youth training published in Cm 1506.

Mr. David Hunt: The information requested is not readily available and I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Farming

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will take steps to ensure that the basic hill livestock compensatory allowance form is sent out to all relevant farmers at the earliest possible date.

Mr. David Hunt: The HLCA claim forms were issued to farmers on 7 February.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has of the number of people employed in mining and manufacturing in Merthyr and Rhymney, and in Wales; what percentage these are of the total employed; and what the comparable figures were in 1979.

Mr. David Hunt: The latest available estimates for the Merthyr and Rhymney travel-to-work area, from the September 1987 census of employment, are given in the following table.

Comparable figures for the Merthyr and Rhymney travel-to-work area are not available for years prior to 1981. Estimates from the September 1981 census of employment are provided as follows.

Employees in employment

	Year	Merthyr and Rhymney		Wales

Education

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will meet the directors and principals of all the Welsh colleges selected for direct funding from 1 April 1992 to discuss the particular financial problems of sustaining workshop-based vocational educational higher education courses.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Officials from the Welsh Office are scheduled to meet the director of the Polytechnic for Wales and the principals of the higher education colleges concerned shortly to discuss a range of issues arising from the proposed transfer. Further meetings will be arranged as necessary.

Local Plans

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the date when each local authority in Wales deposited their local plans with his Department.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Local planning authorities are required to place local plans on deposit for public inspection and to send copies of those plans to the Secretary of State. The dates when each local planning authority in Wales deposited local plans were as follows:

"Roads in Wales"

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he intends updating the information given in the Welsh Office publication "Roads in Wales: Progress and Plans for the 1990s" published in April 1989.

Mr. David Hunt: I am pleased to announce that I have issued today a 1991 supplement to "Roads in Wales". Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

TRANSPORT

Rail Electrification

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, further to his answer of 1 February to the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden, Official Report, column 699, whether the 10 per cent. of routes electrified in Scotland include those under the control of Strathclyde PTE/section 20 areas.

Mr. Freeman: My previous answer did not include electrified routes in Strathclyde. Including those increases the percentage of BR's total route mileage in Scotland which is electrified, including projects approved or under construction, to around 23 per cent. In the Strathclyde area some 203 out of 282 route miles (72 per cent.) are electrified.

M6

Mrs. Golding: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list his proposals for widening the M6 between Birmingham and Manchester; what streiches will be affected; what consultations he intends to have on the proposals; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Schemes for the widening of the M6 between Birmingham and Manchester were announced as part of the Government's expanded trunk road programme in the White Paper "Roads for Prosperity", presented to Parliament in May 1989. Consultants are currently examining the various ways of providing extra capacity on this motorway. There has been discussion with local authorities and others as part of this process. I hope that we shall be able to announce detailed proposals towards the end of the year.

Auxiliary Coastguards

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment has been made of any increased danger to the public as a result of the reduction in manpower and equipment of the auxiliary coastguard service;

(2) what changes are planned by way of manpower and equipment for Prawle Point coastguard centre.

(3) what changes are planned by way of manpower and equipment for Dartmouth auxiliary coastguard station;

(4) if he will initiate a study into the implications of savings in the coastguard auxiliary service for risk of injury or death to those in difficulties on the seas or along the south Devon cliff coastline;

(5) what changes are planned by way of manpower and equipment for Yealm auxiliary coastguard station;

(6) what changes are planned by way of manpower or equipment for Bigbury auxiliary coastguard station;

(7) what changes are planned by way of manpower and equipment for Hope Cove auxiliary coastguard centre;

(8) if he will make a statement about future manning levels at the Hope Cove auxiliary sector office;

(9) what plans he has over the next five years to alter levels of manpower and equipment along the coastline of South Hams.

Mr. McLoughlin: Recommendations relating to changes to Her Majesty's coastguard's manpower and equipment were made by an internal review of the Coastguard Sector Organisation and Auxiliary Service. Local coastguard senior management is holding discussions with local interests and staff about the implications of these recommendations in each region. No decisions will be taken on the review's recommendations until the implications have been fully assessed, and full account has been taken of local circumstances and conditions.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the incidents in the Hope cove and Prawle point sectors for each of the last five years which have involved the search and rescue teams of the auxiliary coastguards of Brixham district.

Mr. McLoughlin: The number of actual and potential search and rescue incidents attended by auxiliary coastguards at the five stations in Hope cove and Prawle point sectors for the years 1986-1990 are as follows:

Falmouth coastguard region—Hope cove and Prawle sectors incidents by station 1986-1990

D: Other rescues.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the remit given to the chief coastguard to review coastguard sector organisation and coastguard auxiliary service; and by whom this review was initiated.

Mr. McLoughlin: The review of the Coastguard Sector Organisation and Auxiliary Service was an internal review initiated by the previous chief coastguard as part of the marine directorate's programme of reviews of administration and operations. Its terms of reference were:

"To examine the nature of HM Coastguard's commitments on the coastline, reporting on the adequacy and value for money of the present arrangements; and proposing changes if necessary."

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what changes are planned by way of manpower and equipment for Brixham district controller's office of the coastguard.

Mr. McLoughlin: No changes are contemplated in the manning or equipping of the district controller Brixham's district office.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the use of the GP boat attached to the Hope Cove auxiliary coastguard sector office in the last two years.

Mr. McLoughlin: During 1989 and 1990 the Hope Cove GP boat was launched on patrol every weekend and public holiday during the summer season, over 70 times in all. Although coastguard boats are not declared rescue facilities, during patrols 10 rescues were carried out of persons found to be in trouble. The boat was also launched:

five times to carry out rescues
15 times on exercise and training
20 times to provide offshore coordination of incidents and to assist with coastal searches
20 times when the number of sport divers active off Hope Cove justified a Coastguard presence afloat.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration underlay his decision to accept the review of coastguards with regard to the future of the Coastguard Sector Organisation and Coastguard Auxiliary Service in South Hams.

Mr. McLoughlin: The review of the Coastguard Sector Organisation and Auxiliary Service was accepted as a consultative document not a statement of intent. The review proposes a framework for the future which offers opportunities to improve the availability, readiness, and training of the auxiliary and sector organisation to meet current requirements.

European Airworthiness Organisation

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he is taking to secure the location of the headquarters of the European Airworthiness Organisation in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: The United Kingdom Civil Aviation Authority proposed that the European Joint Aviation Authorities (JAA) headquarters should be located at Gatwick, and their initiative was endorsed by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State. The JAA board has since considered the eight candidates for the location of its headquarters, and decided on Amsterdam last December. I am confident that the United Kingdom will continue to play a prominent role in JAA.

Fenchurch Street Railway

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are British Rail's performance targets in the Fenchurch Street line; and what have been their achievements against these.

Mr. Freeman: The table sets out Network SouthEast's quality of service objectives and the Fenchurch Street line's achievement for 1989-90 and for 1990-91 so far.

Autoguide

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has made an evaluation of the Autoguide pilot project in London; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what information he has in relation to any decrease in congestion and increased traffic speeds in London attributable to Autoguide;

(3) if he has issued a licence for an Autoguide pilot scheme for any areas of the country, excluding London;

(4) if he will list the roads covered by the Autoguide pilot project in London.

Mr. Chope: Negotiations with GEC Ltd. on the terms of a licence to install and operate an Autoguide system in London are continuing. Agreement has yet to be reached on the proposed pilot scheme and so it is not possible to say which roads would be included. Estimates made by the Transport and Road Research Laboratory suggest that drivers equipped with the Autoguide system could reduce their mileage by about 6 per cent. and their journey times by some 10 per cent. No applications have yet been received or invited for Autoguide licences in areas outside London.

Road Schemes

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all road schemes for which draft line orders were published before 3 July 1988, for which no environmental impact assessment has been carried out, and whose line orders have yet to be confirmed.

Mr. Chope: All schemes in the national trunk road programme have for many years been subject to a very full environmental appraisal before the line orders are confirmed. Within the requirements of the EC directive, a formal environmental impact statement has accompanied all draft orders published since 21 July 1988. Those schemes for which draft line orders were published prior to the implementation of the directive and for which line orders have yet to be confirmed are as follows:

A34	Newbury bypass
A40	Gypsy corner/Western Circus
A406	Regents Park Road
A406	Silver Street—Hall Lane

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the road schemes in which his Department has extended the distance limit for safeguarding purposes beyond the 67m limit specified in article 15(1)(b) of the General Development Order 1988.

Mr. Chope [pursuant to his reply, 20 February 1991, column 182]: There is a second case in which the distance limit for safeguarding purposes has been extended beyond 67m. It comprised a two-mile section of the M6 in the east midlands, which forms part of the proposed motorway widening between junction 4 of the M6 and its junction with the M1. The basis for safeguarding is the same as that for the 80-mile section of the M1 referred to in my reply of the 20 February.

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will request the chairman of British Rail to make available to interested parties the documentation being submitted to the inquiry commissioned by British Rail into the alternative routes for the channel tunnel rail link from the North downs to London;

(2) if he will ensure that all parties making submissions to the independent inquiry into the channel tunnel rail link are given access to all the relevant documentation, including submissions and assessments by other parties.

Mr. Freeman: No. It would be inappropriate for British Rail to make available documents relating to an internal study and which is not in the nature of a public inquiry. The results of the study will be published in due course if the project proceeds and there will be ample opportunity for discussion before statutory approval is given for a new line.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will request the chairman of British Rail to publish the inception report which set the terms of reference for the inquiry by the independent assessor into the route of the channel tunnel rail link.

Mr. Freeman: I understand that British Rail expects to publish soon the interim report by W. S. Atkins on the methodology used by British Rail to compare alternative route options.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the chairman of British Rail to publish the report on alternative routes for the channel tunnel rail link.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) on 21 January 1991 at column 35.

SCOTLAND

Natural Heritage Agency

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the proposals to date for appointees to the regional boards of the proposed Scottish Natural Heritage Agency and their chairmen.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It will be for Scottish Natural Heritage to decide whether to have regional boards and, if so, whom to appoint to them.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many sites of special scientific interest are currently designated in Scotland; how many of these designations were objected to under section 28 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: As at 1 February 1991, 1,307 sites of special scientific interest had been notified in Scotland. A right of objection was introduced by the Wildlife and Countryside (Amendment) Act 1985, which came into effect on 26 August 1985. The Nature Conservancy Council's latest available figures are that 491 sites were confirmed during the period from 1 August 1985 to 30 November 1990 and that representations or objections were received in respect of 149 of those sites.

Tobacco (Children)

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on his policy for the enforcement of legislation controlling the sale of tobacco to children; and if he intends to introduce any amendments in connection with the Children and Young Persons (Protection from Tobacco) Bill.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: As with all criminal offences in Scotland, it is for the procurator fiscal to consider reports of alleged offences in relation to the sale of tobacco to children under 16 with a view to criminal proceedings.

We intend to consult Scottish local authorities about the introduction in the Children and Young Persons (Protection from Tobacco) Bill of powers to enable them to enforce such offences in a way which would be appropriate to prosecution procedures in Scotland.

Morar Bypass

Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects the outcome of the public inquiry on the Morar bypass, held on 20 March 1990, to be announced.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The inquiry report was submitted at the end of September 1990. It contained some recommendations by the reporter which have been the subject of detailed consideration. This is almost complete and it is expected that my right hon. Friend's decision will be issued shortly after the Easter recess.

Health Board Chairmen

Mr. Eadie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of occasions during the last 10 years on which a Minister of the Scottish Office has hosted a dinner for health board chairmen; and what were the venues in each case.

Mr. Lang: Dinners for health board chairmen were held on 8 July 1983 and 8 February 1991 in Edinburgh castle.

Electoral Statistics

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the total electorate for each parliamentary constituency in Scotland as at 16 February.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not yet available centrally. I shall write to the hon. Member in due course and place a copy of the information in the Library.

Nature Conservation

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for (a) each site of special scientific interest and (b) each national nature reserve the number of current management agreements between the Nature Conservancy Council and landowners; and if he will place a copy of each agreement in the Library.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I will write to the hon. Member.

Correspondence

Mr. Eadie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the average time it takes each of his departmental Ministers to answer letters received from right hon. and hon. Members.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 22 February 1991]: Disproportionate costs would be incurred in the preparation of an answer in the form requested. A survey carried out in my Department during a representative period in 1990 showed an average response time of 17 working days.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the additional funding given to the Nature Conservancy Council to facilitate renotification of sites of special scientific interest in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 22 February 1991]: The renotification of sites of special scientific interest is 97 per cent. complete. The allocation of funds to renotification is a matter for the Nature Conservancy Council within its budget.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Africa

37. Mr. Wells: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans Her Majesty's Government have to give further encouragement to the pursuit of structural adjustment in African countries.

Mrs. Chalker: Support for the process of economic reform has been a central aspect of our aid policy for Africa for several years and will continue to be so. We pledged and provided a total of £250 million for the first phase of the World Bank's special programme of assistance for sub-Saharan Africa. We expect shortly to make a further substantial pledge for the second phase of this programme.

38. Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the 27 African countries threatened with famine.

Mrs. Chalker: The Government are greatly concerned that 29 million people may be at risk of starvation in 25 African countries. Ethiopia, Sudan, Mozambique, Angola and Liberia are the most seriously affected with a total of over 20 million people at risk. HMG have committed over £118 million emergency assistance to these five countries since the beginning of 1989 and £22 million of relief aid to the rest of Africa. We are ready to do more through 1991.

Iraq

39. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of humanitarian needs inside Iraq.

Mrs. Chalker: None. Security Council resolution 666 charges the United Nations Sanctions Committee to make the necessary determination to establish whether or not humanitarian circumstances have arisen, and to keep the situation regarding foodstuffs in Iraq and Kuwait under review.

Neither the ICRC nor the UNICEF/WHO team now in Baghdad have yet been able to conduct a full assessment for consideration by the United Nations Sanctions Committee. The ICRC have, however, identified a serious shortage of drinking water and, after notifying the United Nations Sanctions Committee, dispatched water purification supplies to Baghdad. The United Nations Sanctions Committee has authorised a consignment of food for ICRC distribution to Iranian internees and some other Asian nationals which the ICRC have identified as being in need.

Yemen

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the level of overseas aid to the Republic of Yemen will be affected by events in the Gulf.

Mrs. Chalker: With the withdrawal of aid personnel from certain parts of the middle east to ensure their safety, our aid programme to the Republic of Yemen is on hold, although certain activities are continuing in the United Kingdom. We hope to resume our bilateral programme in the Republic of Yemen as and when circumstances allow, although it is not possible to say at this stage at what level that might be.

Food Relief Flights

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many food relief flights his Department is sponsoring.

Mrs. Chalker: The ODA has provided financial support for four current food airlift operations, one each in Ethiopia, Sudan, Angola and Mozambique.

In Sudan the airlift is operated by the Lutheran World Federation from Nairobi to Juba. I have just approved further assistance of £200,000 bringing our total contribution for this airlift since February 1989 to £1·2 million.

Somalia

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the situation in Somalia.

Mrs. Chalker: The various groups who were opposed to the overthrow of Siad Barre's regime have been unable to agree so far on setting up a new Government. We are urging them to do so. Meanwhile fighting continues with the remnants of Siad Barre's forces and also reportedly between some of the rival groups.

Beef

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to propose environmental conditions into the beef protocol of the Lomé agreement; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker [holding answer 19 February 1991]: When the fourth Lomé convention takes effect (ratification is required by all member states in the Community and two thirds of the ACP countries), the provisions of the beef protocol will allow certain ACP countries to import beef into the EC at reduced levy, subject to national quotas. As environmental concerns are covered in articles 33-41 of the convention, the beef protocol is already subject to them.

DEFENCE

Atomic Weapons Research Establishment

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to ensure that employees of AWRE are provided with the same opportunities to remain within the UKAEA pension scheme after privatisation as former AWRE employees who transferred to the employment of British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. and Amersham plc; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The question of pension arrangements for members of the UKAEA principal non-industrial superannuation scheme (PNISS) employed at AWRE after contractorisation is under consideration.

I have given assurances that nobody will suffer detriment to their pension arrangements as a result of contractorisation.

The Gulf

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on escapes of dangerous material from biological weapons depots in Iraq destroyed by allied bombing.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We have no reliable information regarding any environmental effects of allied bombing of biological weapons facilities in Iraq. The methods used in attacking such sites are designed to minimise the risk of contamination outside the sites. Any remaining risk must be balanced against the risk of Iraq using these weapons against coalition forces or civilian populations.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on the extent to which the suffering of the Kuwaiti population to which he referred in his answer of 18 February, Official Report, column 64, has been increased by the effect of allied bombardment.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have nothing to add to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend on 18 February, at column 64.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, further to his answer of 18 February, Official Report, column 64, whether any military objectives have been discussed with Israel beyond those laid down by the United Nations Security Council.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Israel is not a member of the coalition in the Gulf and is not involved in the action to implement the United Nations Security Council resolutions.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions British air sorties over Iraq and Kuwait have missed intended military targets and hit attendant civilian areas causing deaths and injuries to civilians; and what steps the British military commanders in Saudi Arabia have taken to avoid such civilian casualties.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is allied policy to attack only military targets and facilities supporting Iraq's occupation of Kuwait. Great care continues to be taken during these attacks, both in the tactics and the weapons used, to minimise the risk of causing civilian casualties. Only a minority of the precision-guided munitions used by the RAF are assessed to have missed their intended target. There are indications that most of these have fallen well away from inhabited areas. Any civilian casualties that may have resulted are greatly regretted.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he now has on the number of consecutive days prior to the bombing of the Al-Amariyah bunker that it had been used for the protection of civilians.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: None. The United States has made it clear that the bunker would not have been attacked if it had been known that civilians were inside.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the oral answer to the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) on 19 February 1991, Official Report, column 134, if he will set out the evidence that Iraq has nuclear weapons that are capable of polluting the Gulf region; and when Her Majesty's Government reached the conclusion that Iraq has a nuclear weapons capability.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We continue to assess that Iraq is not currently capable of constructing a nuclear explosive device.

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the numbers of forces each country has (a) committed to service and (b) promised are available to the coalition forces in the Gulf.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) on 12 February, at columns 382-83. The precise natue of the national contributions to the coalition force in the Gulf is a matter for the Governments concerned.

Teesside Development Corporation

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will supply a copy of the specification for facilities for the quality assurance unit to the Teesside development corporation.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: A summary of area requirements sub-divided by category was sent to Teesside development corporation on 25 January 1991. Additional data were passed to Teesside development corporation on 28 January 1991.

Quality Assurance Unit

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current estimate of the cost of relocating his Department's quality assurance unit to (a) Preston Farm, Stockton-on-Tees, (b) ICI Billingham and (c) Portland in Dorset.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: My Department is currently reassessing the scope of work to be relocated and the feasibility and likely cost of a number of locations. Current studies will be completed as soon as possible.

Prisoners of War

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements exist to allow families resident in the United Kingdom to visit prisoners of war; and whether he has plans to alter the present arrangement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Suitable arrangements are being made to allow visits by the close families of the Iraqi prisoners of war held at Rollestone camp. These will begin shortly.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

White Collar Crime

30. Mr. Hind: To ask the Attorney-General if he has any plans to meet the Director of the Serious Fraud Office to discuss the prosecution of white collar crime; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I expect to meet the director again shortly to discuss matters of departmental interest.

Crown Prosecution Service

31. Mr. Vaz: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a further statement on the state of the Crown prosecution service.

The Attorney-General: The Crown prosecution service continues to strengthen both in numbers, effectiveness, and the working relationships with other agencies. The Crown prosecution service warmly welcomes the report of the working group on pre-trial issues.

Land Access

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Attorney-General what plans he has to implement the Law Commission's recommendations on access to neighbours' land.

The Attorney-General: The Government have accepted the recommendations contained in the Law Commission's report "Rights of Access to Neighbouring Land" (Law Com. No. 151), which they will seek to implement when parliamentary time allows.

Jury Service

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Attorney-General (1) how catchment areas for jury service are determined; and whether there are circumstances in which those summoned for jury service can opt to fulfil their duties within adjacent catchment areas;

(2) what measures are taken when females are asked to undertake jury service to ensure that there is (a) a limit to the hours they need to be away from their homes, (b) coverage for any homework and child care responsibilities they might normally undertake and (c) that they are not vulnerable by having to resort to public transport at unsociable hours;

(3) what consideration is taken into account in determining whether a person is to be summoned to undertake jury service of (a) the distances they are required to travel to court, (b) the availability of public transport facilities and (c) the length of time a juror will need to be away from their home.

The Attorney-General: The Juries Act 1974 provides that the Lord Chancellor shall have regard to the convenience of persons summoned and to their respective places of residence and in particular to the desirability of selecting jurors from within reasonable daily travelling distance of the court which they are to attend. The area from which jurors are summoned to attend a particular location of the Crown Court usually coincides with the petty sessional areas from which the persons are normally committed for trial to that location when charged with a class 4 offence. However, jurors are normally only summoned from those parts of the catchment area which are within one or two hours travelling time. The court day normally begins at 10.30 am and concludes at about 4.30 pm and although they are normally expected to attend some time in advance jurors are usually away from their homes or places of work for a maximum of about nine hours. This, of course, varies with the length of the court day and the actual travelling time for a particular juror. No special arrangements are made for females who are performing this important public duty to which all those eligible are expected to contribute.

Where public transport is not easily accessible jurors may receive an enhanced rate for use of a private vehicle. Those who cannot reasonably use public transport and do not have their own transport may, of course, apply for excusal. There is no provision for a juror to opt to attend a court which has an adjacent catchment area.

Those with young children are entitled to receive jurors allowances including financial loss allowance in the same way as any other juror. Financial loss allowance is paid where a juror, in consequence of attendance has incurred any expenditure (other than travelling and subsistence costs which are paid as separate allowances) which he or she would not otherwise incur including any expenditure on child care costs or any loss of earnings or benefit. There is, however, an overall maximum of £35·30 per day which may be paid in respect of financial loss for the first 10 days of service. This increases thereafter to £70·60.

Any person may apply for excusal from jury service and summoning officers are instructed to treat with sympathy applications on the grounds of the need to care for young children.

Mortgage Arrears

Mr. Meale: To ask the Attorney-General if he will give by year the number of court actions for mortgage arrears or repossessions, by petty sessions division, since 1987.

The Attorney-General: Mortgage possession actions are a civil matter and as such come within the jurisdiction of the Chancery Division of the High Court and the county courts in England and Wales which are divided into six circuits.

The number of mortgage possession actions issued in the county courts since 1987 were:

	1987	1988	1989	1990

Mr. Meale: To ask the Attorney-General if he will give by year the number of court actions for mortgage arrears or repossessions in the Mansfield court area since 1987.

The Attorney-General: The number of mortgage possession actions issued in Mansfield county court since 1987 were:

	Number
1987	518
1988	411

Mr. Renton: The number of titles included in the British National Bibliography is as follows:

PRIME MINISTER

Norwegian Prime Minister

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what was discussed at his meeting with his Norwegian counterpart on 13 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 21 February at column 223.

Street Lighting

Dr. Twinn: To ask the Prime Minister if he will seek to improve co-ordination between the Home Office and Departments of Environment and Transport to identify where early action can be taken to reduce the public's fear of, and to help prevent, crime by improving the standard of street lighting in towns; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The Home Office has just received a first draft of a report of a major research study undertaken by the University of Southampton to assess the impact of improved streetlighting on crime and the fear of crime in the London borough of Wandsworth. The results are being considered. The Home Office is also engaged in a monitoring exercise on the link between lighting improvements and crime in four urban areas. When all the relevant information is to hand Home Office Ministers will consider, in conjunction with other Departments as appropriate, what further action is necessary to try and reduce the public's fear of crime.

German Chancellor

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what matters were discussed during his meeting with Chancellor Kohl in Bonn on 11 February.

The Prime Minister: Chancellor Kohl and I discussed a number of current issues, including the Gulf, relations with the Soviet Union and European Community affairs. I look forward to developing our close relationship.

Nuclear Accidents

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on his progress in preparing a contingency plan to deal with the effects of any future nuclear accident overseas following the parliamentary answer to the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North (Sir T. Skeet) on 30 June 1987, Official Report, columns 65-67.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley), the then Secretary of State for the Environment, announced in January 1988 that proposals for implementing the national response plan had been finalised. Details of the proposals have been published in a booklet: "The National Response Plan and Radiation Incident Monitoring Network (RIMNET). A Statement of Proposals" published by HMSO, copies of which have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

The radiation monitors for the first phase of the RIMNET system have been in operation since June 1988, and I understand that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment will be making an announcement shortly with regard to the award of the contract for installing phase 2 of RIMNET.

Electricity Prices

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Prime Minister whether his office has been consulted about the proposed 13 per cent. increase in domestic electricity prices.

The Prime Minister: It is for the Director General of Electricity Supply to receive and consider the companies' proposals, and to satisfy himself that they are consistent with the companies' licence requirements.

The Gulf

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what communications he, or his officials, had with the deputy director-general of the BBC on 13 February concerning BBC news coverage of the casualties caused to Iraqi civilians by allied air raids on Baghdad.

The Prime Minister: There is contact on a regular basis between my office and the media on a variety of subjects, including the coverage of the Gulf conflict.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister if President Bush contacted Her Majesty's Government prior to his speech in Massachussets on 15 February calling for the overthrow of President Saddam Hussein; and what is the Government's policy in relation to the President of Iraq.

The Prime Minister: The Government's policy towards Iraq is to secure full, immediate and unconditional compliance with the Security Council resolutions.

Mr. Latham: To ask the Prime Minister whether he will make a statement on the progress of military action to liberate Kuwait in accordance with resolutions of the United Nations Security Council.

The Prime Minister: The military action to free Kuwait is making steady progress, while attempting to avoid civilian casualties so far as possible. The forces of the multinational coalition deserve great credit for their performance.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Young Offenders

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take immediate steps to deprive the courts of the power to remand 15 and 16-year-old boys in prison.

Mr. John Patten: On 4 February, we published a consultation paper setting out our proposals for reforming the arrangements for the remand of alleged juvenile offenders. We propose to end the remand to prison custody of 15 and 16-year-old boys, as soon as enough places in local authority secure accommodation are available.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Ashton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will make a statement outlining the current practice in respect of allowing the staff of the Metropolitan police time off in working hours for sporting and leisure activities;

(2) what was the highest total number of hours given in time off for leisure of sporting activities to any member of the Metropolitan police force in 1990;

(3) how many working hours were lost in the Metropolitan police force in 1990 because of sporting and leisure activities; and what was the cost to public funds;

(4) if he will list the various sporting and leisure activities which the staff of the Metropolitan police force had time off work for last year.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Deputy Commissioner has told me that officers representing the Metropolitan police at first or second team level, at sports affiliated to the Metropolitan Police Athletic Association are allowed up to four hours once a week in duty time to take part in matches, subject to the exigencies of duties. The sports involved are as listed.

Gambling

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will bring forward legislation to outlaw the advertising of gambling and amusement coin-operated slot machines in such a way as to promote the exploitation of young people.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No. The results of the Home Office research study "Amusement Machines Dependency and Delinquency", published in July 1988, provided no grounds to justify additional controls on amusement-with-prizes and other coin-operated amusement machines. As regards "jackpot" machines, these are permitted only on premises either licensed or registered under the Gaming Act 1968 to which young people do not normally have access and which are already subject to controls on advertising.

Remand Prisoners, Manchester

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what discussions have been held on the impact on the effectiveness of Greater Manchester police as a result of extra duties relating to the holding of prisoners in police cells and as to what effect it will have on the prisoners, their families, and on solicitors and the probation service; and what discussions there have been about finding alternative accommodation;

(2) what discussions he has had with Greater Manchester Police about the number of people expected to be held in police cells in Greater Manchester for each of the next three years; how much this is expected to cost in police overtime; and how much will be spent in improving police cells during that period.

Mrs. Rumbold: Officials are in daily contact with the Greater Manchester police with a view to minimising the use of police cells for prisoners and any impact on police effectiveness, the prisoners, their families, solicitors and the probation service. The elimination of the problem depends on the provision of new or refurbished accommodation and the resolution of industrial relations difficulties in certain prisons in the north-west, where I hope that staff will note the comments of Lord Justice Woolf in his report that is being published today. The prison service is also actively reviewing the use of the prison estate in order to make the most effective use of the available accommodation. It is not possible to estimate centrally the extent to which police overtime may continue to be needed, and the amount to be spent on improving police cells is a matter for the police authority to determine in relation to other priorities. The costs incurred by the Greater Manchester police in keeping in police cells people who should be in prison are reimbursed by the prison service.

Escaped Detainees

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether Molly Donalds, Karen Rhoden, and Patricia Weir, who escaped from Drake Hall on 24 January 1989, have since been recaptured;

(2) whether Ikaete Margarita Jackson, Salamat Oliuvag-Benigun, and Florence Omawuaye Asore, who escaped from East Sutton Park in January 1989, have since been recaptured.

Mrs. Rumbold: No. These six women are still unlawfully at large.

Female Prisoners

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when new evidence is due to be issued about the categorisation and allocation of female prisoners to penal establishments; what factors gave rise to the review; whether it will consider the large numbers of absconders from open prisons; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: Guidance will be issued to governors shortly, following an examination of procedures which was prompted by the need to establish a more systematic and consistent basis for allocating female prisoners, particularly as between closed and open establishments. The risk of absconding is an important factor to be taken into account in considering an individual's suitability for open conditions.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Concessionary Fuel

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) following the reply to the hon. Member for Rother Valley on 31 January, Official Report, column 633, concerning concessionary fuel, what action has been taken by British Coal to inform and give advice to concessionaires who have accepted the lump sum offer;

(2) pursuant to the answer of 31 January, Official Report, column 633, on concessionary fuel, what action his Department has taken in conjunction with British Coal; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: Officials contacted British Coal as soon as they became aware that a lump-sum option was being offered to recipients of cash-in-lieu of concessionary coal. That contact has been followed up with a letter confirming the importance of concessionaires obtaining benefit advice before making a decision. The Department will also be issuing appropriate guidance to Social Security offices and local authorities. We understand that British Coal is currently considering its position.

Pension Deductions

Sir Anthony Meyer: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many retirement pensioners during each of the last five years for which figures are readily available have had sums deducted from their pensions in respect of accommodation or national health service treatment after the statutory six weeks stay in national health service hospitals; and what was the total sum received by the national health service in consequence of these deductions during each of these years.

Miss Widdecombe: Figures are not available in the precise form requested. However, data are available on the number of people counted on specified dates in the past five years who had their benefit reduced as a result of receiving in-patient treatment under the national health service. The numbers are as follows:

	Number
31 March 1986	76,450
30 September 1987	73,250
31 March 1988	68,990
31 March 1989	66,220
31 March 1990	60,590

The money by which a pensioner's benefit is reduced is not paid directly to the national health service but remains within the national insurance fund which helps fund the NHS. In 1989-90 the fund paid £4·06 billion towards the cost of the NHS.

National Insurance Contributions

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the relative entitlements of (a) a widow who has paid full national insurance contributions for 35 years and then becomes unemployed and (b) a widow in the same position who has never paid national insurance contributions.

Mr. Jack: The information is as follows:

Widow (a)

If claims and satisfies conditions, payable rate of unemployment benefit reduced by amount of widows benefit (excluding additional pension).

Widow (b)

Not entitled to unemployment benefit. May be entitled to widows benefit based on late husband's contribution record.

Both have possible entitlement to income support, housing benefit and community charge benefit.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security for how many years an individual has to pay full national insurance contributions to qualify for a state pension (a) in full and (b) other specific categories of pension.

Mr. Jack: To qualify for a 100 per cent. category A basic retirement pension a person must have paid full rate contributions for approximately nine-tenths of their working life. The working life is normally calculated as 49 years for a man and 44 years for a woman, but is reduced in certain circumstances, such as where home responsibilities protection applies. If the contribution record is insufficient to give the full rate, basic pension may be paid on a pro-rata basis at rates varying between 25 per cent. and 100 per cent. Below 25 per cent. no basic pension is payable.

Other specific categories of retirement pensions are category B for a wife, widow or widower derived from their spouses contributions and calculated on a similar basis and categories C and D non-contributory pensions for elderly people, which have a residence rather than a contributory requirement. Further details on the entitlement conditions for all state retirement pensions can be found in leaflet NP46, which is available in the Library.

Local Offices (Industrial Action)

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what areas of work were affected, or not covered at all, as a result of the recent industrial action in (a) Wallasey, (b) Stockton, (c) Redcar, (d) Doncaster, (e) Hull, (f) Leicester, Yeoman Street, (g) Tottenham, (h) Ilford, (i) Bloomsbury, (j) Kensington and (k) Camberwell local offices.

Miss Widdecombe: As can only be expected when industrial action has been taken, all areas of work were affected to some degree in the local offices mentioned and local management had to prioritise work accordingly. The prompt payment of benefits remained the top priority for all these offices. Every effort was made by management and staff to ensure that their offices remained open to the public and to provide a telephone service (although this was necessarily limited in some cases).

Liable Relative Work

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list, by region, the allocated number of staff days for liable relative work during the period 1 April 1990 to 31 December 1990; and what was the number used.

Miss Widdecombe: The staff days allocated and used for liable relative work during the period 1 April 1990 to 31 December 1990 for each region are in the table.

The figures are obtained from the Department's monthly statistical returns. Caution needs to be applied in making direct comparisons between allocations and usage. Allocations include management and common services (typists etc) which may not be included in liable relative usage figures.

Region	Allocated	Used
North East	59,634	42,249
Midlands	57,789	35,032
London North	60,984	34,981
London South	65,241	29,866
Wales and South West	45,423	30,018
North West	48,591	33,337
Scotland	36,126	26,196

Local Office, Norcross

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many forms DS 1060 were sent out by his Department's office at Norcross, Blackpool, in the period 1 January 1990 to 31 December 1990.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average time taken by his Department's office at Norcross, Blackpool, to answer a letter from (a) a member of the public and (b) an hon. Member.

Miss Widdecombe: (a) A quality assessment study has just been completed at North Fylde central office, which includes Norcross, and this shows that in relation to inquiries by members of the public 62 per cent. of letters were answered in less than three weeks. The study shows an improvement over the findings in the last quality assessment exercise. Further positive efforts to improve this aspect of customer service will continue and the results will be monitored. This study also showed that 78 per cent. of those questioned considered the quality of service given to be good or very good.

(b) The precise information is not available in the form requested. However, across the span of the five different benefits the current average lies in the range of five to 12 working days.

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will instigate a review of the level of performance of his Department's office at Norcross, Blackpool.

Miss Widdecombe: The North Fylde office at Blackpool is responsible for processing a wide range of diverse benefits each of which is regularly monitored to establish performance levels. Where deficiencies are shown management action is taken to improve the situation. In the case of a major problem recourse to a full review is available to management and such a step has recently been taken in relation to the War Pensions area of work. We are content therefore that satisfactory performance control mechanisms exist at the North Fylde offices.

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many files have been recorded as lost at his Department's office at Norcross, Blackpool, in 1990.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is not available in the form requested.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total number of people who (a) were entitled to and (b) claimed severe weather payments in 1986-87 and, so far as the information is available, in the current winter; and how many in each case were pensioners.

Mr. Scott: We estimate that about 2·2 million households are eligible to claim cold weather payments this winter, of whom 1·25 million are pensioner households. Information on claims made this winter is not yet available.

Cold weather payments in 1986-87 were made under the previous scheme. I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Moray, (Mrs. Ewing), on 14 February, at col 583, which lists the number of payments. Details are not available of the claims made, or of the numbers of people eligible for payments.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many cold weather payments were made each day from 1 February.

Mr. Scott: Information regarding the number of cold weather payments made is collected each calendar month. When it becomes available, the information for February will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the additional cost if the cold weather payments were paid to those pensioners who receive (a) £20 a week above the income support maximum and (b) £10 a week above that level.

Mr. Scott [holding answer 15 February 1991]: The estimated costs are for (a) £5·5 million per week and for (b) £4 million per week.

Note: These costs are for payments to those benefit units which have at least one member who is 60 years or over and capital under £1000. These estimates assume all those entitled to a payment make a claim.

Research Projects

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the research projects (a) currently underway and (b) planned by the Department in all areas excluding invalidity benefit, giving the title of the research, its estimated cost and its completion date in each case.

Mr. Scott: The tables set out the details of research under way and planned by the Department. A number of additional studies are under consideration to start in 1991-92 depending on available resources but details of these have not yet been fully considered.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many parliamentary questions have not been answered because of disproportionate cost over the last year; and if he will list those that could now be answered due to the effectiveness of the operational strategy of computerisation.

Miss Widdecombe: There have been 33 questions receiving such answers over the last year. It would not be possible to undertake the type of analysis requested without incurring disproportionate cost.

Social Fund

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how much money has been allocated for loans and grants under the social fund for 1990-91, in each district council area of Wales;

(2) if he will publish the numbers of successful claims for (a) grants and (b) loans under the social fund as a percentage of the total number of applicants for each, in every district council area of Wales in 1990;

(3) of the successful social fund applications for (a) grants and (b) loans, how many were allocated to (i) pensioners, (ii) single parents, (iii) disabled people, (iv) families and (v) single people for each district council area in Wales during 1990;

(4) how much money was (a) allocated and (b) utilised as (i) loans and (ii) grants under the social fund in each district council area in Wales during 1990; and in each instance what amount of money was set aside for cases which are pending in 1990-91.

Mr. Scott: Information is not collected according to district council areas. Statistics for all local offices of the Department on (a) allocations for loans and grants, (b) applications processed and awards made, and (c) expenditure, are in the Library.

Awards are made from the year's budget in which they are paid, not the budget for the date of application.

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many of those in receipt of income support are having deductions made to the repayment of social fund loans; and what is the average level of repayments by quintile to each of his Department's offices in Derbyshire.

Mr. Scott: The table shows the number of applicants repaying social fund loans at the end of November 1990. It is not possible to provide quintile figures on repayments.
